Britain overpowers Israel in Davis Club match

By ORI LEWIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RAMAT HASHARON — Greg Rusedski gave a masterful display of power tennis recently at the Ramat Hasharon Tennis Center as he polished off Noam Okun to clinch a Davis Cup victory for Great Britain.

The win sent the visitors to a playoff for a place in next year's world group, the most important team competition in men's tennis in which the top 16 countries participate.

Britain completed a 3-2 victory in its series with Israel, which suffered its first home defeat in the competition since it lost 4-1 to France in 1998.

World No. 46 Rusedski, who represented Canada early in his career, was never troubled by Okun on his way to a 6-3, 6-4, 6-2 victory over Israel's No. 1 player in one hour, 46 minutes.

There was some consolation for Israel in the final contest when Harel Levy showed some of his old sparkle in a 6-7 (1/7), 6-2, 6-4 victory over David Sherwood, one of the heroes of the earlier doubles win for the visitors over favoured local duo Andy Ram and Yoni Erlich.

The doubles win was the clear turning point of the series, and the accompanying warm weather was the perfect embellishment for the Brits, who can look back on a successful week and build toward their next series, a playoff for a place among the world's top 16 tennis nations.

Israel's next opponents will likely be Zimbabwe. The match will be played away in September for the right to remain in Euro/Africa Zone Group 1.

Try as he might, Okun was no match for Rusedski, whose awesome serve-and-volley game made the Israeli look like a schoolboy at times.

"For most of the match, I didn't manage to return his serve, and when I did, he replied with some very good points which gave me no chance… All that was left for me was to applaud him. He played really well," Okun said after the match.

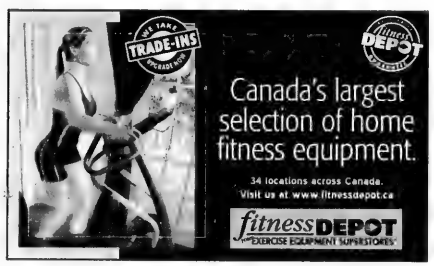
"It has probably been one of the most enjoyable [series] I have ever been involved with, mainly because of seeing the new generation come through… it's been a really good team effort," Rusedski said. "I was pleased. I played the big points very well, never dropped serve… and got better and better in every set I played."

British captain Jeremy Bates said the doubles win was the turning point.

"I think there was a huge shift in momentum… It's a huge boost for us psychologically. In any Davis Cup match, the doubles is pivotal," Bates said.

Although the final singles match between Levy and Sherwood was for the record only, Levy said the win against the big Yorkshireman helped him note some small improvements in his game as he attempts to climb back into the world's top 100.

"This was very important for me. I had the chance to play in front of the crowd who stayed behind to watch, and it did me a lot of good," he said.



Two for Bridge

By ERIC KOKISH
and BEVERLY KRAFT

Eric: Two of our favourite characters in the bridge world are Tarek Sadek and Walid El Ahmady of Egypt. Both have family in Toronto, and may one day immigrate to Canada, which would be a boon for our international bridge aspirations. In the past few years, they have twice finished second in the prestigious Cavendish Invitational Pairs in Las Vegas, won the Blue Ribbon Pairs, and led their national team in strong performances at the world level. Walid also won the Life Master Pairs, and the two have established an excellent reputation on both the world stage and the tough North American circuit.

Beverly: They're both such sweet guys and bring a positive aura with them wherever they go. I was pleased to find two deals in the Daily Bulletins from the 2004 Istanbul Olympiad that show them at their best. The first appeared under the title, "Pharaonic Magic," which was particularly appropriate, given the illusion created by Tarek in this round robin match against Israel.

(i) 11-15 HCP, 6+♣ or 5+♣/4♥ or 4♠; (ii) Artificial inquiry

The standard lead from West's heart holding is the king or queen, but here Tarek had reason to believe that the jack would be in dummy, and backed his judgment by leading the ♥9, trying to look like a man holding an honour-10-nine combination (the partnership agreement is nine from 10-nine combinations). Declarer made the natural play of the four from dummy, and when Tarek continued smoothly with the ♥10, declarer played low again. When West finally revealed himself by leading the king, declarer knew he had been swindled. His best chance for a ninth trick on the lie of the cards was the jack of hearts, but Tarek had removed that option with his courageous play.

This was just one of the deals that contributed to Egypt's 25-0 VP win over the 1993 European Team champions.

Eric: Our second offering originally appeared as "A Play Made from Hunger?" The appropriateness of that title will be apparent in a moment.

(i) Heart fit, club strength; (ii) 5-ace Blackwood; (iii) 2 of 5 "aces" but no ♠Q

A bid or play may be described as "made from hunger" when its perpetrator seems to be particularly desperate. That description seemed particularly appropriate for Walid as he contemplated a disappointing dummy in 6♠ against a strong Danish team. More so when one considers that the Olympiad happened to overlap the Islamic holiday of Ramadan and Walid was fasting while playing three gruelling matches a day.

If you think that 6♠ is hopeless, even for a hungry man, you're right. But Walid saw a slim chance if he could find the E/W cards as he wanted them, and could make it attractive for East to do something fatal for the defence. He took West's lead of the ♥K with the ace, cashed the ♠A, and led the ♠J, playing the king when West was gracious enough to follow. Then he called for the ♦2 from dummy. Put yourself in East's place. Holding the ♦8 himself, it seemed clear that declarer held the ♦K, or was void in diamonds. Furthermore, declarer's handling of the trump suit left open the possibility that West had a trump trick with the queen. East played the ♦A, crashing West's king. Egypt won the critical match 24-6, and an hour later, Walid was able to satisfy his "other" hunger with a sandwich and a cup of tea.

Beverly: So, Kokes, when did you say these guys would be moving to Canada?

Inside Back

My 'kosher' shoes

I have been shopping for a pair of cute black running shoes in a size eight for weeks! You know, the ones with mesh and Velcro that everyone is wearing but me?

I eagerly held a dozen pair in my hands. My favourites showed off a hot pink stripe down the side and were adorable. But before I tried them on, I lifted the tongue to read what material they were made of. Every pair was the same – genuine leather – and I sadly put them back on the shelf. It may as well have been written that the shoelaces were made of baby kitten tails and the soles of puppy ears.

By MIRIAM PORTER

An animal is an animal and to me there is no difference. I would not carry a purse made from cats or wear a belt from the skin of a dog. I would not wear a lambskin coat or walk in leather shoes from a cow. I believe animal rights are more important than fashion.

At the age of 13, I stopped wearing leather. I gave away my Roots black leather vest and green suede purse and never looked back. Despite the frustration I sometimes feel when shopping, I never consider the alternative. I am confident I will soon find shoes that are cruelty free and fashionable. There are hundreds of styles of non-leather shoes, clothing, belts, bags and wallets, and it's worth the extra effort.

An animal is sentenced to a lifetime of suffering with every pair of leather shoes purchased. "Most of the millions of animals slaughtered for their skin endure the horrors of factory farming before being shipped to slaughter," states www.cowsarecool.com, a website operated by People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA). "Buying leather directly contributes to factory farms and slaughterhouses since skin is the most economically important byproduct of the meat-packing industry. Leather is also no friend of the environment since it shares all the environmental destruction of the meat industry, in addition to toxins used in tanning.

"Animals are kept in overcrowded conditions on feedlots and factory farms, often unable to take a single step or turn around and deprived of all that is natural to them, including exercise, sunlight – and even the feel of grass beneath their feet.

"At the slaughterhouse, animals are routinely skinned and dismembered while they are still alive. Federal inspectors found live cattle dangling from an overhead chain at a plant in Texas. Videotape from another plant shows hogs kicking and squealing as they are lowered into a tank of scalding water, which is used to soften their skin.

"Kid goats may be boiled alive to make gloves, and the skins of unborn calves and lambs are sometimes purposely aborted or slaughtered from pregnant cows and ewes."

This is the harsh reality of where leather comes from. Don't deceive yourself that the animals surrender politely and feel no pain. Their hurting and suffering is very real. You have a choice to make every time you go shopping for clothing – make sure you have all the facts before making a decision.

In Judaism, there are laws regarding kosher meat and rabbinical supervision to ensure humane slaughter. Tza'ar baalei chayim (kindness to animals) is the prohibition against causing pain to any living animal. It is a basic principle of compassion. But the manufacturing of leather shoes, jackets and handbags do not require rabbinical regulation. Perhaps it should, since Judaism recognizes animals feel physical pain and we are forbidden to inflict it.

Furthermore, www.cowsarecool.com says that "leather may be made from cows, pigs, goats and sheep; exotic animals like alligators, ostriches, kangaroos; and even dogs and cats, who are slaughtered for their meat and skins in China, which exports their skins around the world. Since leather is normally not labelled, you never really know where (or whom) it came from."

I take the extra time to find non-leather options like cotton, linen, rubber, ramie, canvas and synthetics. And if I still can't find what I am looking for, I would rather go barefoot. I am lucky to have the option of feeling the grass beneath my feet.

SNOW-PEA CITRUS SALAD W/POPPYSEED DRESSING (for Purim)

4 cups fresh snow-peas
1 cup whole red seedless grapes
1 cup fresh orange sections (2 large oranges)
1 cup fresh grapefruit sections (2 large grapefruits)
1 green pepper, cut in julienne slices
1 small red onion, sliced into thin slivers
1/2 cup dry-roasted sunflower seeds

Snip ends of snow-peas and discard. In large bowl, combine snow-peas, grapes, orange sections, grapefruit sections, green pepper slices, onion slivers and sunflower seeds. Toss salad with 1/2 to 3/4 cup poppyseed dressing, or to taste. Yield: 8-10 servings.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

I find in preliminary discussions that most people think of Jewish education as the Hebrew school they attended. Of course, in some cases that association is positive, but in many others, it's anything but. Broadening the scope of what is included in the arena of Jewish education is one of my professional aspirations, one I share with my colleagues at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and with fellow educators around the world. There are two dimensions in which the scope must be expanded: age range and the formal-informal continuum.

Pre-school is becoming an important element in a global approach to Jewish education, not only because of the base it builds in very young children, but also because of the questions it poses to young couples designing their future lifestyle. If young parents have the opportunity to study as their little tots are learning the aleph beit of Jewish life, Jewish homes of substance will be formed.

It was not long ago that most parents thought of the elementary years as the only ones that are important to Jewish learning – up to bar and bat mitzvah. Now I live in a community that has seen a veritable explosion in enrolment for Jewish secondary school. Mature communities understand that an elementary Jewish education is as insufficient as elementary general education. The hidden message of stopping Jewish learning at Grade 8 is that the Torah contains children's fables that are best left behind in adulthood.

Even high school, though, is not the end. As a teacher of Jewish studies at York University, I am constantly witnessing the sparkle in a student's eye as he or she suddenly grasps a new idea in Jewish life that only a university student could appreciate.

Adult education is yet another exciting locus where Jewish lessons are merged with lifelong experience. Senior citizens with longer and healthier lives are also a new audience, with a Kohelet-view of the world that makes for a whole new commentary on Jewish life.

As for the differences between formal and informal education, see my next column…

Blowing bar mitzvah money on coke

The following is an interview with a member of the Toronto Jewish community and a former drug addict. It is one person's testimony about a personal battle with drugs and alcohol, and some of that person's thoughts on the challenge to the Jewish world in dealing with the proliferation of substance and alcohol abuse. Aspects of the person's life have been changed to protect the person's anonymity. No matter how many Jews this affects, all of us need to face this problem.

URBAN WRITER

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

"I remember the first time I smoked pot. I was 15. I was feeling depressed so I smoked a couple of times. I started hanging with a buddy who drank a lot. Every Shabbat we would go to his house and get drunk…

"After going to a few different schools, trying other mild drugs, I came home and my drinking got really heavy. I never had one shot. I was always getting wasted and blacking out…

"Alcohol didn't seem like such a bad thing, because of how it is perceived in our community. 'It's Shabbat, you drink.' Nobody thought it would turn into a problem…

"At 18, I started doing coke every day. It was easy to get – maximum an hour wait. I used all of my bar mitzvah money. On coke, you can function, but it's expensive and hard to come down off of…

"My parents found out and sent me to rehab in Israel. I don't remember a lot about those days but it was there that I started doing more drugs. I felt alone and in pain…

"In Israel, pharmaceuticals are huge. It was normal to do Valium and Xanax [an anti-anxiety drug] with booze. I tried heroin with some friends. Heroin was good. I've only done heroin in Israel. It's more accessible than pot…

"I've overdosed, spent nights in the hospital. One time I overdosed on Adderall [a stimulant used to treat attention deficit hyperactivity disorder] after taking 300 mg and mixing it with alcohol. The normal dosage for those who need it is 30 mg per day. The hospitals in Israel treated me like crap. They don't like drug overdoses…

"There were kids who would learn during the day and sell heroin on the side. It was less of a rebellion against religion and more of 'What am I going to do with my life?' I was trafficking drugs, selling morphine…

"Everyone I knew was doing drugs. I don't think it's more prevalent in the religious community than the non-religious community…

"Today I'm 23 and clean. Some days are better than others. There are times when I want to go to a bar and get wasted. I'm learning to deal with anxiety and depression like a normal person. It's hard. I've distanced myself from friends who are still doing drugs…

"In the Toronto Jewish community there is a lot of drug use. I can detect when someone is on drugs. What's big among kids here are pharmaceuticals like OxyContin [a prescription painkiller] codeine and morphine…

"I think alcohol should not be sitting in shul freely, letting 16-year-olds get wasted. Nineteen in Canada is the legal drinking age. It should be the same in shuls. Purim can be disgusting for youth who are into drugs and alcohol. It's an excuse to drink in excess and without consequence. It can be a barf-fest.

"A lot of people in the Jewish community think if we don't talk about it, it will go away. Then you come home and find your kid overdosed on heroin…

"My parents didn't know. I used to lie a lot. Most addicts are good liars and can manipulate. I would never put blame on my parents. When I told them I'm an alcoholic and drug addict and wanted help, they were right there. They go to 'group' and therapy…

"I wish I could just say 'Don't' to the kids who are doing drugs today. They are lonely and hurting. But until you want help, nothing anyone says means a thing."

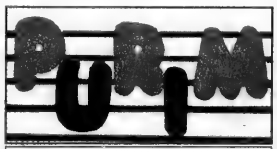
Jeremy Molko, Grade 3

A day of community

Eli Minkowitz, Grade 3



Editorial

None of the holidays on the Jewish calendar, it may be arguably asserted, enlists our young children's participation more than the holiday of Purim.

Youngsters can play an important role in all the key components of the holiday: listening to the retelling of Megillat Esther, rendering assistance to the needy by sending mishloach manot, and partaking in the festive meal.

And, of course, the holiday is a much livelier, happier and more colourful celebration because of the exuberant participation of our young children.

The two artists whose drawings appear on this page eloquently prove the fact.

Eight-year-old Eli Minkowitz's stylized musical staff reminds us that it's our duty to be happy on this holiday, and that we might consider expressing that happiness by singing the song of Purim.

And the lyrics of that song are provided quite masterfully by another eight-year-old, Jeremy Molko. His cheerful "Happy Purim" scene not only captures the sense of celebration we are all obliged to feel, it also depicts the core components of the holiday and, in the process, the very essence of the holiday's larger meaning.

The story of Purim is, on its surface, the story of the physical rescue from annihilation of the Jews who lived in the 127 provinces ruled by Achashverosh, the king of Persia.

But below the surface, it is the story of singular courage and a collective, communal coming together.

In an insightful essay titled Purim - a Day of Community, by Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein, the head of Yeshivat Har Etzion, this central aspect of Megillat Esther is made forcefully and compellingly.

Cheap Trips to Israel

TORONTO — Jerusalem Fellowships is planning two trips to Israel in May and June for Canadian Jews ages 18 to 26. The trips, to be run by Aish HaTorah from May 18 to June 8 and from June 8 to 29, have 30 spots each and are open to people who have or haven't been to Israel before. Cost is $599. For details, call Rachel Zelunka at 905-764-1818 or e-mail rzelunka@aish.com.

Engel Wins Prize

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish detective writer Howard Engel, who suffered a stroke in 2001 that left him barely able to read, won the $20,000 Matt Cohen Award for lifetime achievement from the Writers' Trust of Canada. The honour came as the Toronto-based writer published Memory Book, his 11th crime novel featuring Jewish gumshoe Benny Cooperman. Engel's disability hasn't stopped him from crafting his novels. He already has another one in production and plans to write a memoir. "I'm hard-wired to writing. It's too late for me to change," he said.

Kiwi Cold Shoulder

AUCKLAND — A top Israeli general was barred from entering New Zealand. Maj.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, the deputy chief of military staff, called off a visit to Auckland on behalf of the United Israel Appeal this month after being refused a visa, the New Zealand Herald reported last week. Officials said the decision was part of a suspension of diplomatic ties with Israel after two suspected Israeli spies were jailed last year for trying to acquire a New Zealand passport fraudulently.

Glass Ceiling Broken?

NEW YORK — Twenty years after the Conservative movement began ordaining female rabbis, a New Jersey shul became the first Conservative one with more than 500 members to choose a woman for its top rabbinic post. The board of Congregation Beth El in South Orange voted this month to name Rabbi Francine Roston, 36, as the 575-family shul's senior rabbi. "It's groundbreaking... we have been talking about a glass ceiling, and she has broken that glass ceiling," said Rabbi Perry Raphael Rank, head of the Rabbinical Assembly, the movement's rabbinical arm.

Arson Suspected

GENEVA — Police suspect arson in March 13 fires at a shul and a Jewish-owned clothing store in Switzerland. The late-night fire at the shul in Lugano caused considerable damage. A fire later broke out at the nearby store. Local Jewish leaders called the fires acts of anti-Semitism.

Publisher Acquitted

PRAGUE — A Prague court acquitted a man charged with promoting Nazism by publishing a Czech-language version of Mein Kampf. Michal Zitko was cleared of charges March 10 for producing the version of Adolf Hitler's manifesto. The edition sold 90,000 copies in 2000 before police intervened.

C-Span Rebuffed

ATLANTA — Leading Holocaust historian Deborah Lipstadt refused to let C-SPAN tape a talk of hers last week at Harvard University because the U.S. cable network is airing a talk by Holocaust denier David Irving for what it told the Washington Post were reasons of "fairness and balance." Lipstadt, a Jewish studies professor at Emory University in Atlanta, said she was "not going to be the enabler." In 2000, Irving lost a lawsuit against Lipstadt and her publisher Penguin Books after she called him a Holocaust denier.

Shoah Grasp High

NEW YORK — Americans believe they have a good grasp of the Holocaust, a new poll has found. More than 80 per cent feel they know something or a great deal about it, and 62 per cent know that six million Jews died in the Shoah, according to a recent survey by the Israel Project. About 98 per cent of Americans believe the Holocaust took place, the advocacy group said, and 75 per cent of Americans with some knowledge of the Shoah have warm feelings toward Jews.

Park Named for PM

MEXICO CITY — A park in Mexico was named after Israel's first prime minister. Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom attended the March 13 opening of David Ben-Gurion Park in Pachuca, some 100 km north of Mexico City. Some 2,000 people attended the ceremony. The local government and Mexico's Jewish community financed the park.

Hebrew Schools Offer Rebate, Slash Tuition

MINNEAPOLIS — In two donor-funded efforts to attract more students, a Minneapolis Hebrew school is offering parents $5,000 to switch their kids from public school, while another in St. Paul has slashed tuition by almost 40 per cent.

Rabbi Binyomin Ginsberg, dean of Torah Academy, a nursery to Grade 8 day school in Minneapolis' St. Louis Park area, said the offer is even open to wealthy Jews, the Minneapolis Star Tribune reported. The idea is to attract parents who could afford tuition, which costs $5,000 to $7,950, but would rather spend the money elsewhere.

Rabbi Binyomin Ginsberg

Rabbi Ginsberg said the school, which has seen enrolment growth of three to five per cent over the past three years, already offers financial aid to 140 of its 227 students. Donors are sponsoring the rebate offer, he added.

Elsewhere in the area, Talmud Torah of St. Paul is slashing tuition for next year from $8,815 to $5,500, a drop of nearly 40 per cent. The move is also being financed by donors.

Principal Cindy Reich said that in addition to attracting parents who don't want to pay the higher tuition, the reduction is meant to stem a drop in enrolment at the day school, which stands at 130 students in kindergarten to Grade 6.

Ottawa announces $56 million anti-racism plan

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Just days after B'nai Brith Canada announced that anti-Semitic incidents hit a record high last year, the federal government marked the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination by unveiling this country's first cross-departmental action plan against racism.

Dubbed "A Canada For All," the plan, released Monday, calls for new initiatives across four federal ministries: heritage, labour, justice and immigration. Funding for the program – $56 million over five years – was earmarked in last month's federal budget.

Of special interest to the Jewish community will be the collection and standardization of data on hate-motivated crimes, identifying the needs of victims of hate crimes, and a renewed intention to fight hate on the Internet, including setting up a tip line to report Web-based hate.

"Canada is a world leader in the development of policies and laws to fight racism, but many Canadians still experience racism and discrimination in their daily lives," Raymond Chan, minister of state for multiculturalism, said at a press conference in Ottawa.

Chan was joined by Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, who promised a multi-point anti-racism plan last year after the firebombing of a library at United Talmud Torahs in Montreal, as well as by Labour and Housing Minister Joe Fontana and Immigration and Citizenship Minister Joe Volpe.

"The underlying message of this first-ever Action Plan Against Racism is clear: we seek a Canada in which there will be no sanctuary for hate and no refuge for racism," Cotler said.

The initiative is organized into six priority areas: assisting victims and groups vulnerable to racism and discrimination; developing strategies to promote diversity and combat racism; strengthening the role of civil society; strengthening regional and international co-operation; educating children and youth on diversity and anti-racism; and countering hate and bias.

Fontana praised the plan for attacking discrimination in the workplace and housing, while Volpe said it will educate Canadians on the contributions newcomers make.

The plan's new initiatives include:

• strengthening partnerships between federal institutions and ethnic groups to reflect Canadian diversity in federal policies, programs, and services.

• a "Law Enforcement and Aboriginal Diversity Network," or LEAD, in partnership with the RCMP and the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, that will provide police at all levels with training, support and information on how to improve services to Aboriginal and ethnic communities.

• Data collection on hate-motivated crime will standardize the collection of information on hate crimes, including anti-Semitic incidents.

• An examination of race-based issues in the justice system will look at whether race-based considerations are interfering with equality under the law, particularly in relation to perceived racial profiling in law enforcement and over-representation of certain groups in the justice system.

• Interventions for victims and perpetrators of hate crimes will identify the needs of victims and the best ways to respond to them, as well as "encourage interventions and sentences that ensure accountability for racially motivated offenders and encourage rehabilitations."

• Canada plans to sign the Council of Europe's protocol on Web-based racism, signalling Ottawa's intention to take part in the global fight against Internet hate. As well, a "Countering Internet-Based Hate Crime" program will establish a tip line for reporting online hate and work with Internet service providers.

• a "Welcoming Communities Strategy" will work with non-governmental organizations and the provinces to foster a better environment for immigrants.

• and a "Racism-Free Workplace Strategy" will develop new practices to eliminate discrimination in employment.

The plan is the result of consultations conducted with Canadian ethno-cultural groups after the 2001 United Nations anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, said Roy Bornmann, special assistant to Chan.

"[The plan] was a very grassroots attempt to gauge priorities. Over 10,000 people were surveyed," Bornmann said.

Among the more eye-opening results, he noted, was that half of all blacks in Canada said they had experienced some form of discrimination in the previous five years.

The long, frustrating road

From the editor's desk

Headlines across many newspapers of the land last week screamed words to the effect that Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas had achieved "a rare unity" among the 13 or so disparate armed factions of the Palestinian polity. He had managed to get the friendly warlords all to agree to something they called an extension of the current "calm."

To be sure, the arrangement was less than a ceasefire. And it was certainly not a laying down of arms by the terrorist thugs among the violent baker's dozen militia. But the outcome was plainly enough for the adoring western press to add numerous additional laurels to the heavy wreath they placed in January on the silver hair of the Palestinian leader.

But whatever the intra-Palestinian agreement represents, it certainly does not represent a fulfilment of the very first commitment of the much touted "road map" to peace and that is the keystone in achieving trusting, peaceful relations between Israelis and Palestinians: the dismantling of the terrorist infrastructure within Palestinian society.

That fact seems to have escaped western newspaper headline writers. Indeed, the Palestinian promise itself to dismantle the terror network seems to have escaped much of the western press. It is regarded now as something of a drag on progress especially because it is raised with such irritating frequency by those security-obsessed Israelis.

The Palestinians met in Egypt last week at the urging and hosting of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Immediately after the three-day conference, he called Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to hail the arrangement as a significant achievement toward peace.

The fact, if not the content, of the phone call by the Egyptian president cannot be disputed. It is a significant indication of the state of the relaxed relations between the Egyptian and Israeli leaders.

Sharon recognized this and he responded appropriately. So as not to embarrass Mubarak, he effusively thanked the Egyptian leader for his efforts with the Palestinians. But he did not inflate the announcement by the Palestinians into something larger than it actually was.

"It was a positive first step," Sharon said. But he added the key, indispensible point that "in order to move forward in the diplomatic process, the terrorist organizations will be unable to continue existing as armed organizations and certainly not as terrorist organizations."

Outgoing Israeli chief of staff Moshe Ya'alon added a further clarifying perspective on the Palestinian announcement. He warned that Israelis must not be be fooled by the current lull in terrorist attacks. A true and total end to violence, he said can only be achieved only if the Palestinian Authority disarms the extremists.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and PA President Mahmoud Abbas

Speaking to a forum of businesspeople from Haifa and the north the day after the Cairo conference concluded, he said the " [extremist] organizations want a period of calm, but they see it as a time to regroup and rearm before the fighting is resumed, without waiving their strategic goals.

"Until I see terror groups disarmed and [Abbas] fulfilling his commitments to having only one political entity and law, I cannot say this war is behind us."

All of Israel is wary.

How can Hamas, Islamic Jihad, the Al Aksa Martyrs Brigade, to name but the obvious high profile trilogy, who blithely, if fanatically, call for the destruction of Israel, be trusted?

Will the political process moderate their avowedly annihilationist aims?

Already, one Gaza-based militia that was not invited to the Cairo meetings, the Popular Resistance Committees, warned last week it would not abide by the Cairo agreement.

Spokesperson Mohamed Abdelal, said: "Saturday, March 19, is the end of the honeymoon we have given Israel. We reject completely the result of the Cairo conference since we did not participate. This is a clear intent by the Egyptians and the Palestinian Authority to ignore us."

Indeed even with the Cairo agreement seemingly in place, the violence against Israelis has not ended. On the weekend:

- Three Israeli soldiers and a policemen were wounded in a shooting attack near Ramallah on the weekend while on a hunt for stolen cars;
- Qassam missiles were fired from the Gaza Strip Sunday evening and landed in fields of Kibbutz Mefalsim southwest of Sderot;
- And a bomb trap was found Sunday night in Anabta near Tulkarm, whose handover Israel was negotiating with the PA.

Sharon has no illusions. He knows the road to peaceful co-existence between Israelis and Palestinians will be very long, very frustrating and fraught with danger.

What he does not know, yet, is if Abbas is the Palestinian leader with whom he can travel that road. —MBD

Dershowitz 'cautiously optimistic' about peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

I'm pro-Palestinian, lawyer says

Alan Dershowitz – the high-profile human rights lawyer, Harvard law school professor and author of The Case for Israel – says you don't have to be against Israel to be pro-Palestinian.

Speaking last week to a packed hall at the University of Toronto's Hart House and later at York University's Osgoode Hall Law School, Dershowitz said, "I think of myself as pro-Palestinian."

The statement did not sit well with audience members from U of T's Arab Students' Collective, who organized an "Israeli Apartheid Week" last month.

One student at the Monday afternoon lecture at U of T identified himself as "a 1948 Palestinian" whose grandfather came from Haifa, and told Dershowitz he found his talk "extremely painful." He asked him not to call himself pro-Palestinian again.

But Dershowitz justifies the label on the basis of his support for "a viable, democratic Palestinian state, the end of the occupation, the end of the settlements" and being in favour of the peace process.

He noted that Palestinian students at Harvard asked him to defend their right to fly the Palestinian flag at half mast on campus following the death of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, which he did, successfully. At the time, he said, he told the students he would also support the rights of anti-Arafat protesters to hand out leaflets respectfully, and they agreed to that.

His campus, he said, has been a model of civil discussion, but he was highly critical of Concordia University for cancelling a talk by Benjamin Netanyahu in 2002 after violent protests, and for not allowing one last fall by Ehud Barak. (It has since issued an invitation to Barak after upgrading security at a proposed on-campus site.) "A true university goes after those who threaten violence, not those who are threatened by it," Dershowitz said at York.

At times the dialogue with Arab students in Toronto became heated; security personnel pulled the microphone away from one student at U of T when his questions deteriorated into personal insult.

Dershowitz was repeatedly criticized by questioners for interrupting them, but he said, "If you make false statements, I will interrupt you. Silence is acquiescence."

He told a student who said he had witnessed killings by Israelis in a refugee camp in Nablus that Israel goes to "enormous efforts" to avoid killing civilians, but those efforts are undermined when terrorists hide among civilians in refugee camps.

"I think it fair to say no country facing comparable threats – including the United States and Canada – has been as solicitous of civilian life as Israel," Dershowitz said at York.

Criticism of Israel is warranted when Israel makes mistakes, he said. "What's unfair is singling out only Israel for criticism and only Palestinians for support."

He said he is cautiously optimistic about the chances for peace. Both Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Arafat's successor, Mahmoud Abbas, are ideologues, but they are also pragmatists who are prepared to compromise ideology for peace, he said.

Dershowitz believes Israel's security fence must be maintained, on whatever border is eventually determined. "Most parts of [the fence] are easily movable," he said. Erecting the fence, he explained was not a land grab, but rather an alternative to occupation, and to permitting terrorism to continue unabated. "A security barrier never killed anybody."

Extremists, including those on university campuses, are "the great enemy of peace," he said.

"Thank God Israel only has to make peace with former terrorists, and not with faculty of the Middle East department of Columbia University," he added, referring to allegations that professors in the department are intimidating pro-Israel students.

He railed against divestment campaigns that he said are aimed at turning "future leaders of North America into knee-jerk anti-Israel fanatics."

Israel saves more lives of non-Israelis than any other country in the world today, he said. "Great scientists are being boycotted."

The key point to resolving the Middle East dispute, Dershowitz said, is international recognition by governments, the United Nations and academics of Israel's "right to exist and thrive as a Jewish democracy."

He criticized human rights advocates who criticize Israel but ignore countries with more egregious problems. He said anyone who talks about Israel as an apartheid state without spending one hundred times more time talking about other countries is not a human rights activist.

Israeli Canadian won't return passport marked 'Jerusalem, Israel'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli Canadian Dan Drori is adamant.

He has no intention of complying with a federal government request to relinquish his passport inscribed with the placeline "Jerusalem, Isr" (Israel).

"There's nothing that would make me return it," said Drori, a 20-year-old first year student in computer management at York University.

He was referring to a recent decision by Passport Canada recently to retrieve Canadian passports marked in error with this notation.

Canada's policy is not to issue passports identifying Jerusalem as part of any country until its status is cleared up by Israel and its Arab neighbours in peace negotiations.

But such political matters are irrelevant to Drori, whose family settled in Jerusalem after immigrating from Yemen in 1948.

"Jerusalem, Israel, is where I was born. I'm going to keep this passport. It's not right. If someone was born in Toronto, it has to say Toronto, Canada, and not just Toronto. I was born in Jerusalem, Israel, and that's what my passport should say."

His mother is just as insistent.

"I'll fight for it, even if I have to speak to [Prime Minister] Paul Martin," said Kohava Drori, who immigrated to Canada with her family in April 1990.

In an interview last week from Ottawa, Dan Kingsbury, a Passport Canada spokesperson, suggested that Drori and about 100 other Canadians in his situation will not be prosecuted for keeping their erroneously marked passports.

"Passport Canada is encouraging passport holders with the Jerusalem-Israel inscription to rectify this administrative error," he said.

"Passports that do contain 'Jerusalem, Israel' as the country of origin will continue to be respected by the government of Canada."

The country of origin in Kohava Drori's passport, and that of her daughter Shirli, lists Jerusalem as their birthplace. But the placeline in her husband Uri Arie's passport is Naharia, Israel.

Dan Drori, born in Jerusalem on Feb. 12, 1985, was issued passport number VK737305 on Dec. 16, 2000. He picked it up at Passport Canada's North York office at 4900 Yonge St.

Drori has used his passport several times, including on three trips to Israel, without incident.

But on March 11, he received a phone call from an official at Passport Canada in North York.

'Extremely shocked' passport had to be recalled

When she informed him his passport had to be recalled, he was "extremely shocked" and "dumbfounded."

He consulted his older brother, Tal, who phoned the Canadian Jewish Congress in Toronto for assistance. But Congress was of no help, his mother said.

Tal also called the Passport Canada official in North York. She told him the placeline in his passport had to be politically neutral, in conformity with Canada's policy on Jerusalem.

In a second call, the official said that if Drori turned in his passport, he would get a new one without cost and be compensated for all travelling expenses.

At this point, his mother intervened. She said her son would not appear at Passport Canada's office to apply for a new passport.

In addition, Mrs. Drori contacted Israel's consulate in Toronto, only to be told it was an issue out of its jurisdiction.

Two days later, Drori received a letter from Passport Canada's chief operating officer, N.C. Wise.

"A recent quality audit of your file indicates that an administrative error regarding the place of birth was made during the processing of the passport. The Passport Office will issue you a replacement passport valid for five years, free of charge," the letter noted.

Drori would be reimbursed for the cost of new passport photos and out-of-pocket expenses on presentation of receipts, Wise added.

"We sincerely apologize for any inconvenience that this may cause," the letter ended.

The passport issue came up in the first place after a 17-year old Toronto student born in Jerusalem, Eliyahu Yehoshua Veffer, and B'nai Brith Canada jointly filed a lawsuit on Jan. 26 seeking a judicial review of Canada's passport policy.

Veffer, a grade 11 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, is a dual Canadian and Israeli citizen.

He said Canada's refusal to recognize Israel as his birthplace in his passport is an insult to his Israeli nationality.

Two weeks ago, Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, charged that Canada's decision to recall passports with the "Jerusalem, Isr." designation was clearly political rather than purely administrative.

In a related development, the Canadian Arab Federation has reportedly retained a lawyer to argue the case that Arab Canadians whose birthplace was Jerusalem should be able to include the line "Jerusalem, Palestine" in their passports.

The CAF did not return a call for comment.

Police will not lay charges against Elmasry

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Police will not lay hate charges against a national Islamic leader who said last autumn that Israeli civilians are legitimate targets of suicide attacks.

Halton Regional Police announced earlier this month that the remarks of Mohamed Elmasry, president of the Canadian Islamic Congress, made last Oct. 19 on the Michael Coren Show, were not a crime.

A panellist on the show, Elmasry triggered a storm of controversy when he said that all Israelis over 18 are part of the army and thus legitimate targets of terror.

He later apologized, saying that failing to articulate his belief that killing civilians is "an immoral act of the worst kind" was "the biggest mistake in my 30 years of public life."

In a March 11 news release, Halton Regional Police said their investigation concluded that while Elmasry's comments could be considered "distasteful to many," they "do not constitute a criminal offence."

The force said the comments, which Elmasry uttered at the Burlington, Ont., studios of Crossroads Television System, where the show is taped, "were made during a free-flowing discussion between subject-matter experts who were encouraged to express their opinions openly on a topic of significant public interest. As a result, the police have determined that charges will not be pursued."

Comments called 'distasteful to many'

However, police in Kitchener-Waterloo, where Elmasry works and lives, say that a mass e-mailing he sent out on March 4, in which he alleges that he was offered police protection from a Jewish protest, is untrue.

In the lengthy message, titled "When Jews Target a Canadian Muslim," Elmasry, who is also a professor of engineering at the University of Waterloo, said that a "senior local police officer" informed him "in person" on Oct. 28 of an imminent protest by two busloads of militant Jewish Defence League members.

"I had no idea that I had been targeted by the JDL," he wrote, "so I thanked the officer, took his cellphone number, and prayed for the protection of myself, my family and the police officers who would be assigned to protect me."

Elmasry then quotes the officer as saying: "We will give you police protection… You are a man of honour. You have our support."

Those statements "are absolutely not accurate," Staff Sgt. Bryan Larkin of the Waterloo Regional Police Service told The CJN.

"One of our officers did approach Mr. Elmasry and had a conversation with him about the potential for harm. [But] at no time did we offer him special security attention."

Larkin said local police had "a concern about public disorder" that could arise from the planned JDL protest, and "the nature of the visit [to Elmasry] was to mitigate the potential for danger," not to offer him special protection, which is "not a standard procedure."

Elmasry did not return The CJN's calls for comment.

The Jewish Defence League's Canadian arm, which now calls itself the United Israel Action Committee, had planned to take two busloads of people from Toronto to the offices of the Islamic Congress in Kitchener-Waterloo to protest Elmasry's televised remarks.

But the Oct. 31 event fizzled when not enough protesters showed up.

"We had about 35 people confirmed," said organizer Meir Halevi, former director of the Canadian arm of the JDL."It wasn't enough. I had hoped to have 100. I didn't want to go if I didn't have the people."

He said the protest was to be peaceful, to let Elmasry "know that Jews aren't afraid to confront someone who advocates the murder of Jews."

In his e-mailing, Elmasry also took swipes at Jewish communal groups for their reaction to his televised remarks.

He charged that after the show, Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada "circulated a truncated version of the interview transcript, in which one unqualified answer of mine to one question was taken totally out of context; it also ignored comments by a Jewish guest on the same show who happened to be an official of B'nai Brith Canada."

(The B'nai Brith official, Adam Aptowitzer, resigned his lay position as a result of comments he made on the show supporting a state's use of terror to protect its citizens.)

When Jewish groups were unsatisfied with his apology, Elmasry said, they "began putting pressure on my university to fire me" and proceeded to "ramp up" that pressure when "a Toronto Jewish businessman threatened to withdraw his financial support for a chair of Jewish studies."

In a statement, B'nai Brith Canada called for a "full review" of the decision not to charge Elmasry, because it said there are "pressing questions [which] demand urgent clarification."

'Gather together all the Jews'

Rav Lichtenstein examines the significance of the instruction by Esther to Mordechai to "go and gather together all the Jews" that they might fast for her safety and for the success of her plan to intercede with the king on behalf of her people.

Rav Lichtenstein brilliantly contrasts Esther's instructions to Mordechai with the earlier description of the hedonistic, self-indulgent winefest the king arranged for the people of Shushan, presumably including some Jews as well, that "the officers of his house should fulfil the will of each individual man."

This description, Rav Lichtenstein points out, embodies two principles, namely radical individualism and the glorification of the will. "What we have here… seeks not what is good or desirable for the community as a whole, but only for itself, for its own desires and cravings."

This culture of self-serving profligacy, Rav Lichtenstein demonstrates, is the moral backdrop for the leadership, decision-making and collective response that result in communal rescue.

"Go and gather all the Jews" is more than a command to assemble… In order that this "scattered and dispersed nation" will be able to cry out, they must first be formed into a "community." All the Jews scattered throughout the length and breadth of Achashverosh's empire must be gathered together – not just as a technical or formal act, but with a view to creating "togetherness."

The creation of the community, Rav Lichtenstein states later in the essay was "to effect a moral revolution." That moral revolution was the instrument of the Jewish community's literal salvation, and of course, it was and is the abject antithesis of the societal ethos that celebrates "radical individualism and the glorification of the will."

In his playful picture, eight-year-old Jeremy Molko has drawn for us some of the symbols of a society that is concerned with "what is good or desirable for the community as a whole," to use Rav Lichtenstein's words.

The drawing depicts 10 individuals, diverse in age and varied in costume, taking part in the celebration. But the number itself – 10 – is the very embodiment of the notion of community in Jewish tradition. Moreover, the woman waving the ra'ashan (noisemaker) suggests, they are listening to the story of the megillah, whose key lesson, we have learned, is that the only way to truly help one another is to "gather together."

The presence of the UJA pushke alongside the mishloah manah basket of goodies on the table strongly suggest that our eight-year-old artist has understood this lesson very well.

It falls to us, the older generation, to show by our behaviour that we know how to sing a song of Purim, and that we too understand the lesson of Purim as well as our children do. Chag samayach.

Israeli government acting illegally

In response to your editorial "Legitimate debate" (March 10), I would like to say that the government of Israel has acted with astonishing irresponsibility regarding the security of its citizens, both with regard to the "disengagement" (a euphemism for "surrender") and in agreeing to the Oslo accords. All non-political active security experts warn that Israeli surrender of Gaza places Israel in further existential danger. Thus the case can be made that the government of Israel is acting illegally in abandoning this land and its residents. Furthermore, soldiers have a right, albeit less of one than other citizens, to protest and to disobey their orders where warranted. In light of the danger "disengagement" presents, it may even be incumbent upon soldiers to disobey a government that has betrayed its people by facilitating the success of the Arab terror movements.

Will they be obstacles or examples?

In his column "Withdrawing from land legitimately won" (CJN, March 3), Gil Troy says that right-wingers should honour democracy in accepting the Israeli government's decisions peacefully. Potentially of greater significance is how Jews who place the Torah before democracy will behave. We've all seen how Muslim fundamentalists bring disrepute both to their religion and religion in general through indiscriminate suicide bombings. Will our rabbis and their followers serve as positive examples for the Jewish religion? Can religious Jews and Muslims show us the way to peace, or will they be the main obstacles?

If you want a say, make aliyah

A large delegation of American Jews recently arrived in Israel to show their support for the Jewish residents of the Gaza Strip and to rally against the disengagement plan. They toured many settlements that are scheduled to be evacuated, and many of them spoke on camera, putting forth messages of support and hope, but also of dissent. They pledged to return in July, just in time for the scheduled implementation of the withdrawal, in order to "stand strong against the evacuation."

While I certainly appreciate their love for Israel, it must be made clear that they have no right to presume that they know what is best for Israel's domestic security. They are not the ones who have spent the last four years living with the constant threat of terror.

If this delegation feels so strongly that they have the right to take part in Israel's democratic process and have a say in what is best for Israel's security, they are wrong. First they must make aliyah and join us, here, as citizens.

Sixty-seven to 70 per cent of Israelis support Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan. They are the ones who continue to send their children to fight, and sometimes die, in Gaza so that the Kissufim Highway will be safe for the busloads of Americans who visit these Gaza settlements.

Zundel's lawyer replies

While many people undoubtedly will, and do "passionately applaud" the deportation of Ernst Zundel for speaking impermissible thoughts (Letter, CJN, March 10), it is the judicial process that has been disgraced in this exercise.

For having allowed the chopping down of many of the underpinnings of liberal democracy and the rule of law (including basic principles such as open public justice and the ability to confront one's accuser) in order to squash a disagreeable voice, we should be profoundly embarrassed. For my part, I do not feel disgrace, but sadness at the futility of my efforts.

If letter writer Bert Raphael were involved in a court case in which the other side repeatedly met with the judge to present evidence and make arguments in the absence of him and his lawyer, would he feel that justice was served by the judge's later decision against him? Assuming his answer is "no," why is it okay because it was Zundel instead of him? Do we have equal justice for all, or for all except those Raphael dislikes, or for all except those I dislike, or for all except Zundel?

Tsunami aid still needed

I am a doctor from Toronto who has recently returned from Sri Lanka, where I treated medical problems and delivered medications, infant formula and toys to tsunami survivors.

People in fishing villages there are unable to provide food for their families because their boats have been destroyed. In one of the hundreds of destroyed fishing villages, we bought fibreglass and netting and took it to a moulding shop, where a fishing boat for the village was built. In order to do this, I literally had to empty my pockets.

I am trying to gather funds for more fishing boats, to be provided during my next trip to Sri Lanka in April or May. I am trying to work with a local aid agency to be able to grant charitable donation receipts to donors.

Time is of the essence. People need help now.

Fighting iron with irony

By RABBI AVI SHAFRAN

On a beautiful, clear night in 1924 at Landsberg am Lech, where he was imprisoned by the Bavarian government, Adolf Hitler remarked to Rudolf Hess: "You know, it's only the moon I hate. For it is something dead and terrible and inhuman… It is as if there still lives in the moon a part of the terror it once sent down to earth… I hate it!"

A chill accompanied my first encounter with that quote, because the Jewish religious tradition sees the ever-rejuvenating, shining disk of the moon as a symbol of the Jewish people. Indeed, the very first commandment we Jews were given as a people, while still awaiting the Exodus in Egypt, was to use the moon to identify ourselves through our calendar. The moon Hitler feared.

There are other odd things about Hitler that are connected to ancient Jewish tradition, things such as his fondness for ravens, in Jewish lore associated with cruelty: he went so far as to issue special orders protecting the birds. And his fascination with the art of Franz von Stuck (the artist who had the "greatest impact" on his life, he once said), whose major themes are snakes and sinister women. In the Jewish mystical tradition, snakes evoke evil and its embodiment, Amalek, whose purpose was to destroy the Israelites, and there are hints of an antithetical relationship between the irredeemable wickedness of Amalek and women.

And then there is the matter of the most loathsome of Hitler's henchmen, Julius Streicher, the editor of Der Sturmer, the premier journal of Jew-baiting.

At its peak in 1938, print runs of Streicher's vile tabloid ran as high as two million. A typical offering included a close-up of the face of a deformed Jew above the legend "The Scum of Humanity: This Jew says that he is a member of [God's] chosen people." Another displayed a cartoon of a vampire bat with a grotesquely exaggerated nose and a Jewish star on its chest. In yet another, a Jewish butcher was depicted snidely dropping a rat into his meat grinder and, elsewhere in the issue, the punctured necks of handsome German youths were shown bleeding into a bowl held by a Jew more gargoyle than human.

In 1935, speaking to a closed meeting of a Nazi student organization, Streicher, displaying an unarguably Amalekian approach, declared: "All our struggles are in vain if the battle against the Jews is not fought to the finish. It is not enough to get the Jews out of Germany. No, they must be destroyed throughout the entire world so that humanity will be free of them."

The suspicion that in Streicher's blind, baseless, and absolute hatred of the Jews lay the legacy of Amalek makes the story of his capture and death nothing short of chilling.

Purim is the only Jewish holiday that celebrates the defeat of an Amalekite, Haman. Even a passing familiarity with the Purim story is sufficient to know that the downfall of its villain is saturated with what seem to be chance ironies: he turns up at the wrong place at the wrong time, and all that he so carefully plans eventually backfires on him in an almost comical way – a theme The Book of Esther characterizes with the words "v'nahafoch hu" ("and it was turned upside down").

Such "chance" happenings are the very hallmark, of Amalek's defeat – a fact reflected in the "casting of lots" from which Purim takes its name. Chance, the Book of Esther teaches us, is an illusion. God is in charge. Amalek may fight with iron but he is defeated with irony.

As was Streicher. In the days after Germany's final defeat, an American major, Henry Plitt, received a tip about a high-ranking Nazi living in an Austrian town. He accosted a short, bearded artist, who he though might be SS Chief Heinrich Himmler, and asked him his name.

"Joseph Sailer," came the reply from the man, who was painting a canvas on an easel.

Plitt later recounted: "I don't know why I said [it, but] I said, 'And what about Julius Streicher?'"

"Ja, der bin ich," the man with the paintbrush responded. "Yes, that is me."

When Plitt brought his serendipitous catch to the town of Berchtesgaden, he later recounted, a reporter told him that he had "killed the greatest story of the war." When he asked how, the reporter responded: "Can you imagine if a guy named Cohen or Goldberg or Levy had captured this arch-anti-Semite, what a great story it would be?"

Jonah Prussky, grade 5

The depiction of Haman has always captured our children's imagination. His negative qualities are plainly manifested in Jonah Prussky's image of him. At lower left, is a rendering by Devorah Kaufman of the hanging of Haman and his ten sons.

Plitt recalled telling the reporter: "I'm Jewish," and "that's when the microphones came into my face and the cameras started clicking."

Another irony in Streicher's life involved the fate of his considerable estate. As reported in Stars and Stripes in late 1945, his considerable possessions were converted to cash and used to create an agricultural training school for Jews intending to settle in Palestine. Just as Haman's riches, as recorded in the Book of Esther, were bestowed upon his nemesis Mordechai.

There is a good deal more of interest in the life of Julius Streicher to associate him with Jewish traditions about Amalek. But one of the most shocking narratives about him is the one concerning his death. Streicher was of one of the Nazis tried, convicted and hanged at Nuremberg in 1946.

During the trial, Streicher remained disgustingly true to form. When the prosecution showed a film of the concentration camps as they had been found by the Allies, a spotlight was left on the defendants' box for security reasons. Many present preferred to watch the defendants' reactions rather than the mounds of bodies, matchstick limbs and common graves. Few of the defendants could bear to watch the film for long. Goering seemed calm at first, but eventually began to nervously wipe his sweaty palms. Schacht turned away. Ribbentrop buried his face in his hands. Keitel wiped his reddened eyes with a handkerchief. Only Streicher leaned forward throughout, looking anxiously at the film and excitedly nodding his head.

While no proof was found that Streicher had ever killed a Jew by his own hand, the tribunal nevertheless decided that his clear-cut incitement of others to the task constituted the act of a war criminal, and he was sentenced, along with 10 other defendants, to hang.

And hang he did. But not before taking the opportunity to share a few final words with the journalists present at the gallows. "Heil Hitler. Now I go to God," he announced. And then, just before the trap sprang open, he blurted out most clearly: "Purim Feast 1946!" – an odd thing to say in any event, but especially so on an October morning.

The "Amalek irony" of the Nuremberg executions doesn't end there, either. The Book of Esther recounts how Haman's 10 sons were hanged in Shushan. An 11th child, a daughter, committed suicide earlier, according to an account in the Talmud. At Nuremberg, while 11 men were condemned to execution by hanging, only 10 were actually hanged. The 11th, the foppish, effeminate Goering, died in his cell only hours before the execution; he had crushed a hidden cyanide capsule between his teeth.

Something even more striking was noted by the late Belzer Rebbe. In scrolls of the Book of Esther, the names of the 10 sons of Haman are unusually prominent, and they are written in two parallel columns, a highly unusual configuration. Odder still is the fact that three letters in the list, following an unexplained halachic tradition, are written very small, and one very large. The large letter is the Hebrew character for the number six (Hebrew letters all have numeric values); the small letters, added together, yield the number 707.

If the large letter is taken to refer to the millennium and 707 to the year in the millennium, something fascinating emerges. According to Jewish reckoning, the present year is 5765. The year 5707 – the 707th year in the sixth millennium – was the year we know as 1946, when 10 sworn enemies of the Jewish people were hanged in Nuremberg, just as 10 others had been in Shushan more than 2,000 years earlier.

The Book of Esther, (9:13), moreover, refers to the hanging of Haman's sons in the future tense, after the event had been recounted, presaging, it might seem, some hanging yet to happen.

To believing Jews, the Holocaust was the tip of an unimaginable iceberg of evil, stretching far and deep into the past even as one of its ugly tips punctured the relative peace of the modern world.

And so, as we prepare to celebrate Purim and the downfall of the Amalekite Haman, especially these days, when Jew-hatred has once again made itself manifest in the world, we would do well to ponder that the evil he represents may have been defeated at times throughout history but it has not yet been vanquished.

Opinions

Averting the implosion

I often think of the Yiddish saying "Don't rely on miracles – recite Psalms" when I sit on a bus in Jerusalem. Using public transport is still a risky business in Israel. Even now, when the situation seems to have eased somewhat, we are not out of danger. One rides on buses on faith fuelled by necessity more than out of prudence founded on confidence.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Some passengers manifest their faith by reciting Psalms. I've never yet boarded a bus without spotting such people. They may know that a security guard is riding with them and that another is waiting at the bus stop, but human safety also requires divine intervention. In case miracles aren't enough, they recite Psalms.

In Jerusalem, religion is at the centre of life. For me, religion is the main reason for being in the city and not in some other place in Israel. For in Jerusalem, it seems, heaven and earth meet, even in the shadow of terrorists. But we pay a price for the privilege.

For religion, perhaps because it is so central, is also the city's greatest source of tension and trouble. Not only do Muslim terrorists say that they act in the name of Allah, but potential Jewish terrorists also insist they are doing God's work. Some observers fear that, in the long run, religious divisions between Jews may turn out to be more lethal than ethnic and political enmity between Jews and Arabs.

Should the latter subside, the former is bound to come even more to the fore. Zionism came into being as a challenge to Orthodox Judaism. Instead of urging Jews to observe the commandments and wait for the Messiah, Zionists called on Jews to throw off the shackles of observance and build a Jewish homeland, "walking toward the Messiah." For all the religiosity in its capital, the State of Israel is a triumph of secularism and thus an affront to the ultra-Orthodox.

In their neighbourhoods, the invective against the Zionist state continues to be palpable. At a recent rally sponsored by the messianic wing of the Lubavitch movement, some speeches may have amounted to incitement against Israel's democratically elected government.

Some fear that neither miracles nor Psalms will be enough to avert the long-anticipated internal struggle. Hence the call for cultivating a sane religious centre that transcends secularism and fundamentalism, and promotes a "live and let live" approach to Jewish life. We liberals call it pluralism.

Once again, the contribution of the Diaspora is vital. Jews in the West have learned to adjust to modernity, irrespective of where they themselves stand religiously, by living in pluralistic societies. They must bring this their experience to Israel to save the country from a potentially lethal implosion.

'Shop' for your perfect match online

When the first signs of the reality television craze appeared, I had the opportunity to study the phenomenon critically in my Grade 12 English media class. I have been skeptical of these shows ever since. But my roommates and many of my friends devotedly watch to see which contestant will prove most talented, beautiful or brave, and they love to follow the personal stories televised on reality makeover, birth and wedding shows. Every so often, one of them will relate to me, sometimes after wiping away a tear or two, the details of the engagement and marriage of a couple who met on the Internet through a Jewish dating website.

Jessica Apter in Vancouver

Despite the Internet dating success stories like the ones featured on The Learning Channel's A Wedding Story, there is a surprising stigma surrounding the practice. Most of my friends have surfed through websites like jdate.com or gayjews.net, but few of us are brave enough to post a picture and a profile of our own. It might be that we are worried nobody will write to us, or perhaps that the wrong person will. Some of us associate online dating with desperation, and don't want our friends to see that we've resorted to a personal ad. But single Jewish people of all ages should get rid of these insecurities and get online.

I am definitely one of the girls who has been guilty of complaining about the lack of opportunities to meet a nice Jewish boy in Vancouver, and many of my male friends whine about being single too. As soon as each of us sets up an account online, we will all know where to find each other.

As students, this is the time that many of us find ourselves in new communities in new cities looking to meet new people. And anyone who has a profile posted wants to meet us too. There is no other technology or method of meeting people that lets someone approach the person he or she wants to meet most with the qualities they look for most.

In other words, online dating lets you window shop. We are all picky when it comes to certain characteristics. For example, I know that my exclusive standards when it comes to appreciation of and taste in music are limiting; many people don't understand why I should care about that or what role music plays in a relationship.

But it matters to me, and online dating services allow us all to browse according to specific criteria and weed out the bachelors and bachelorettes that we don't like before we even meet them. Each person's favourite foods, the sports he or she is best at, and a description of what he or she looks for in a perfect match are all posted in front of you.

As students with tons of responsibilities and deadlines, I know that my friends would love to discover that finding the perfect boy could be easier and less time consuming than doing their homework. Instead of having to plan ahead, get dressed up, find the right group of single Jewish friends to go out with and hope to select the perfect location, busy students can "shop" from the comfort of our own homes, in pajamas, alone or with friends and even at any time of the day or night. Once individuals find someone they are interested in or attracted to, they can chat online and choose whether or not to take the next step and meet in person.

I do not watch very much reality television, but I am a fan of the series Sex And The City. In six seasons, Carrie Bradshaw, the New York City columnist played by actress Sarah Jessica Parker on the show, wrote about almost every imaginable aspect of sex and dating – except online romance. When I was younger, my bubbie always insisted that I looked like Parker, and since I began writing this column, the parallels have been drawn again and again. But while online dating was never much of an issue for Bradshaw, it is certainly relevant in the relatively small and spread out dating pool in the Jewish community of Vancouver. And if you're single and live here, I know lots of great guys and girls that you can meet online – so sign up!

Learning from Emil Fackenheim

In "Ethics After the Holocaust," one of my contemporary studies courses, I recently gave a seminar on the thought of the late Emil Fackenheim, the well-known Canadian Jewish philosopher and theologian who had a distinguished career at the University of Toronto and Hebrew University.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Fackenheim was known for his powerful reading of the Holocaust as a moment of rupture, not only in Jewish ritual and culture, but, more broadly, in the discipline of philosophy as a whole. He argued that the Holocaust ended Galut (Diaspora) Judaism, saying the tradition that began with the destruction of the Temple and the exile of the Jewish people simply could not continue after Auschwitz. Auschwitz ruptured this history, and Fackenheim argued that we can't practise Judaism today without recognizing the Shoah's impact on our every encounter with it.

Also essential to Fackenheim's position is the centrality of Israel. After the Holocaust, Israel is Judaism's testimony to the world of our very survival, and it's an expression of Fackenheim's 614th commandment: the demand that Hitler not be handed a posthumous victory, and that every Jew is obliged to ensure the survival of the Jewish people.

And so I stood before my class, explaining the elements of Jewish tradition that were essential to Fackenheim's thought, and the development of Jewish history from the destruction of the Temple to the Shoah. I also spoke about the role of Israel for Fackenheim and the centrality it holds in the post-Holocaust Jewish world.

After my seminar ended, a lively discussion ensued, as everyone attempted to work out their questions about Fackenheim. And then it happened. One person in the class raised his hand and asked how anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism could be distinguished when, at least as Fackenheim seemed to argue, Israel is inexorably linked to post-Holocaust Judaism.

I sat completely stunned. Though I should have foreseen, given the subject matter of my seminar, that the issue of Israeli politics would surface in some way, somehow I felt completely caught off-guard.

I am a passionate Zionist, but for some reason, when it comes to the classroom setting, I find myself hesitant to appeal to my hasbara training and powerfully argue my position.

In this particular instance, my mind was so wrapped up in thoughts of the Holocaust that I could not believe the discussion had quickly warped into one about Israel as a colonialist oppressor.

Reading Fackenheim, it is easy to understand Israel as part of a new moment emerging from a thousand-year history of exile and displacement. In the wake of the Holocaust, I see Israel as the culmination of the efforts of individuals who had nothing. It's the product of a people deprived of every right, who against all odds were able to build a state and make a desert bloom.

Though I am the first to express contempt for the fundamentalist right-wing politics that often hijack Israel's middle ground, and though I am in favour of the Gaza pullout and feel that the illegal outposts in the West Bank should have been dismantled long ago, I can't accept arguments that question Israel's right to exist.

I also don't understand why right-wing factions – which, though vociferous, do not represent the Israeli mainstream, let alone the ruling government – are taken to be the voice of Israel. And I don't understand how a people who were nearly decimated have suddenly come to be seen as an oppressive force deserving of the world's condemnation.

When I think about what was left of the Jewish people in 1945 and what has since transpired, my mind is barely able to believe or understand it.

Perhaps it's because I still see the potential for another Shoah and thus realize that the existence of Israel is an absolute imperative. Or perhaps it's because I can't understand how it is that we have come to be seen as the perpetrator when we haven't ceased to be the victim.

The Kirshner File

World assails Syria's presence in Lebanon

Syria, at long last, is withdrawing its remaining 14,000 troops from Lebanon. Flashing victory signs and waving rifles, Syrian soldiers recently evacuated bases in northern and central Lebanon. Some 6,000 Syrians, soldiers and intelligence officers, are still in Lebanon, but according to Syria's president, Bashar Assad, the remnants will be gone by May, before Lebanon's parliamentary elections.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

It has taken years for Syria to reach this juncture. On at least three occasions, Syria reneged on pledges to pull out of Lebanon, claiming that its army was a guarantor of stability. Nevertheless, Syria has gradually reduced its garrison there. Forty thousand Syrian troops were dispatched to Lebanon when Syria intervened in its second civil war in 1976. But that does not mean Syria will voluntarily relinquish its position in Lebanon. If anything, Syria will continue to try to dominate its weaker neighbour.

Syria's decision to withdraw from Lebanon was a function of both domestic Lebanese politics and intense international pressure, spearheaded by the United States and France.

The tipping point was the Feb. 14 assassination of Rafik Hariri, a former Lebanese prime minister who had grown disenchanted with Syria's iron grip on Lebanon. Many Lebanese, particularly Christians, blamed the Syrians for Hariri's murder. Syria, of course, stoutly denied the accusation.

Omar Karami

After Hariri's death, 40 opposition parliamentarians called for an "uprising for independence." And in unprecedented demonstrations, Lebanese citizens took to the streets with placards demanding Syria's full and immediate withdrawal and the government's resignation. As a result, Omar Karami, the pro-Syrian prime minister, resigned. Syria was shaken by the turmoil, but these developments did not really sink in until Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Russia, the European Union, the United States and United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan lent support for a pullout.

Although it is being forced out of Lebanon, Syria's political clout in that ethnically fragmented country remains strong. On March 8, Hezbollah, the militant Lebanese Shiite movement backed by Syria and Iran, organized a massive pro-Syrian rally in Beirut.

Emboldened by the massive turnout, 71 out of 126 deputies in parliament reinstated Karami as prime minister, deepening Lebanon's crisis. But last week, the opposition, consisting largely of Christians, Druze and Sunni Muslims, staged a still larger demonstration.

Syria is leaving Lebanon with great reluctance because Damascus regards Lebanon as an integral part of Greater Syria. Until the end of World War I, Greater Syria was an Ottoman domain. But with the collapse of the Ottoman Empire in 1918, France received League of Nations mandates in Syria and Lebanon. France had already earmarked chunks of Greater Syria for Lebanon, which won its independence in 1943. Never reconciling itself to an independent Lebanese state, Syria neither established formal diplomatic relations nor exchanged ambassadors with Lebanon.

Not surprisingly, Syria constantly meddled in Lebanon's internal affairs. Indeed, one of the causes of the 1958 Lebanese civil war was Syria's obsessive need to influence events in Beirut. The Syrians got another opportunity to poke their fingers into the Lebanese pie when mounting tensions between Muslims and Christians erupted into civil war in the spring of 1975.

At the invitation of the besieged but influential Christian minority, the Syrian army entered Lebanon in full force. But shortly after Christian leader Bashir Gemayel formed a clandestine relationship with Israel, Syria abruptly switched course and aligned itself with the Muslims and the Palestinians.

The United States, working on the assumption that Damascus could calm the situation, tacitly tolerated Syria's intervention. Through U.S. mediation, Israel and Syria reached an informal "red lines" agreement in which both sides recognized each other's security interests in Lebanon.

Israel accepted Syria's fait accompli in Lebanon, but with three major provisos: limitations on the placement of Syrian surface-to-air missiles, a ban on the flight of Syrian aircraft, and a promise by Syria to keep its army far from Israel's border with Lebanon.

The "red lines" agreement enabled Israel to establish a security zone in southern Lebanon after Operation Litani, Israel's first invasion of Lebanon in March 1978. The accord crumbled in the wake of Israel's second invasion of Lebanon, Operation Peace for Galilee, in June 1982. Once the dust settled, the agreement was revived, only to be periodically battered by skirmishes between Israel and Syria.

Meanwhile, Syria got down to the business of pacifying Lebanon. The Syrians stabilized it by crushing the embers of Christian resistance to the new political order, which essentially left the Muslims in charge.

The 1989 Taif accord, which was ratified in Saudi Arabia, officially ended the Lebanese civil war. But Taif also legitimized Syria's occupation of Lebanon, placed Lebanon within the Syrian orbit and mandated Syria to deploy its forces to the Bekaa Valley and negotiate further withdrawals with the compliant Lebanese government.

Taif, however, was rejected by Michel Aoun, the Christian Lebanese prime minister, and fighting resumed. Aoun was subdued and sent packing into exile. With Aoun conveniently out of the way, Syria imposed its will on Lebanon in 1991 through two accords: the Treaty of Brotherhood, Co-operation and Coordination, and the Defence and Security Agreement.

Syrian soldier leaves a base in Lebanon

During this period, Syria's surrogate in Lebanon, Hezbollah – which planned and carried out devastating attacks that destroyed the American embassy in Beirut and killed 241 marines in their barracks in the Lebanese capital – stepped up a guerrilla war against Israel in southern Lebanon.

In exchange for Syria's participation in the 1991 Gulf War, the United States tacitly supported the new arrangements in Lebanon, which reduced it to a Syrian protectorate.

Syria's hegemony in Lebanon, the Pax Syriana, has been compared to the Soviet Union's sway over eastern Europe following World War II. To say that Syria has exploited Lebanon would be an understatement. Syria has dumped cheap goods and produce into Lebanon and thereby undercut Lebanese industrialists and farmers. And remittances from an estimated one million Syrian workers in Lebanon have enriched Syria as well. Smuggling and money laundering operations have been of benefit to Syria, too.

To ensure that its hegemony in Lebanon goes unchallenged, Syria has intimidated or killed Lebanese dissidents and crassly manipulated the political system. Last September, for example, Lebanese parliamentarians in Syria's pocket amended the constitution and extended the term of President Emile Lahoud, a Syrian puppet.

This blatant manoeuvre, which caused widespread indignation and resentment throughout Lebanon and prompted Hariri to resign, occurred as the United Nations Security Council passed Resolution 1559.

Clearly aimed at Syria, it called for the withdrawal of foreign forces from Lebanon, the disbanding and disarming of Lebanese (Hezbollah) and non-Lebanese (Iran's Revolutionary Guards) militias, and the restoration of Lebanon's independence. It was not the first time the UN had passed such a resolution. It will be recalled that Syria (and Israel) blatantly ignored Resolution 520, passed in 1982.

Until Hariri's murder, Syria could safely turn a blind eye to these resolutions. In a policy statement last October, the Syrian foreign ministry insisted that Syria's military presence in Lebanon was necessary. In concert with this announcement, Assad suggested that a Syrian withdrawal would produce chaos.

Toeing the same line, the Lebanese foreign ministry declared that Syria would only withdraw "when the time is right." In addition, Lahoud said that Lebanon would preserve its alliance with Syria and not enter into separate peace negotiations with Israel.

Popular outrage over Syria's role in Lebanon has been building incrementally. Several years ago, the editor of the mass-circulation Beirut daily An-Nahar called for a speedy Syrian withdrawal. In the wake of his bombshell, thousands of university students demonstrated on behalf of this objective.

It may well be that Israel's unilateral pullout from Lebanon in May 2000 was a source of encouragement. Yet, ironically, Israel is split down the middle on the issue today. Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom favours a Syrian pullback. But Israel's outgoing chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, fears that the departure of Syria's troops would embolden Hezbollah to escalate its war with Israel in the disputed Shabaa Farms area.

Parents explore possibilities

Options in Jewish Education

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

It was a powerful reflection of what is on the minds of many parents these days - Jewish education. Close to 200 parents recently attended Jewish Options in Education, an interactive workshop offering them an opportunity to explore the possibility of Jewish education for their children. The program gave participants access to representatives from over 20 different day schools and supplementary schools affiliated with UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

The workshop, developed by the BJE and UJA Federation's Jewish Information Services of Toronto (JIST) featured Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA's senior vice president for Jewish Education & Identity, Yael Seliger, associate director of the BJE, Rhona Shulman, chair of the Educational Services Committee and Sandy Brown, past chair of the BJE, all of whom were on hand to field questions and guide parents through the evening.

"Every parent dreams of the possibility of finding the best education for their children," Dr. Epstein explained. "We at the BJE are here to help make that job easier for parents. If parents have concerns or questions, they should use the BJE as a resource," he urged the crowd.

Parents voiced various concerns during the course of the program. Some were worried about getting their children into their school of choice, while others were concerned about the quality of education and the rising cost of tuition.

"Sending your child to a day school is a big investment," one parent, who wished to remain anonymous began. "This type of evening offers a great opportunity to check out our options and find the school whose ideology most closely matches our lifestyle," she added.

The "marketplace," where the various schools set up displays and materials in an effort to educate parents, spilled out into three conference rooms and the adjoining hallways, a testament to the plethora of choices parents face today when making their schooling decisions. Under one roof, couples were able to wander freely among the school displays, arming themselves with pamphlets and information. School representatives openly chatted with individuals, offering advice and insight into the day school system.

Arnie Deltoff and Brenda Honigman with their son Shafer educate themselves about Jewish education.

Arnie Deltoff and Brenda Honigman found the array of choices overwhelming.

"This really opened our eyes to how many choices there are," Brenda said enthusiastically. Her husband agreed. "This program was really helpful; we are very interested in sending our son Shafer to a day school and this has given us the information we needed."

Approximately 17,000 students attend Jewish day schools and supplementary schools in the GTA.

Tikkun Toronto

Toronto teens serving the community

Imagine the possibility of over 200 Jewish Toronto teens performing volunteer work around the GTA, all on one day. That possibility will become reality with the first ever Tikkun Toronto, a national day of voluntarism to be held on April 17, 2005.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education (BJE), along with other Jewish organizations, granted B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) special funding in order to coordinate this community program. BBYO will team up with the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), United Synagogue Youth (USY) and Young Judaea to plan community service and education programs to engage Jewish teens in this innovative civic endeavour.

This initiative was created when North American philanthropists and youth leaders recently met in Washington to come up with a trans-denominational project. The outcome was J Serve 2005, Jewish youth repairing the world one day at a time.

Through the auspices of J Serve, hundreds of thousands of youth across North America will be participating in a national day of voluntarism, on the same day. Tikkun Toronto will link Toronto youth with like-minded teens from across the continent.

"Voluntarism and service learning are integral ways to build community among young Jews of all denominations," Sharon Marcus, executive director of BBYO, said.

Toronto teens will rejuvenate the landmark Minsk Synagogue, work with Ve'ahavta, a non-profit organization that responds to global crises and participate in workshops with members of HonestReporting Canada, an independent grass-roots organization promoting fair and accurate Canadian media coverage of Israel and the Middle East.

BBYO teens are excited about participating in Tikkun Toronto.

"Teenagers have an opportunity to make a difference," Daniel Sugar, a teen leader commented. "I'm hoping that all of the teens who participate will come out of the day with a sense of community – that we're coming together and making change."

"This is a great way for youth to get out and get involved," Sadie Tollman a BBYO member added. "This type of experience stays with you a long time."

Teens can learn more about participating by visiting www.bbyo.on.org or www.jserve.org

Speaking out

In this week's perspective, Greg Masel Director General of Keren Hayesod, the fundraising arm of the Jewish Agency, UJA Federation's overseas partner, reflects on his work.

Working around the World

In geographical terms, we always talk about "57 campaigns in 45 countries over 5 continents." It's almost turned into a cliché. But just think, for a moment, what that actually means. There are 25 time zones – and we have campaigns in just about all of them. So here's how a typical day goes in the life of the KH world.

You come into work at 8 in the morning, and you find all the e-mails from Australia and the Far East that they have sent you during their work day, which was night time here. You hurry to answer them or make your phone calls before they go to sleep! Then you find yourself working more or less in "real time" with the UK, Europe and South Africa. When you get to 4 in the afternoon, when most work places in Israel are going home, they are just starting their work day in Canada and Latin America, so you start with them! In spite of the geographical distances, the spectrum of times zones, the multiple languages, the cultural diversity – all over the world there are Keren Hayesod activists who share the same feeling that we are part of one family. I personally feel proud to be part of this family.

Greg Masel

Just over a month ago, on January 15th, something happened that will forever be engraved in my memory. A 17 year old girl from Sderot, Ella Abukasis, was walking home from a Bnei Akiva meeting with her younger brother, Tamir, and some of her friends when she heard over the public alert system the words "red dawn". Everyone in Sderot knows what "red dawn" means – it means that a barrage of kassam missiles is on its way. It doesn't give you too much time to think, and indeed, without a second thought, Ella jumped on top of her brother, acting as a human shield. She saved his life, but sacrificed her own to do so. Ella, Zichrona Livracha, knew the price she would pay – but she was not guided by concern for herself, she thought only of saving her younger brother.

Last week, just before Ella's "shloshim" the conclusion of the first month of mourning, something inside me compelled me to call Ella's father, to tell him that although I don't know him and I didn't know his daughter, I share with him his pain. I asked him to tell me about Ella. He told me that – at the age of only 17 years old – the most important thing for her was to help others. She was constantly concerned for people in need and wanted to dedicate her life to helping them. And above all, she had a deep love for the State of Israel and the Jewish people.

Ella's values were those same values that we all share. They are the values that bring Jews from all over the world together in the Keren Hayesod family in order to raise funds to support the Jewish Agency activities aimed at ensuring the strength of the State of Israel and the future of the Jewish people. That is what we all have in common, that is what transcends the distance, the time zones, and the barriers of language and culture.

Making the case for peace

A one on one with Professor Alan Dershowitz

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

During last week's visit to Toronto by renowned legal expert Alan Dershowitz, Taali Lester Tollman spoke with him about his lecture tour, sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto, which is supported by UJA Federation. Tollman had the chance to talk with Dershowitz about his passions and hope for peace in Israel.

Q: What made you become an activist for Israel?

A: Israel has been a passion of mine for many, many years. But it became my primary passion when I saw what was going on, on college campuses. When I saw college campuses become so inhospitable to my values, it was something that I had to try and change. So for the last four or five years, I've devoted almost all my energies to defending Israel and the peace process and I will continue doing so.

Q: You refer to yourself as pro-Palestinian. Why do you think this is so important?

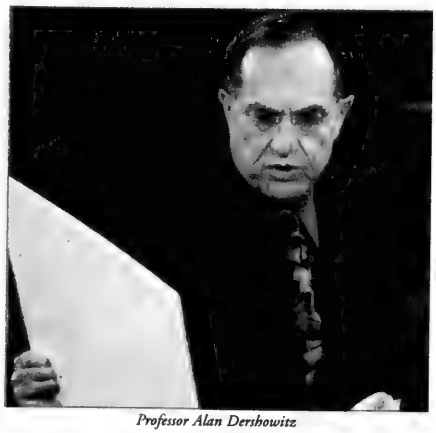
A: Because I think it helps make the point that many who claim to be pro-Palestinian are really driven more by anti-Israel hatred than by any love of the Palestinian people or for any desire to see them live in peace. I think the Palestinian people have been used by Arab countries, used by American academics, and I think making the point, which is true that I am pro-Palestinian, helps emphasize the reality.



Professor Alan Dershowitz

Q: After speaking on two campuses, U of T and York, do you see any difference between the anti-Israelism that's happening in the U.S. and here in Canada?

A: Yes. I think that the hatred I've seen in the eyes of some of the students here, I've not quite seen on American campuses. On American campuses, they will take up an anti-Israel point of view, but some of the people I saw in Toronto were very genuine. They meant it to the core of their being. The hatred is real and it probably required an awful lot of propaganda and indoctrination to get them to that level of hatred.

Q: Has anything changed on campus because of Israel's' disengagement plan?

A: No. That's the key point that proves that those on the anti-Israel side are not about peace but about hate. Not only has the disengagement plan not affected their views, neither has the peace process. They are not interested in peace; they are interested in destroying Israel.

Q: How did we, who support Israel, go wrong in allowing the objective truth about the conflict to be so misrepresented?

A: I think we took for granted the fact that people would believe the truth and we have been playing catch up ever since. The anti-Israel side has developed very sophisticated techniques, visual techniques of bringing in the fence or the wall, verbal techniques like using concepts like Apartheid and we haven't kept up.

Q: Is that changing and why?

A: I think it is changing a little bit now because a lot of people didn't realize how much danger Israel and the Jewish community were in. I think now many people are realizing that this is, if not a crisis, a serious situation that has to be addressed.

Q: How should students deal with the anti-Israel "zealots" on campus?

A: You use those people as exhibits to try to get to the students in the center. I think a lot of what the extremist student groups do backfires, and I think the target has to be the center. [These are]the people whose hearts and minds you want to influence, the people that will be future business and political leaders.

Q: Do we have a chance with those students in the center?

A: We have a good chance with the students in the center. More students have an open mind than we've been led to believe. The silent majority has an open mind - and often an empty mind - on these issues and we have to help fill it with facts, rather than with propaganda. Those students understand that in order to succeed in America and Canada, you have to at least be moderate and understand both sides. You can't be an extremist. It's just not good for your career.

Q: Are we turning it around on campuses?

A: Yes, forget the extremists, they are irrelevant, because as long as Israel exists, it's a target, but with the moderates, the extremists are losing ground. I think the moderates are seeing that the extremists are anti-peace. My discussions at universities are not the case for Israel but really the case for peace. Who could be against peace?

Toronto to host young Jewish leaders

TO'05 Conference a great place to meet

Young Jewish people looking for a place to mingle and meet should consider the National Young Leadership Conference, TO'05, sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC). On April 1-3, 2005, Toronto will play host to nearly 500 young Jewish leaders from across Canada and Israel, who will gather at the Sheraton Centre to network and get reinvigorated about Jewish life and community.

TOday, TOmorrow, TOgether

David Lanys attended the convention in Montreal two years ago. It was there that he met his future wife, Joy Itzkovityz.

"I really didn't know what to expect from the conference," Lanys said. "It was educationally an eye opener and quite uplifting. But it was also a great place to meet people. Just the way they orchestrate the event, it allows for a relaxed atmosphere, and lots of opportunities to mingle. That's how I met Joy and I will always be grateful for that."

But there is more than seminars and breakout sessions. Single participants will have added opportunities to mingle with their counterparts. Speed dating sessions are being offered, in conjunction with power walking tours of Toronto and a Saturday night extravaganz, called A Night on the Town.

The party is taking place at the Steam Whistle Brewery, in the Distillery District of downtown Toronto. It will offer live music by Bais Groove, signature Steam Whistle beer made on the premises and martini bars, in addition to a Taste of Toronto, cuisine from Chinatown, Little Italy and the Danforth's Greek Town.

"We wanted the Saturday-night event to be fun and energizing," Sherri Kreisman, co-chair of A Night on the Town said. "A place where everyone, single or not could feel comfortable and have a great time."

"The Saturday night event at the last conference was just a great party," Lanys continued. "If you are single and interested in meeting someone, that's a great place to start."

With the date fast approaching, the co-chairs of TO'05, Liann Granovsky, Alison Himel and Josh Cooper, are geared up and excited about the prospect of bringing so many young leaders together under one roof.

"We have worked very hard to present interesting speakers like Dennis Prager and Joseph Telushkin, who will stimulate and inform our participants," Granovsky explained. "But we have also worked just as hard to make sure our participants have fun, meet new people and network with peers from across Canada."

Living Generously

Over the next few weeks, you may notice a new phrase - Live generously - appearing on UJA Federation of Greater Toronto material.

Nearly 100 Jewish Federations across North America have adopted Live generously as a contemporary reflection of a strong desire by Jewish community members to live a life filled with values - a life that benefits others.

"Live generously is an attitude, an all-encompassing approach to daily life," says Joel Reisman, chair of UJA Federation's Communications Advisory Committee. "We can live generously in many ways - with our time and with our money and by caring for others. That's why these two simple words combine to make such a powerful message."

Jewish Life

The forgotten Fusgeyers

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Between about 1900 and 1914, many thousands of impoverished Jewish refugees sold their meagre possessions, joined into large groups for protection, and trekked hundreds of miles out of Romania on foot.

The exodus of the Jewish Fusgeyers – Yiddish for "wayfarers" or "foot-wanderers" – was so marked that the American Jewish Yearbook of 1903 reported that some 200 to 300 were streaming out of Romania each week. The number peaked around 1907 and slowly declined until 1914, when the outbreak of war reduced the flow to a trickle.

Roots & Remembrance

The Romanian-Jewish pedestrian movement was fuelled by anti-Semitic persecution and the imminent prospect of starvation. In the late 19th century, Romania began classifying Jews as foreigners and barred them from an increasing list of professions.

By one estimate, as many as 70,000 Jews chose to leave the country. Representatives of Jewish aid organizations met them at towns along the Austro-Hungarian border and gave them food and shelter, as well as train and ships' tickets to their ultimate destinations.

Many eventually reached England and the United States. Significant communities arose in New York, London, Paris and the towns of Rosh Pina and Zichron Ya'akov in what was then British-mandate Palestine. In Canada, many settled in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and a sprinkling of Jewish farming communities in Saskatchewan.

Canadian author and photographer Jill Culiner, whose grandfather trekked hundred of miles across Eastern Europe, always wanted to know more about such arduous journeys. Encountering a mention of the Fusgeyers in Irving Howe's World of Our Fathers, she became obsessed with the subject, but found few historical works that did more than touch on it in passing.

Her own recent book, Finding Home: In the Footsteps of the Jewish Fusgeyers, published by Sumach Press of Toronto, is a worthy attempt to correct this deficit.

By far the richest literary source for Culiner was Jacob Finkelstein's Memoir of a Fusgeyer from Romania to America, an unpublished Yiddish manuscript held by the New York-based YIVO Institute. A New Yorker who trekked out of Romania with a pioneering group called the Barlad Fusgeyers, Finkelstein submitted his immigration story to YIVO in 1942 in response to a contest. His first-person narrative won top prize.

Consisting of 75 single men and three women, the Barlad Fusgeyers left the town of Barlad in April 1900 and journeyed 200 miles around the base of the Carpathian Mountains, staging theatrical performances and selling brochures as they went. All along their route, Jews and Romanian peasants alike welcomed them as heroes and bestowed gifts of food and clothing upon them. Their success inspired hundreds of other groups to follow.

After reading Finkelstein's manuscript, Culiner decided to retrace the Romanian journey of the Barlad Fusgeyers.

"Everything that they did, I had to do," she said. "Where Jacob Finkelstein and the Fusgeyers slept in fields, I had to do the same thing, and that's what I did. When they were housed by the Jewish community, then I slept in hotels."

Her book provides generous translated excerpts of Finkelstein's manuscript and describes the mostly derelict Jewish sites found along the route today. The few remaining Romanian Jews she encountered sadly acknowledged they were part of the closing chapter of Romanian-Jewish history.

Culiner found documentary evidence of the Fusgeyers in several small Romanian museums and in institutions in Budapest, Vienna, Nurnberg, and London. Particularly rich troves turned up in Paris, New York and the Canadian Jewish Congress Archives in Montreal.

The peripatetic writer, who divides her time between Toronto and Hungary, said she was perpetually amazed during her journey at how thoroughly the Fusgeyers had been erased from popular memory, particularly in Romania.

"People just don't know the story, except for some Romanians of Jewish descent," she said. "Even the children of Fusgeyers don't know about it."

Moroccan newcomers stuck together

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the arrival of Canada's first Moroccan immigrants. The following article is part of a series.

Fifty years ago, around the time that Toronto inaugurated its first subway line, the first Jewish immigrants from North Africa arrived.

Through A Sephardi Window

On the one hand, everyone knows who these first dozen or so families and individuals were – they were, and are, the pioneers of the community. On the other hand, no one knows, or rather no one wishes to admit, who was the very first to arrive. Assuming that all 12 original families did not arrive on the same day, there had to have been one family or individual that arrived before all others. We will call this person "immigrant zero."

"Immigrant zero" is an enigma. For 50 years, immigrant zero has steadfastly refused to identify himself, or to be identified. Perhaps, the joke goes, no one wishes to take responsibility for bringing an entire group from a sunny Mediterranean climate into the frozen land of Canada.

Members of this first group soon found that they needed, and even enjoyed, each other's company. For any immigrant, the need to congregate is great. There is nothing as comforting as the company of others who are going through a similar experience. Together, they can commiserate, indulge in nostalgia and bask in the warmth of familiar company.

And so it was that – like the more than 100 other groups of Jews before them, representing almost every town and village in Poland – the Jews of Morocco came together.

What was unique was that in their coming together, they formed a congregation. While other ethnic groups formed burial societies or sick benefit societies, or based their groups on social and cultural needs, the Moroccans formed synagogues.

This is not to say that these first families were a particularly religious group. On the contrary, they were not. They just happened to form synagogues instead of societies or clubs.

Ironically, people who weren't really regular "shul-goers" would form a congregation and attend it, not so much for prayer but as a place to meet. As well, individuals who would have had little social contact with each other back home were forced to interact out of necessity.

In Morocco, like everywhere else, there existed the sad reality of a class structure, with all its barriers. But upon arrival in Canada, all class distinctions and barriers were shattered.

Of course, people being people, the new immigrants immediately got to work creating new class distinctions: car drivers versus TTC riders, home owners versus apartment renters, etc. In addition, the distinction that had always existed in Morocco between Jews in the Spanish zone and those in the French zone also materialized here in Canada, and early on, this small, initial group split into two: the Jews of Tangiers and vicinity, and the Jews of Casablanca and vicinity.

Today, half a century later, these congregations are still robust and are still around, still populated by the children – and even grandchildren – of those first families who happily choose to frequent these Sephardi synagogues.

And, so far, no one has formed a society or a club.

On reaching 85

Methuselah was most encouraging: he confided that the first hundred years were the hardest. Having reached 85 – with the inevitable onslaught of the years on body and mind – I strive to take heart.

We all know men and women who are offended when told they look their age. They are highly flattered when told that they have not changed in 20 years, despite the fact that the entire world about them has undergone profound transformation. Why should it be regarded as a compliment that one has stood still while all the world has moved? How many people wear themselves out in the desperate attempt to appear youthful?

Books
Bernard Baskin

This was not always so. In the Torah, the aged are spoken of with great respect. We are commanded to rise in reverence before the hoary head. Of the elderly it is said that with them is wisdom, counsel and understanding. Ben Sira cautions, "Shame not the old, we shall all be numbered among them."

The passage of time provides experience and enables us to acquire wisdom. Age permits a detachment from the turmoil and rush of life and helps us to secure freedom from the pressures and drives of youthful ambition. It is the time of life when we need not be consumed any longer by a gnawing impetuosity and compulsion to seek higher position.

We cannot make all knowledge our province, but we can, by press, radio and TV keep abreast of contemporary events. Good books look down from our library shelves, splendidly adorned in their many coloured jackets, desiring to release their ideas into our minds, but the initiative must be ours. They await our overture of friendship. Those who can read and don't are no better off than those who cannot read at all.

A wonderful thing about a book in contrast to a computer screen is that you can take it to bed with you. The time to read is any time. No appointment of time or place is necessary. It is the only art that can be practised at any hour of the day or night. Whenever inclination comes, that is your time for reading: in joy or sorrow, health or sickness, in one's youth and in old age.

Rabbi Abraham Heschel urged his fellow aging friends: "We must not regard old age as a time of stagnation but as a time of opportunity for inner growth. The years of old age can be rich in possibilities, a time to unlearn bad habits, see through self-deception, deepen understanding and compassion, widen the horizons of honesty and refine the sense of fairness."

Finally, our society cries out for volunteers who are interested, not in personal achievement, but in serving their fellow human beings. Such lives can never be without meaning or excitement. People who live this way will never be overwhelmed by a sense of uselessness or futility. The real invalids and discards of our time are the self-centered, the socially unaware, the prisoners of selfishness who live in a world of low ceilings.

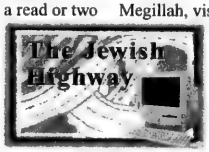
On every side of us important causes are languishing because they lack human support. In such a world, wasting time is not simply a harmless peccadillo. It is a tragedy.

All of us are moving towards the setting sun. The path of life leads to the western horizon. There is beauty and radiance in the sky. Let us walk forward with the glow of that light upon our face.

Purim traditions

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

For many of us, the story found in Megillat Esther is fodder for children's plays and satirical skits. But if you've never taken a second look at the story of Esther, Mordechai and the other familiar characters, you may be surprised how textured this story of court intrigue, attempted genocide and ultimate deliverance can be. Before Purim starts, take a read or two and bring new meaning to the Megillah ceremony. Enjoy some Megillah art. And finish off with a helping of Megillah humour.



First, there's the basic story. The most web-friendly version of the Megillah that I could find online was created by Mechon Mamre in Israel. You can read the Hebrew and English text side by side – and it displays properly even if you don't have Hebrew fonts installed on your computer. [www.mechon-mamre.org/p/pt/pt3301.htm]

Another traditional English translation can be found at Purim Play Today. Each chapter of the Megillah is given a headline as if it were published in a modern tabloid newspaper: "King Ahasuerus to remarry; future queen, a commoner, beats out long line of candidates"; "Two royal chamberlains caught in murder/espionage conspiracy; Captured by security specialist Mordechai, a former Israeli agent" and "The gang's all here – Haman and sons receive lift." [http://tinyurl.com/6c39t]

Thought-provoking online commentaries include ones from the Virtual Beit Midrash [www.vbm-torah.org/purim/pur-es.htm], Torah.org [http://tinyurl.com/6rl6n], Sichos in English [http://tinyurl.com/4u8va] and from JOFA: the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance. [http://tinyurl.com/4jgrp]

It's probably a bit too late to start studying, but if you want to get a feel for the traditional melody used to chant the Megillah, visit 613.org, where you can listen to the entire story sung online by Cantor Rabinovitz. [http://613.org/purim.html] While you're on the page, scroll down to look at the long list of audio lectures about the holiday.

In addition to being important religious documents, Megillot can also be beautiful works of art. Illustrated and illuminated with scenes from the Purim story, they often reflect their country of origin rather than traditional Persia. An Italian Megillah on view at the Library of Congress has the historic characters in 18th-century dress. [http://tinyurl.com/42ejk] Compare that to Israeli artist Ya'acov Agam's ultra-modern Agam Megillah, which is decorated with a series of fluorescent-bright lines, circles and other geometric shapes. [http://tinyurl.com/6bwbv]

The Orthodox Union has created another type of modern Haggadah. Our Way, the OU's National Jewish Council for Disabilities, has produced the PowerPoint Megillat Esther. This presentation can be projected onto a synagogue wall to assist people who are deaf or hard of hearing to follow along as the Megillah is being read. Special graphics point out when Haman is being booed. The CD-ROM-based presentation can be purchased from the OU. [www.ou.org/oupr/2005/megillah65.htm]

Of course, no look at Purim would be complete without a dollop of humour. If you don't mind the occasional groaner, then take a listen to a "modern" interpretation of the story of Purim thanks to the Torah from Dixie Radio Network. Here's a sample: "This attempted political coup which became known in the Persian press as 'Palace-gate' gained Mordy Chai favour in the eyes of the king. After years of legal deliberations, the two assassins were found guilty. And since the jury was not hung, the assassins were." [www.613.org/dixie/jeff2.ram]

Many of the mitzvahs associated with Purim mentioned in Megillat Esther are discussed at length in the Talmud's Tractate Megillah. Now, hold that thought. Years ago, a certain alcoholic drink commissioned a series of ads that features the beverage's uniquely shaped bottle. In honour of Purim, some creative typesetters have transformed a genuine page of Talmud to include the outline of that distinctive bottle containing "100 Spoof Vodka from Shushan." [www.greenehouse.com/purim/megillah7b.html]

Enjoy. Drink moderately. And have a wonderful Purim. Absolut-ly!

We need to restructure the Jewish school system

By BARRY LEVINE
Special to The CJN

Parents in the Jewish community have made repeated calls for increased funding by various levels of government. We lament the high cost of tuition and the lack of funding relief that could be funded by our tax dollars. Although the current inequity in funding by our governments is undoubtedly discriminatory, we also must ask if we have really done all that can be done to reduce the cost of a Jewish day school education.

The community has played a significant role in creating an environment of high tuition rates. It has demanded broader choice, resulting in a proliferation of day school options. The number of choices has doubled in the past 15 years or so. As the number of schools increases, so does the cost of the day school system – more schools equal more fixed cost. These costs must then be shared by a relatively static enrolment base. The result is a higher cost per student. As the cost per student increases, fewer can afford a Jewish day school education, and enrolment drops. The remaining students share an ever-increasing proportion of fixed costs. This vicious circle must be broken.

So what needs to be done to fix our ailing Jewish day school system? It sounds like heresy, but we need to downsize it. We all attribute growth and expansion as a sign of success. But in this case, success will come from contracting our bloated Jewish education system.

By way of analogy, consider the airline industry, which has too many airlines, too many seats, significant fixed overhead costs and not enough passengers to cover expenses. This has led to financial difficulties for many carriers, and in some cases bankruptcy.

School Parents SPEAK

The Jewish day school system currently supports some 8,600 students in 20 elementary schools on 30 separate campuses – an average of 286 students per campus. By comparison, the Toronto District School Board system serves an average of 645 students per campus (from junior kindergarten to Grade 8), and the Toronto Catholic District School Board serves 363.

Associated Hebrew Schools is one of the few Jewish day schools to publicly share any financial information. According to its 2003-04 budget, 36 per cent of Associated's expenses are for general administration, supervisory staff, support staff and facilities – money that is not being spent directly in the classroom. These costs are largely fixed, meaning that shrinking or expanding enrolment does not substantially affect them. By comparison, the Catholic board's expenses in these areas are 16 per cent of budget.

Let's assume that the total expense base for the 20 elementary Jewish day schools is roughly $86 million (8,600 students at approximately $10,000 tuition each). Let's also assume – in the absence of publicly available data – that most of the schools have similar or somewhat lower expense ratios than Associated – that is, in the range of 30 per cent of total expenses. Based on this, Jewish schools spend some $26 million per year on overhead, or an average of $867,000 per campus.

What would happen if we were to reduce the number of Jewish day school campuses from 30 to 20? First, enrolment per campus would have to increase to about 430 students, from 286. (This is reasonable when compared to enrolments in the public and Catholic systems.) Second, the overhead related to 10 campuses would be eliminated. This translates to a system-wide savings of approximately $9 million per year. Spread among 8,600 students, you would have savings in the neighbourhood of $1,000 per student.

These savings assume no significant changes to existing overhead structure. Imagine what further savings would be possible if the plethora of principals, vice-principals and administrators at each of the remaining campuses could be brought in line with other school systems. Again looking to Associated's figures, these could represent as much as 20 per cent of a school's operating expense.

Obviously, the waste in the system can't be eliminated overnight. Not only will it require considerable will on the part of the community and educators, but space constraints, building leases and limited capital will hinder the process. No one will want their school to be affected.

To begin with, the multiplicity of campuses offered by some schools must be cut, and some schools may even have to close. Of course, the idea is not to reduce or limit overall enrolment, but to consolidate overhead into fewer locations. In doing so, we may end up with less diversity. But the choice comes down to diversity and high overhead versus less diversity and lower overhead. Can we afford not to do it?

So how will the community decide where to cut? Market forces should be encouraged to take root. Schools with lower overhead structures will have lower tuitions, thereby attracting a greater share of available enrolment, while schools that fail to reduce costs will suffer – in other words, it will be survival of the fittest.

The reason that this process has not happened naturally is because the community continues to artificially prop up and grow the system. The UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education has a total budget of approximately $11 million per year, a substantial amount of which goes to tuition subsidies. In effect, federation's contribution is merely offsetting the waste in the system. This money does little to enhance the quality of education. It merely encourages the situation to continue and worsen. And as enrolments continue to drop, federation will be called upon to support an increasingly untenable situation.

So it's in federation's interest to take a leadership role. A little encouragement by way of financial incentives could be all we need to get the ball rolling. Federation should consider directing its funding to schools that bring about significant reductions in overhead costs. It could match each dollar cut so that funding could be used to improve the quality of education in the classroom. The effect would be to shift funding from overhead to quality of education. The restructuring process might take several years, but we need to start somewhere. The future of our education system depends on it.

'Machalnik' memorialized volunteers' service

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Montreal native Yedidia "Eddy" Kaplansky, one of the first pilots in the Israeli Air Force and a volunteer crew member on a ship that smuggled Jewish refugees to pre-state Israel after World War II, died suddenly in Haifa earlier this month. He was 79.

Yedidia "Eddy" Kaplansky

Kaplansky, who had been living in Israel for more than 30 years, was an amateur historian of the Machal, which was made up of overseas volunteers who, like himself, fought in Israel's 1948 War of Independence.

After serving in the Royal Canadian Air Force during World War II, Kaplansky wanted to help the displaced Jewish refugees in Europe. He was also eager to visit Jerusalem, where his father was born and raised.

Kaplansky readily signed on when an Israeli recruiter came to North America looking for military-trained volunteers. A few weeks later, he was a navigator on the Jewish State, one of the "Aliyah Bet" ships used in the clandestine immigration movement to British Mandate Palestine.

His ship picked up 2,700 refugees in Bulgaria.

In an interview a few years ago with the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, Kaplansky recalled: "It was a terrible sight, these poor people in pitiful clothes, just like we see in Rwanda today… Our non-Jewish captain burst into tears."

The ship was intercepted by the British and re-directed to Cyprus where the passengers, including Kaplansky, were interned. Kaplansky eventually got to Israel for the first time in 1947, then returned to Montreal.

When the War of Independence broke out, he came back to serve as a pilot and help build the fledgling air force.

"I knew there was a big shortage of experienced personnel. My conscience told me that I had to volunteer again," Kaplansky said in an interview with the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz last year.

After leaving the air force in 1949, he again returned to Montreal with his Jerusalem-born wife Lea and went into the real estate business.

In the 1960s, Kaplansky became active in the Chomedey Jewish community and was a key figure in the successful legal battle for representation of non-Protestant taxpayers on the Protestant school boards.

He later got involved in municipal politics and served on the first executive committee of the new city of Laval.

Kaplansky and his wife moved back to Israel in 1974.

In retirement, he devoted himself to researching the history of the approximately 3,500 "Machalniks," 119 of whom lost their lives. He found that 62 of the 193 World War II-trained pilots who fought in the War of Independence were not Jewish.

Kaplansky maintained they came out of idealism and the belief that the Jewish state was a just cause, and not because they were mercenaries.

He worked to ensure that the overseas volunteers are remembered in Israel. In 1993, a monument to the 119 who died was erected in Jerusalem.

Kaplansky contributed a chapter on the air force to the brief history Machal: Overseas Volunteers in Israel's War of Independence, published recently by World Machal in Hebrew, and later translated into English.

He also wrote a paper in 1999 on Canadian volunteers in the War of Independence and on the Aliyah Bet ships. The paper can be found in the Canadian Jewish Congress Archives.

Kaplansky is survived by his wife, a daughter and two sons.

Claim made by heir on Nazi-looted painting

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The Montreal Museum of Fine Arts (MMFA) says it won't return a valuable painting confiscated by Nazi Germany from a leading Dutch-Jewish art dealer until a claim by an heir in the United States is proven.

Spokesperson Wanda Palma told The CJN the MMFA's documentation "indicates" that the painting, which was part of the huge collection of Jacques Goudstikker, was among about 235 artworks that his widow agreed with the Dutch government to renounce any claim to. These works were recovered by the Allies and handed over to the Netherlands at the end of the war.

"Our records indicate that there was an agreement after the war between the widow and the Dutch government – which may have involved some compensation," said Palma. This is, however, not a "final no," she said, and expects the MMFA will now look more actively into the provenance of The Deification of Aeneas, an oil on canvas by 17th-century French artist Charles Le Brun.

The MMFA bought the painting from Schaeffer Galleries in New York in 1953. It hangs in its Old Masters gallery.

The MMFA does not dispute that the painting was improperly acquired by the Nazis. According to the MMFA's information, which is found on its website, the painting was "aryanized" by an Alois Meidl on behalf of Hermann Goering in June 1940. Goudstikker died in May 1940, while trying to flee to England. According to the U.S. Office of Strategic Services, Miedl was a German financier who negotiated the sale to Goering, Adolf Hitler's air minister.

The painting is among the approximately 130 European works, created before 1945 and acquired by the MMFA since the beginning of the Nazi period in 1933, with "gaps" in their histories. Since 2001, the MMFA has been posting its provenance research on such works on its website.

According to the MMFA's information, the Le Brun painting was returned to the Dutch authorities by the Allies on Oct. 20, 1945. It was sold at an auction in Amsterdam in 1951 to the Schaeffer Galleries.

Lawrence Kaye, the New York-based lawyer for the claimant, Marei von Saher of Connecticut, Goudstikker' daughter-in-law and his sole legal heir, said Goudstikker's widow, Desi, never did renounce her claim to this painting or the other 250 works, most of which were also seized by Goering, and he has documentary evidence to prove it. In 1952, she did accept a settlement from the Dutch government, but that was for a different set of works, he said, and has "nothing to do" with this other group.

Von Saher launched legal proceedings against the Dutch government in 1998, but the case was not admitted because of the 1952 settlement with the widow, which the Dutch maintain did include relinquishing rights to other Goudstikker collection holdings. Some are still in the Dutch national collection and others were sold.

Kaye said that in recent years, the Dutch have reopened the whole issue of restitution of art, and a committee studying the matter is expected to release its report this summer.

Goudstikker's entire collection included more than 1,300 works, believed by the family to now be spread around the world. The Le Brun painting is the only one so far traced to Canada.

Kaye said he discovered the painting through the MMFA's website and first wrote to the MMFA for its return in June 2003, providing the same evidence he has now. The answer was no, he said.

Palma said that when the first claim was made, the MMFA wrote to the Dutch government for more information and received no reply.

Kaye has so far recovered 10 works from the Goudstikker collection for von Saher. The latest was Four Nude Female Dancers Resting, a charcoal drawing by Edgar Degas, which was restitituted by the Israel Museum in Jerusalem this month. Von Saher is the owner of Amsterdamse Negotiatie Compagnie N.V., the successor to Goudstikker's former gallery.

The claim for the Degas work was first made in late 2003. Joint research by the museum and art historians working for the family confirmed its provence.

Another major restitution was made last summer when the Staatsgalerie Stuttgart in Germany paid an undisclosed sum for a still life by Belgian painter James Ensor. The others were handed over voluntarily by dealers, auction houses and private collectors in Austria, England, Switzerland, the United States, the Netherlands and Germany, Kaye said.

Kaye, who is with the Manhattan firm Herrick, Feinstein, is currently pursuing claims in more than 10 countries and has hired art historians to comb archives in Europe and the United States. Kaye described the effort as probably the most comprehensive research project ever to track down a single-owner art collection stolen by the Nazis.

In defending its record, Palma pointed out that the MMFA was the first Canadian museum to return a Nazi-looted work of art. In 1999, the MMFA gave back the 16th-century painting The Marriage Feast of Cana, which it had owned since 1964, to the Museum of Fine Arts in Budapest. Palma said no other claims have been made on the works in its collection that it has been gradually posting on the Internet since April 2001.

$25M set aside in federal budget

Bornmann said the Jewish community's priorities centred around hate crimes and hate on the Internet.

The plan got a boost two years ago when the UN's Special Rapporteur on Racism visited Canada. After a two-week tour of the country, Doudou Diène pronounced that racism still exists in Canada and added that while a good legal framework exists to fight it, a co-ordinated program is needed.

Bornmann noted that last month's federal budget set aside $25 million over three years for programs to commemorate darker moments in Canadian history. "The idea is to ensure that as we move forward, we don't forget things that Canadians sometimes need to be reminded of things we're not proud of." That would include the infamous Chinese head tax, the internment of Japanese-Canadians during World War II and Canada's dismal record on admitting Jewish refugees before and during the Holocaust.

Anti-Semitism up across Canada, audit finds

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Anti-Semitism in this country reached an all-time high in 2004, according to B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights' annual Audit of Antisemitic Incidents.

There were 857 anti-Semitic incidents – defined as harassment, vandalism or violence – reported to B'nai Brith across Canada in 2004, the highest in the audit's 22-year history and a 47 per cent jump over 2003.

Of those incidents, 45 per cent were reported to police for investigation. Of those, 13 led to charges, and one to a prison sentence. Some cases are still before the courts.

Since 2000, the number of anti-Semitic incidents has increased three-fold, noted the report, which was released last week in Ottawa.

The number of attacks on synagogues rose 74 per cent – to 40 last year versus 23 in 2003 – while cemetery vandalism increased from three incidents in 2003 to 10 in 2004. As well, incidents involving Jewish homes rose from 95 to 151, a 59 per cent increase.

"Jews are being targeted in their own homes, which we find chilling, as that indicates premeditation. People are taking the trouble to find out where Jews live," Ruth Klein, director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, told reporters.

The largest number of incidents were reported in Ontario and Quebec, where most Jews live. In Ontario there were 530 incidents – up 33 per cent – including 405 in the Toronto area, where incidents increased 29 per cent.

In one prominent case, homes and cars in a heavily Jewish neighbourhood of Thornhill, Ont., were defaced with graffiti, including swastikas and slurs such as "Jewz suk."

Incidents in Quebec rose 89 per cent, to 204. Montreal experienced 187 of those, an 83 per cent increase.

Incidents in other cities and towns across the country also rose dramatically.

In an interview with The CJN, Liberal MP Anita Neville noted that anti-Semitic incidents tripled in Winnipeg last year, from 18 to 54. Jews and Jewish organizations experienced harassment and vandalism, many of them in her riding of Winnipeg South Centre. "I'm concerned because it's not headline grabbing, but it's below the surface and it's significant in its quantity."

The report noted that in one Winnipeg incident, swastikas and the word "Jew" were painted on the door of a restaurant owned by a Jew.

47 per cent jump over 2003 reported

The community is addressing inter-group issues through public education, lectures, interfaith meetings and cross-cultural exchanges, Neville said.

In Ottawa, incidents increased 47 per cent over 2003 to 66, an unprecedented number for the nation's capital. In one, a rabbi received a threatening letter at his home saying, "Die, Die Jews."

And for the first time ever, an incident was reported in Nunavut, where only 10 Jews live.

British Columbia was the only region to see a drop – to 17 reported incidents, from 25 in 2003, a 32 per cent decrease.

Acts are being committed by various groups, including right-wing and Muslim ones, but "incidents carried out by people who identified themselves as Arab almost doubled" over 2003, Klein said.

"We have to ask ourselves, how well is multiculturalism working in this country?"

Klein said incidents in public schools were up three-fold, and Jews are also being targeted on college and university campuses, on public transport and in the streets.

"We are seeing increased tolerance for anti-Semitic acts. We are becoming desensitized. Things that were once considered outrageous are being taken for granted," she said.

Nationwide, 53 per cent of incidents were classified as harassment, 43 per cent as vandalism, and 6 per cent as cases of violence – there were 31 violent incidents reported in 2004, more than double the 15 reported in 2003.

B'nai Brith's executive vice-president, Frank Dimant, told reporters that "even when token condemnations follow [incidents] and complaints are laid, investigations are often protracted, inconclusive and lack the type of closure that would send a strong message to Canadians that anti-Semitism is not acceptable in this country."

Referring to David Ahenakew, the Saskatchewan aboriginal leader who has been charged with promoting hate against an identifiable group for telling a reporter in 2002 that Hitler cleaned up Europe when he "fried six million Jews," Dimant asked, "How is it possible that a man who spews hatred – and it is on film – still has his Order of Canada? That sends a message around the world that we don't have the political will to take away the Order of Canada from a hatemonger."

The report also included B'nai Brith's recommendations to the Canadian government for combating all forms of racism. It urges, for example, that all major police forces in Canada should have dedicated hate crime units; that stringent legislation should be drafted to prohibit the publication of hate speech; and that sentencing guidelines should be established for hate crimes.

Dr. Byron L. Sherwin

Distinguished Service Professor at Chicago's Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies* on:

EDITING LIFE: THE GOLEM IN THE BIOTECH CENTURY

The ancient Jewish legend of the Golem--the creation of life through mystical means--has captured the modern imagination. How can this legend be applied to recent and expected developments in bioengineering, genomics and related fields? How does the Golem legend differ from the story of Dr. Frankenstein and his monster? See how Jewish teachings about the creation of artificial beings can help us deal with the challenges of our biotech century.

We are one community

Editorial

One of the most consistently interesting aspects of writing for this paper is getting to know the Jewish community in all its diversity, spanning a continuum from totally secular to devoutly Orthodox, and representing a wide range of interests and backgrounds.

In our feature article in this supplement, "Tough decisions: choices in Jewish education," we spoke to seven parents about the schools they chose for their children and how they integrated Judaism into their world. Although their backgrounds and circumstances are different, these parents all took into account their children's individual needs, personal values, and what works for their families, when making their decisions. We hope their comments will provide food for thought and discussion.

In Toronto, we have a rich network of Jewish day schools – Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, Sephardi, Zionist, arts-oriented, Montessori and special needs. We also have a variety of Jewish day camps and supplementary schools. These formal and informal programs not only educate but create a sense of community and connection.

While it is important to be able to connect with each student, it is also wonderful when students see their schools as a nurturing community. But it is also important to be able to recognize the relevance of each child and every school so that we teach tolerance of each other's views. When we acknowledge that all children are part of the same community regardless of school affiliation and level of observance, doors are open to those who may not have connected to the Jewish community before.

As reporters we do our best to listen to different perspectives so that every part of the community is represented in the paper. Hearing each other's voices forces us to consider new ideas in a constantly changing environment so that we can do our best to make informed decisions.

Why I want to be a teacher

By ALIZA LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

When people ask me what I teach, they are confused when I don't immediately reply "Jewish studies." I don't teach Jewish studies. I teach students.

As a fourth-year student teacher with a month left at Toronto's York University, I am finally in sight of the finish line, a goal I embarked upon when I was only 18.

Guest Voice

Aliza Libman

I'd like to call myself young and naive, but that would be patently untrue. As a child of the 1990s, I have watched the world get crazier and crazier every day. I see a universe where Oscar winners are more newsworthy than ongoing genocide in Darfur. I see a world that accepts Palestinian-Arab nationalism while rejecting Jewish nationalism. I see a world of eroding moral values that prizes only money and shallow pursuits.

I'm young and jaded at 21.

Which is why I need to be a teacher – because I'm pretty certain that if I don't set out to change the world, no one will.

I do instruct students on subjects of Jewish history and Jewish texts. I do help them learn material. And I also facilitate an understanding that a Jewish student's role in the world is to participate in its betterment.

There are more lucrative jobs than teaching, it is true. It's not likely I'll ever be rich. But I suppose if I was the sort of person likely to choose a life path based on the financial compensation for it, I wouldn't be sort of person best suited to become a teacher.

These days most estimates are that one-third of all teachers quit within the first three years. Being a teacher requires passion and commitment and the sense that education is a calling. You can't be a teacher unless you desperately want to teach.

And I do desperately want to teach, because I care about the world, the Jewish community and the people in it. If there is one thing I have discovered, it is that one person can make a big difference. A student can have all the knowledge in the world, but if he or she does not believe in his or her own personal ability to make a difference, what use is the knowledge?

More than memorizing facts and absorbing material, school and adolescence revolve around students learning about themselves and their community and the world around them. A major component of my academic career at York has been community involvement. I have never accepted the fact that I am just another student, and I have been active as a result.

Unfortunately, too few students leave the Jewish school system so empowered. Somewhere between the emphasis on tzedakah and chesed in the younger grades and the exit of our Jewish university graduates into "the real world," their passion, drive and spirit of community service and volunteerism drops off.

I suppose I want to be a teacher because I don't believe the world has to be a shallow, materialistic place. The Jewish community should not have to struggle for active participation in community organizations. And the first step is making sure that students, the future leaders, feel that their involvement will make a difference.

I want to encourage my students to be involved in the Jewish community all their lives. I've been told I'm overly idealistic, but I know that's not the case. I don't plan to impact the way an entire class thinks or feels, I plan to connect to students individually.

I don't see the classroom as a place where I will lecture and present information. I see it as a place I can connect to the future – one student at a time.

Most families no longer fit the traditional mould

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Teachers need to be aware that students come from a variety of family situations, including adoptive or foster families, single parent families, or families with same-sex parents, says Joy Koplowitz, psycho-educational consultant with Jewish Vocational Service of Greater Toronto.

Canadian families are so varied, she said, that in a report by the Vanier Institute of the Family, an Ottawa-based institution dedicated to the well-being of families, it said that no definition can capture their true significance. "Just four in 10 families fit the traditional mould. If you feel like a family, you probably are a family," the report stated.

Koplowitz, who gave a talk last spring at Families with Adoptive Children from Europe (FACE), a support group that addresses topics of concern to adoptive families, said that these children often come to school with a different life history from other children.

Looking at family backgrounds is part of the intake work required when identifying learning disorders, she said, but this is often not possible with adopted children.

"As well, we don't know what effect early bonding has on learning disabilities."

Parents' poor nutrition or their chemical dependencies all contribute to a child's psychological makeup, said Koplowitz, "but [with adopted children, we mostly] don't know about that. We find out very little of a child's roots."

A concern of many of these parents, she says, is how to communicate sensitive issues with the school.

> 'Do you, the teacher, want to be responsible for that child having to review his/her life for a homework project?'

"They want to create a normal family, yet they want the school to know that their family is distinct. We can assist them in determining the resources available at school, and we can help them decide with whom they would be most comfortable speaking."

A foster/adoptive mother who wrote a letter to the Connecticut Association of Foster and Adoptive Parents said that especially frustrating for foster/adoptive parents, or for families in non-traditional situations, is the "all about me" project teachers often assign.

"[This project usually consists] of a series of pictures and a report, and for some children, it is often a reminder that they are different from other kids who have pictures, whose mom and dad talk about memories when they were a baby, and about where they lived and what food they liked," she wrote.

"Our kids may not have access to this history; there are no albums filled with pictures of the first tooth or the first step, or even the first birthday."

Many middle school children are asked to write an autobiography, she wrote, "but what about children whose memories are of physical, sexual or emotional abuse? What of the child who was abandoned or whose parents are incarcerated? Do you, the teacher, want to be responsible for that child having to review his/her life for a homework project?"

She suggested that teachers make a possible list of project topics from which the students can choose. "The next time you assign a project, stop and ask yourself if this project will put a child through needless pain and anxiety," she wrote.

Holocaust study 'not a Jewish issue – it's a human issue'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Lesley Shore, who teaches a course on "Anne Frank and the writing of the adolescent self" at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, says it's important to her that Holocaust education become part of mainstream education, not just Jewish education.

"Studying about the Holocaust is not a Jewish issue. It's a human issue," she said. "I would like to try and open people's minds up to that – not just at OISE, but in the Jewish community."

Lesley Shore

She was pleased that OISE dean Jane Gaskall agreed to mount a recent educational exhibit on Anne Frank, which was on display for almost a month in the school's main-floor library, and visible through its Bloor Street windows. "I believe it's an important step for OISE to do this.

"It means schoolchildren are coming into this building to learn about Anne Frank and the Holocaust." She said more than 1,000 schoolchildren have seen the exhibit.

Frieda Miller

Shore sees it as a step in the right direction that Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty promotes the inclusion of character education in the public school curriculum.

Holocaust education is "not a foundation of the Ontario curriculum," said Shore. To obtain approval for her Holocaust literature course, she had to "justify why there would be a reason" for it, she said.

The course, which she is teaching for the first time this year, is offered to master's students. This year, there are 11 in her class.

There is only a handful of Holocaust-related courses at OISE, although the institute offered a diploma program in holocaust and genocide education for a short time, said Shore.

It's important that beginning teachers know about the Holocaust, she said. She said that a student of hers once expressed embarrassment that, although she'd been educated in Ontario and was now working on her M.Ed. degree, she knew "absolutely nothing" about the Holocaust.

It's difficult to ascertain what is actually being taught in the schools, according to Shore. "The curriculums are designed to give maximum flexibility to the instructor. They're described in terms of larger goals. You can still choose which kinds of vehicles you want. For example, to teach about social justice you can use To Kill a Mockingbird or The Diary of Anne Frank.

"We know that in the Jewish [school] system, teaching about the Holocaust is done from the time children are little, and it's done very well."

For Shore – a native of Winnipeg who lost no relatives in the Holocaust – reading The Diary of Anne Frank as a youngster was "incredibly important" to her. "It gave me insight into the process of female adolescence but also into a historical moment in the history of the Jewish people… I'm sure it has guided my life."

In British Columbia, as in Ontario, school curricula also do not mandate study of the Holocaust. However there are opportunities to teach about it, says Frieda Miller, director of the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre (VHEC), which runs a day symposium for high school students and an annual conference for educators.

In 2000, the VHEC and Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, teamed up to approach the provincial ministry of education about producing a resource guide on the Holocaust that supports and fits into the existing curriculum.

"This means that fantastic ideas for lessons are already there," said Shore. "Teachers are always looking for curriculum that is prepared. It's very user friendly."

"Time pressures and mandated curriculum make it almost impossible for teachers to get through everything," said Miller. "Having resources available makes it easier."

At least in British Columbia, a benchmark for Holocaust education in the public school system could be the provincial exams written by grades 11 and 12 students, Miller believes. "I think until the Holocaust appears as a question [on those exams], teachers are not going to make sure they've taught it."

Tough decisions: choices in Jewish education

By ANNA MORGAN and FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporters

Once the pre-school cap and gown are packed away and the celebratory party is over, parents turn their minds to the next educational hurdle: What school will best fit the needs of their child?

Undoubtedly, most families have begun the decision-making process well before kindergarten ends. Still, many face that first day of Grade 1 wondering whether they have made the right elementary school choice.

This year's CJN Roundtable on education asked seven parents how they decided on a school. What motivated them to make their choices? Was a Jewish education a priority? Did the schools meet their expectations?

The roundtable included parents of children from a wide variety of schools. Parents were chosen because they felt that it was important, in one way or another, to include a Jewish element in their children's education.

Some chose private Jewish schools, others sent their kids to private non-Jewish or public schools. Supplementary Jewish programs, either camps or schools, were used by those parents who didn't send their children to Jewish day schools.

For some parents, learning to engage in Jewish text was an important deciding factor. Larry Krauss, who is Orthodox, said that he wanted his children to be able to "acquire a deep understanding of Jewish tradition, Jewish values and learning skills, as well as the ability to attack a piece of Torah, a Rashi, a mishnah, the Gemarah, because only with those skills could they really plumb the depths of Jewish wisdom that is part of our heritage."

Yet when one son's needs weren't being met at the day school that he and his wife chose, they opted to send him to a school for gifted children. "I do believe the double curriculum [at Jewish day school] is quite challenging," he said, but his son found the work level not to be sufficiently demanding.

For now, he and his wife have hired a rabbi to come teach their son twice a week. They hope that he will be able to "dovetail back into" the Jewish school system in a few years.

"It was a difficult choice," said Krauss, whose three children had attended the same day school since Grade 1.

Elizabeth Pasternak lives downtown and describes her family as "post-denominational." She has three children in day school and says she is very pleased. "I wanted my kids to have a Jewish education because I wanted them to be Jewishly literate, to learn how to be a good person, and to feel positive about Judaism."

Sometimes, however, "in a Jewish school you may struggle with the feeling that your kids are too isolated from the rest of the world. But, behind that, you have the idea that wherever you come from, it's important to have that positive feeling about your background. Then you're able to meet the rest of the world and jam with people from different cultures and different religions because you know your heritage and you feel proud of it."

Perhaps if there had been no Jewish school downtown, she would have sought one out in the suburbs, she said, but she had concerns about "transplanting" her children to a school that didn't reflect their day-to-day life.

"[Living downtown] our children see homelessness and cultural differences every day. For them, tzedakah is very real. The school came along at the right time."

Other issues of importance to her were that the school be nurturing, open to all denominations, teach her children critical thinking skills, and allow them to dig deep into Jewish traditions in a thoughtful process.

Laura (who, like the remaining participants in the roundtable, preferred to be referred to by a pseudonym), grew up in a small Jewish community, and found that having Jewish day school as an option for her children in Toronto was "so thrilling."

> 'There are issues at every school'

But in the end she felt her children were "let down" by their Jewish school. It turned out they "didn't fit the mould," she said. "Each one was a particularly able learner… At that point, the view was that any school that teaches two languages [offers enough of a challenge]." One of her children was given the task of helping his classmates learn, instead of being given material that would challenge him, she recalled.

"It's disappointing to not be able to keep a kid in that system."

When her children were in day school, and later in after-school programs, it was always important to Laura's family that they live a Jewish life.

"Judaism begins at home. You can choose a non-Jewish or a Jewish day school, but it will be meaningless unless you live a Jewish life and are connected with a synagogue. Otherwise, it always feels as if you're just tacking something on," Laura said.

Ellen opted for private non-Jewish schools for her children's elementary education but a Jewish high school for two of her three kids.

However, she says, "we really didn't have a plan. There was no Jewish day school in our area." Her children's Jewish learning came mostly from family experiences, supplementary Hebrew school and summer camp, she said.

Two of her three children ended up in the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's new stream program, for students who have not attended day school previously. "It's been a very positive experience."

But there are issues at every school, said Ellen, who has a graduate degree in education. She cautioned that new stream students "have to buy into it Judaically. You can't do all that extra work and not buy into it.

"I found that my kids' needs were met at CHAT," Ellen said. She noted that she was involved in their schools behind the scenes all the way through.

She pointed out that many issues are being dealt with in the Jewish school system. "There's now a gifted consultant. It's not perfect, but there's been movement."

Only one parent didn't even consider Jewish day schools for her three children. "If we had had the money, we would have tried the private Hebrew day school system," said Naomi, a day school alumna.

"I think it's a chutzpah to expect that regular families can afford $25,000 a year [the approximate cost for three children] to start. We don't have that kind of money hanging about, so the decision was made for us. It breaks my heart."

Applying for tuition subsidies was not a route she wanted to take, she said.

Naomi said her children's supplementary school provides them with a Jewish community, but sometimes her children already know what is being taught because they have learned it at home.

She and her husband are involved in their synagogue, their children attend a Jewish summer camp, and they have taken a family trip to Israel, she said. "We don't live in a Jewish neighbourhood, so I feel we have to really work at it in our private life."

Fern – whose family is affiliated with the Conservative movement and attends synagogue regularly – took her daughter out of the Jewish day school system just before she reached middle school.

"She learned a lot, grew a lot, and really liked [the Jewish school], but it wasn't right for her," said Fern, who noted that her new school was better suited to her daughter's learning style.

Fern ended up putting both her children into the public school near her home and supplemented their Jewish education with Hebrew school and an after-school synagogue program.

"My children now love their school," Fern said, adding that they are also happy with their Jewish supplementary programs.

But she had mixed feelings when she happened to pass by their old school and see children celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Problem gambling affects students

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For most people, gambling is a diversion, a recreational activity, an entertaining night out. But for a growing percentage of the population – including kids not yet old enough to drive – gambling ranks alongside alcohol and drug abuse as behaviour that can turn lives upside down.

Researchers are only now beginning to study youth gambling in depth, but early findings show the risks of teenage problem gambling.

It mean a loss of focus in young lives – or rather, a focus on nothing but the next gambling fix. It can lead to falling grades, followed by dropping out of school entirely. Financial difficulties, the loss of old friends and even thoughts of suicide are also problems.

The government of Ontario, which rakes in more than $2 billion from gambling, is funding research into the problem through the Ontario Problem Gambling Research Centre (OPGRC). The agency recently announced $2.4 million in grants to study the issue.

In one report published in 2001, An Examination of the Differential Coping Styles of Adolescents With Gambling Problems, researchers found that in Ontario, 63 per cent of adolescents in grades 7 to 12 gambled at least once in the previous year, and 23 per cent reported they gambled on a weekly basis.

The report classified 2.7 per cent of youth as "probable pathological gamblers," and 6.6 per cent as at risk of developing severe problems. Fifty-four per cent were called social gamblers. The rest were classified as non-gamblers.

Other research estimates that the number of problem gamblers is even higher. McGill University's International Centre for Youth Gambling Problems and High Risk Behaviours reports on its website that "between 4 per cent and 6 per cent of teenagers may be considered probable pathological gamblers, with an additional 10 to 15 per cent that may be considered at risk of developing a gambling problem."

Judith GlynWilliams, the OPGRC's director of grant operations, cautioned that the full extent of problem gambling among youth remains unclear, because surveys used to determine gambling levels were originally designed for adults and may not translate accurately to teens.

Still, OPGRC research indicated that 18-24 year olds experience twice the rate of problem gambling as adults, and they don't develop the problem on their 18th birthdays, she said.

"We live in a gambling-saturated culture," GlynWilliams said, pointing to four commercial casinos in Ontario, five charity casinos and some 16 race tracks that have slot machines.

As well, studies show that almost everyone in the province lives within a one- or two-hour drive of a casino, and $6 billion is spent annually on gambling.

"Gambling is integrated into our daily lives" through billboards, radio and TV ads and plots on television programs, she said.

While most people enjoy gambling as a leisure activity, for those experiencing emotional stress, depression or disorder in their lives, gambling becomes an escape, a coping mechanism, she added.

What's more, kids don't fully understand the odds against them winning and mistakenly believe they can devise a system to improve their chances, she said.

Isabel Martin, prevention specialist at the McGill research centre, said studies indicate that people with a gambling problem are likely to also have problems handling drug, alcohol or other substances.

Young people – some as young as 12, and many of whom have enjoyed fast-paced video games – see gambling as an activity that is sanctioned by the government and therefore can't be harmful, she said.

"Gambling is so promoted with tons of publicity, so, of course [young] people think it's harmless," Martin said.

Video lottery terminals are popular among young gamblers because of their wide availability in bars, restaurants and bowling alleys, while young people also enjoy betting on sports, playing cards and taking a chance on a scratch-and-win ticket, Martin said.

Poker is becoming increasingly popular in schools. "In the last few years, it's become the big thing," she said.

Problem gamblers share certain negative characteristics, she said. They often have low self-confidence and low self-esteem, they may suffer from attention deficit disorder, their parents may be pathological gamblers, there may be a family history of neglect, and problem gamblers are three times more likely to be male than female.

Martin said parents can look for early signs of problem gambling, such as a constant preoccupation with gambling; ignoring school work to ponder how and where to gamble; coming home with expensive new clothes, CDs or jewelry from winnings; and giving gifts to friends.

The problem can be addressed by providing kids with problem-solving skills, helping to boost their self-esteem and by giving them ways to resist peer pressure, she said.

The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) recently put an end to minor gambling at the school. "[Students] were playing cards and we stopped it," said Rabbi Chaim Sacknowitz, the school's director of guidance.

But gambling at CHAT "is not a problem," he said. "It's not as if it's an epidemic at the school."

Only a small number of teens out of a student body of 823 at CHAT's southern campus were involved, the rabbi said. "It's certainly not a major issue… We haven't heard of kids who were addicted."

He said the teens who were playing cards were merely filling spare time.

School provides kids with a Jewish community

"I would love them to have that experience, but I have to go with my kids and where they're happy. I'm thrilled that they're happy where they're at. This was the right thing to do."

One parent focused on the fact that Jewish values were not really taught at any of his children's schools. Although three of his five children are still in the Jewish day school system, Alan, whose family is observant, said that it has been a real disappointment that teachers and administrators don't always model Jewish ethics.

"In many of our schools, technicalities are taught, but the school doesn't model real Jewish ethical behaviour."

Despite that, and despite the fact he believes public schools are as good if not better academically than Jewish schools, he said he believes choosing a Jewish school is "still the right thing."

BJE offers help for teachers of gifted students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Things are changing, albeit slowly, for gifted students in the Jewish school system.

Joanne Foster serves as gifted education consultant to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, working with teachers on an individual basis and running seminars for groups to help them meet the needs of their high-ability learners. Until three years ago, however, her position didn't exist.

At a recent forum for parents of gifted children – the second of three this school year – Foster, who works for the BJE's special education arm, Tikun Chaim, heard from some frustrated parents like the ones who said that some kids are just handed a book or "stuck in front of a computer because teachers don't know what to do with them."

"Have the teacher call me," advised Foster, whose services are free to BJE schools. "Teachers may not be aware of the possibilities that exist and may think that being able to differentiate programming will be time and labour intensive. Once it's in place, it facilitates what happens in the classroom."

She noted that it's important for parents to work with teachers in a collaborative way. "You are your child's best advocate," she said.

For teachers, she has three "key words:" flexibility, sensitivity (to children's needs), and collaboration (with one another, with consultants, and with parents).

Foster, who began her career as an educator 30 years ago and teaches gifted studies and educational psychology at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, is passionate about her work.

"I love what I do. I believe in what I do. I am committed to making things better for these kids," she said.

Debbie Gladstone, director of Tikun Chaim, said parents can also work with school administrators and boards to facilitate help from Tikun Chaim. "You have to work with [them] to make the changes."

Joanne Foster

Foster recently co-authored a book, Being Smart about Gifted Children: A Guidebook for Parents and Educators (Great Potential Press). The detailed compendium devotes a whole chapter to parent advocacy. It is being used as a textbook at OISE and at Hunter College of the City University of New York.

Through the BJE, Foster works with teachers to help them program for high-ability students, a term she likes because it includes students who have not formally been identified as gifted. She also conducts workshops based on a specific subject area or grade level.

But in-school programs have to be initiated by individual schools. "It's happening," she said, "but I would like to see it happen to a greater extent."

In many cases, students are adequately challenged by the dual track program in Jewish day schools, she said. "However, let's say you have a child who's very strong in math or science. That's really not going to be addressed through learning a second language."

There are "a huge number" of gifted kids in the Jewish day school system who would benefit from "differentiated programming," said Foster. Also, she noted, such changes enrich the entire class, not just those children who are more advanced. "It's doable," she said.

She cautioned, however, that "gifted" is "a very loaded word, a label that can cause a child to feel different from peers," and that there is no such thing as a typical gifted child.

Her definition involves "a level of subject mastery exceptional for a child's age or grade."

Issues related to giftedness include motivation, perfectionism, social and emotional issues including boredom and frustration in school and how to access good resources.

Both for gifted and other children, Foster advises, tasks should be matched to ability, and lessons should be as relevant as possible.

Her advice for parents and teachers who want to motivate their children includes having enthusiasm for the subject, conveying faith in the students' ability to learn, being caring and respectful, creating a relaxed atmosphere, and giving positive reinforcement.

Parents who want to have their children tested for giftedness should make sure the tests are interpreted properly, she said. Three chapters of her book deal with testing issues.

The BJE, in conjunction with York University, is now offering a certificate in special education to teachers within the Jewish school system. The program, in its pilot year, has a first cohort of 25 teachers, and a second cohort is planned for next year.

"We are trying," said Gladstone.

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is May 6th, 2005.

Balancing the bar with the mitzvah

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Decisions, decisions.

Angela, a 12-year-old with braces and curly hair, can't decide whether to buy a Rolling Stones CD for Josh's bar mitzvah present or a book about Phish, a band she knows he likes. Should she go with a Tiffany bracelet for Rachel's bat mitzvah or a set of hanging earrings?

Planning the bar and bat mitzvah itself can be time consuming and expensive enough for many families. On top of that, since many school committees ask parents to invite the entire class and most gifts vary between $18 and $36, the year-long gift-giving process can sometimes become quite onerous.

Since it is often the mothers who have to do the shopping, it makes sense that some women have come up with an alternative to the multi-stop shopping experience. Recently, a group of parent volunteers decided to launch an Israel Bonds bar/bat mitzvah program as a way to combine gift giving with an important cause.

According to Laura Orzy, chair of the Israel Bonds Education Division, the program, which is now being offered at some Jewish day schools, is also being reviewed by parents at several non-Jewish schools, including Bishop Strachan School, a private girls' school, as a possible gift choice for Jewish students who attend the school.

Bond money funds the building of bridges, power plants, water desalination and filtration plants and many other projects that help Israel's economic foundation

The intent of the program is not only to make gift giving easier for the parents and the kids, but as Orzy says, to emphasize the mitzvah in the bar mitzvah.

"We begin with a video in the schools," so that the students are involved in the process, Orzy said. The kids then ask questions that vary in nature from "Does this mean I won't get any presents?" to "What interest rate do the bonds pay?"

"Where does the money go?" is a common question. The answer, said Raquel Benzacar-Savatti, director of Israel Bonds Women's Division, is infrastructure. Bond money funds the building of bridges, power plants, water desalination and filtration plants and many other projects that help Israel's economic foundation.

The program also educates children on the importance of philanthropy and giving, Benzacar-Savatti said.

Once the school's parents decide to support the program, each parent contributes a predetermined amount at the beginning of the year. For example, if the committee decides on $20 a child and there are 40 kids in the grade, each parent will submit $800 at the beginning of the year and the bonds will all be purchased at that time.

This prevents problems that may arise due to interest rate fluctuations, Benzacar-Savatti said.

It's a complicated process, but once the parents and kids understand what Israel Bonds is all about, pretty much all the kids want to be a part of the program, Orzy added.

Angela isn't one of those kids. She remembers the morning after she finally read her haftorah in synagogue, gave her d'var Torah and said goodbye to the last guest at her bat mitzvah party.

"Opening up my presents was one of the best parts of the event," Angela said, and then she added, "I don't want my bat mitzvah to be all work and no fun."

Ellen Hennick, a parent in one of the schools considering the issue, said that "there has to be a way to implement a program like this without depriving the kids of the enjoyment of receiving presents."

While Hennick agrees that the moral lessons are important, she is concerned that politically correct values are forcing parents to buy into a program they may not really want.

"While some kids come from very wealthy homes where one more present doesn't really mean that much, others really look forward to each and every gift," she said.

Hennick believes the school should be teaching the value of tzedakah and then the children and their families can decide whether they want to give a personalized present or a charitable one based on each child's personality and needs.

If it is a school-wide program implemented by some parents, other people's values get forced on the entire community, Hennick said.

"And for some kids, the giving of one gift for each and every child takes away the acknowledgement that this is their special year."

Universities vs. colleges: 'do your homework'

By SHERI SHEFA
Special to The CJN

While universities and colleges have different styles in the way they prepare students for the working world, one institution is not necessarily better than the other, Jane Rendely says.

Universities and colleges each have their strengths and weaknesses, but the key to a good education is whether the program is a proper fit for the student.

"They're both good, but a lot of it depends on the program and a lot of it depends on the student," says Rendely, a career and education consultant.

Choosing a post-secondary institution is an investment in both time and money, so students must understand what each has to offer before making one of the most important decisions of their lives.

"At a university, you're usually getting a broader education, depending on whether you are specializing in a specific field," Rendely says.

She adds that universities are usually stepping-stones for more education. For instance, if someone wants to become a professional, like a lawyer or a doctor, they need to have an undergraduate university degree to be able to go on to medical school or law school.

When you go to a community college, it's more practical and hands-on. There are usually internship programs that allow students to make contacts in the working world, she says.

In terms of choosing whether university or college is a good fit, knowing what you want to study is only half the battle.

Rendely, who has been working with students for 20 years, says that the best thing to do, no matter what path students decide to take, is to consult with a guidance counsellor as early as Grade 11 to ensure that they are taking all the necessary steps to get into the school of their choice.

"Some people feel they can do it on their own, but some feel they can benefit from the guidance of a career counsellor," she says.

Before students decide where to go, they have to consider whether their grades and qualifications meet the standards of the school they are applying to. Because getting into the school of their choice is never a sure thing, Rendely says it is important "not to put all your eggs in one basket" and to have a back-up plan in mind.

But just because a school offers the program a student wants, doesn't mean it is the right school for him or her. Rendely suggests students do a self-assessment, as well as aptitude testing to see which course or school will suit the individual best.

"You have to do your homework. You have to understand yourself as a person and as a student."

Tzedakah boxes, above, are among those that will be on display from Mar. 30 to Apr. 5 at the Koffler Centre's Loggia Gallery.

Tzedakah box fundraiser to finance schools' art programs

By SHERI SHEFA
Special to The CJN

By turning pushkes into works of art, Cheryl Landy hopes the Jewish community will learn that art is very much a part of Jewish culture and that tzedakah isn't just about a little blue box.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Toronto Jewish Arts Council have come together to create a program that calls on artists to contribute original artwork in the form of a tzedakah box. The hope is that this project will expose the community to Jewish artists and raise money to integrate art into schools, says Landy, the Toronto Jewish Arts Council's cultural co-ordinator.

'Jewish art is influenced by Judaism in a modern way'

"Jewish art is influenced by Judaism in a modern way and no one has seemed to tap into that," she says.

Both Landy and Cyrel Troster, the chair of the council, hope that this event will help exhibit the kind of talent that is going largely unrecognized in this city.

Troster says that whatever profit they get from the sale of the tzedakah boxes will be used for educational purposes. She hopes they will have the means to hire artists to go into schools to work with teachers and create programs for students to enrich the community.

This type of event has been done before, says Landy, but this is the first time it is happening in Toronto. Her goal is to turn it into an annual event, and she hopes the Jewish community will come to know the names of the artists.

Troster says the artists who are participating in this project have an incredible range of talent.

"The boxes are really beautiful. It's interesting to see what people are doing and we're really excited by this," Troster says.

"The response has been phenomenal. The amount of work [the artists] have put into the project is unbelievable," Landy says.

With the exhibit still weeks away, they had already received more than 80 boxes, and expected to get many more.

The boxes, which are made from all kinds of materials, including ceramic, wood, metal and felt, will be on display from March 30 to April 5 at the Koffler Centre's Loggia Gallery. People can come to see the display without charge, but if they want to buy a tzedakah box at $180, they have to buy a ticket to register.

Landy says the order in which they register is the order in which they will be able to choose a box. Those who do not want to buy a ticket, but want to buy a box, can do so after the event is over and all those who bought tickets have had the opportunity to choose a pushke.

On April 5, there will be a gala at which the public can meet the artists.

For more information and for tickets to the gala, call Shelley Rothman at 416-635-2883, ext. 137.

Hebrew: Why do some kids hate it?

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

According to Israeli lore, the minute Eliezer Ben-Yehuda arrived in Palestine in 1881, he began speaking Hebrew, even though his wife and children could not understand a word.

For the man most credited with the revival of Hebrew, the importance of ensuring one unifying language for the Jewish people became a passion. Given the extent of Jewish diversity, he foresaw the importance of creating a unifying foundation of identity.

Some see Hebrew as the language that continues to bond a people through prayer and religion. Others see it as Israel's primary national treasure. As Israeli novelist Amos Oz indicated in a recent lecture, Hebrew has spread outside the domain of the rabbis and is now used by about eight million people around the world. In fact, Oz pointed out that many Israeli Arabs speak Hebrew as the language in which they are educated and employed.

> 'Being able to study Hebrew at CHAT is a real gift'

But let's just imagine how Ben-Yehuda's children must have felt. If the legend is true, they certainly experienced one of the most effective ways to learn a second language – complete and total immersion by a parent. Frustrating? Probably. Did they learn it? Undoubtedly.

These days, learning Hebrew is one of the more difficult rites of passage at most Jewish day schools. In fact, some educators believe that the teaching of any second language has become an incredible challenge.

"All second language teaching in the English speaking world has declined as English has ascended as a primary language," said Paul Shaviv, the headmaster at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Shaviv attributes the problem to the decline of the teaching of basic grammar in elementary schools. "The students just don't have a formal base when they get to high school."

CHAT, however, is committed to the use and understanding of the Hebrew language and Shaviv points out that its recently released mission statement affirms that part of the CHAT philosophy is to embrace Hebrew as one element of "the totality of the Jewish experience."

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, said Hebrew is not only a key to studying Torah and sacred text, but it is the link that binds Jews around the world.

Rabbi Goldstein said that while on sabbatical recently, she travelled around the world with her family. Hebrew opened up doors to dialogue in almost every country they stopped in.

Many of her students today are frustrated that they can't study text in Hebrew. They feel as if "learning Torah in English is like looking at its meaning through a shower curtain," she said.

Five years ago, Kolel began a city-wide learning "Marathon for Hebrew Literacy," which has become an annual event involving seven different organizations, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

Since the program began, thousands of people from 19 locations across Canada have been involved. They are all people who want to understand Hebrew so that they can engage in more rigorous learning sessions.

"Being able to study Hebrew at CHAT is a real gift," Rabbi Goldstein said.

So why do so many kids hate it so much?

Michael Feldman, a parent of a former CHAT student, believes the situation arises because of the way Hebrew is taught.

According to Feldman, the curriculum and methodology have not changed in quite awhile, and the fact that Hebrew language study is compulsory means there is no real driving force to make the courses any better.

The four Jewish studies courses required for all students at CHAT include Jewish history, Tanach, rabbinics and Hebrew. While there are different levels for each class, from new stream – where almost everything is taught in English – to enriched classes, Hebrew language instruction is required of everyone.

Feldman, who is a firm believer in competition, said that if Hebrew was an option, it would force educators to improve the way it is taught.

Teachers focus too closely on grammar because it facilitates the grading process. "It's easier to mark papers that are focused on only grammar," he said.

"But people learn languages through their ears rather than their eyes," he added, suggesting that there must be a more effective way to teach Hebrew.

Feldman,whose children also attended Jewish elementary day schools, said he's disappointed that with all the language instruction his children have had, they still can't really speak Hebrew.

BJE: not the Toronto District School Board

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Seymour Epstein, executive director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, expounds on the role of Toronto's BJE with ease.

He talks about its status as part of the federation and its role in the professional development of teachers, and he discusses the board's mandate – which extends beyond its 70 affiliated Jewish day schools and supplementary schools to adult education and, most recently, to informal education such as youth groups and summer camps.

Seymour Epstein

He also speaks readily about what the BJE is not. It differs from a public school board in several key areas, he explains with a patience that belies the countless times he has likely explained this before.

"The Toronto District School Board owns the [public] schools, pays the salaries of the teachers, and directs and writes curriculum. We don't control curriculum, we don't hire teachers, we don't control salaries or negotiate with unions. We're dealing with autonomous institutions with their own boards, but most important, their own ideologies and their own pedagogies, their own philosophy of teaching."

The BJE's stated mission is to foster Jewish education "in all of its dimensions, for the community."

Its three main goals, Epstein said in an interview at his Lipa Green Building office, are to work toward access for every person in the Jewish community; to enhance teaching and learning curricula; and to broaden Jewish education to include special education, adult education and informal education.

For the most part, the BJE operates as a "facilitator," he said.

There are, however, guidelines for schools that are funded by and/or affiliated with the BJE. They cover areas such as school governance, financial viability and academic standards.

School board members must be "annual contributors to the UJA in good standing," a strict requirement that Epstein said applies equally to parents whose children's tuition is subsidized. Even if a UJA donation is very modest, it's "a minimum requirement for being part of the community… a statement that you believe in communal charity. We believe there's a great benefit."

Compliance to BJE requirements is monitored by "a very hard-working committee of lay people and professionals. It's a very large part of our work," said Epstein, a native of Toronto who began his career teaching at United Synagogue Day School in 1968.

The BJE's "Affiliation & Funding Requirements" booklet – a document that is available to parents of children in the system – specifies that funded day schools must submit audited financial statements on an annual basis, but its timelines for pedagogical reviews are less specific, referring only to "timely" reviews.

In most cases, that refers to a maximum three-year period, but sometimes experts are called in sooner if a problem at a school is brought to the board's attention, Epstein said.

Parental complaints are handled by senior BJE staff, but they make it clear to parents that the first step should always be to try and address a problem within the school, he said.

Sometimes, "substantive issues" raised by parents will lead to new BJE professional development programs, he said.

"A good example is the whole issue of bullying [and related] policies and preventive procedures."

"We take those parents' issues very seriously, but that's not the prime function of the BJE."

The board has acted as a mediator between parents and schools, he said, but the board is "not in a position to impose our involvement."

There is however, at least one case in which a school is facing imminent loss of BJE affiliation and funding for not complying with BJE guidelines. "It's a very, very dramatic step for us… We're always prepared to review and look again."

In another case, he said, the board recently learned about a school that was using a textbook that violates BJE guidelines for curricula to "demonstrate positive attitudes to and respect for the Jewish community in all of its diversity."

The textbook contained material that "could teach in a much better fashion, stressing community values and ahavat Yisrael [love of the Jewish community] rather than denigrating one area of Jewish life... We are asking that the school reconsider [using the book]," Epstein said.

The federation believes very strongly in diversity and pluralism, said Epstein. "We would hope that the schools share those views."

However, he acknowledged, "schools to the right of centre find it more difficult to identify with pluralism," as do some schools at the other end of the spectrum.

Epstein said that, in his 5½ years with the board, he has found that board-imposed standards are often less effective than school-initiated efforts. "Those are the best success stories."

He is also a big believer in incentives. "I'm not convinced that imposition of standards is a major factor for change in schools. We have a program called Etgar. It means challenge. [Teachers] can come to us in teams of three or four and give us an idea for a curriculum. We will fund them to develop that."

The most successful Etgar project – a collaboration between three day school teachers – has just been turned into the book Telling our Story: A History of the Jews in Canada to 1920. Epstein had a hot-off-the-press copy in his office late last month.

"We could have published this ourselves and imposed it [as a textbook]," he said. "The fact it came from teachers, not from my staff, is exciting."

Epstein, commonly known as Epi, oversees a staff equivalent to between 12 and 15 full-time employees, with an annual budget of just over $12 million, $8 million of which goes to tuition subsidies administered by the schools.

The board also helps schools train lay people about the tuition subsidy process, which critics have described as being intrusive or even humiliating.

More than 2,000 children receive tuition assistance, he noted. In determining a family's qualification for subsidies, schools must walk a fine line between fiscal responsibility and compassion, Epstein pointed out. "It's a very complicated business."

The other $4 million of the BJE budget is used for services the board provides to schools, such as grants and special education consulting.

BJE funding is provided by UJA Federation, but, Epstein noted, the BJE "is not like other agencies that are funded by the federation. We're [actually] part of the federation."

Teenage boys: lazy or ingenious?

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I recently attended parent-teacher conferences at my sons' high school. Like hundreds of other parents, I spent the afternoon scrambling between appointments with a dozen or so teachers.

In between I schmoozed with other parents I knew – neighbours, former neighbours, mothers of camp friends, mothers of players and former players on the hockey team – mainly mothers of boys in grades 9 and 10.

Basically, we all commiserated with each other, because most of us were hearing a similar litany of concerns about our sons: "He's not reaching his potential. He's not participating. He's fooling around. He's not paying attention. He's not doing his homework. He's not handing in assignments."

That last complaint was particularly troubling to most of us. These boys must realize that assignments affect their grades. Do they really not care?

Apparently. We mothers all seem to hear the same sorry excuse for low grades. It's what I call a minimalist approach to education. The boys think that doing a minimal amount of work is perfectly acceptable until they apply to college and university, when grades actually count for something.

The general attitude seems to be: Why tax the brain unnecessarily?

One mother lamented that her 15-year old son is failing math, but he's been able to calculate to the exact fraction of a decimal point the mark he needs on his final exam to pass the course. In fact, he's done a similar calculation for every subject.

So is this a classic example of teenage boys' ingenuity or innate laziness, or both?

I realize that there are boys out there who are great students. I just don't know very many between the ages of 13 and 16.

It's not as if parents like me don't try to get our kids to study. We nag our boys about schoolwork – all the time it seems. We just don't get much compliance.

There's too much competition from Game Cube, Xbox, computer games, MSN, The Simpsons and the Family Guy. It's a never-ending battle that can get pretty exhausting, because our boys just wanna have fun. As one of my three sons put it: "Mom you don't think we should have any time to relax. You want us to work all the time." Yeah, right.

I hear from mothers of girls that their daughters actually do homework on their own without being told. They know where their books are. They take notes in class. They don't lose assignment sheets. They study for tests. And of course, they get decent grades. It's no wonder girls are outperforming boys in almost every subject.

The statistics are pretty sobering for parents of boys. A recent Statistics Canada report says that women make up 57 per cent of all full-time university students. The statistics show that women have pretty well closed the gender gap in medicine and law, both male-dominated professions in my day. Now male and female enrolment in medicine is almost equal and there are about five per cent more women in law school.

Looking back on my own high school experience, I don't recall any remarkable differences in academic performance between the genders. The public high school I attended in Montreal was predominantly Jewish. Almost all of us went on to university.

But university seemed to separate the girls from the boys. Careers were secondary for women. Few of us considered law, medicine or business, which meant that getting into these programs was far less competitive for our male counterparts. The standing joke was that women of my generation went to university to get their "MRS."

How times have changed. There's no stopping female students now. They have drive and ambition. In fact, they have become such high performers that at this rate, women could eventually become our main wage earners.

More grim news for our young men. And more worries for us parents. So how can we prepare our boys for the future?

I plan to take a pragmatic approach with my boys. I'll be giving them the same advice I got from my mother: "Find yourself a nice Jewish doctor."

Secular education is a contentious issue in the Orthodox world

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Orthodox young people should, along with a rigorous religious education, receive an excellent secular education, so that they can take their place in the world with pride and confidence.

Orthodox young people should, along with a rigorous religious education, be exposed only to that secular education essential to support a family and satisfy government regulations. This will protect them against the potentially destructive influences of the outside society.

'Just what is going on?'

Two directly contrasting approaches to secular education, posited by members, supposedly, of the same community.

Just what is going on?

For centuries, Jews in European countries had practically no opportunity to study secular subjects, even if they had wanted to. Girls, it was assumed, would pick up anything they had to learn from their mothers, aunts, and grandmothers. They learned to read, so that they could pray, they learned some Bible stories, and, most important, learned how to run a Jewish home.

Boys learned Torah and Talmud and, sometimes, if they were lucky, some sort of a trade.

The situation began to change with the Enlightenment, a movement designed to bring Jews into the modern world. Beginning in Germany, Poland, and central Europe, by the late 18th century it spread to Lithuania and other areas of the Pale of Settlement.

Even then there was conflict between those who supported the Enlightenment, called maskilim, and those who were opposed to it. Unlike the present day, however, the divide was virtually impermeable. So violent did the conflict become, that there are many stories of rabbis being forced out of positions, schools being closed, and genuine persecution of the other side.

Rabbi Shimshon Rafael Hirsch, a noted Torah commentator and scholar and spiritual leader in Berlin and later Frankfurt, is considered the father of modern German Orthodoxy. He espoused a concept called torah u'maddah, Torah and secular knowledge. Torah, he said, could only be strengthened by learning about the modern world, and participating in it. It should be noted that this philosophy insisted that study of Torah and living according to its precepts is the primary responsibility of every Jew.

On the other hand, the yeshivot in the late 19th century continued to insist on not just the primacy of Torah, but saw it as the only acceptable focus of Jewish education. In fact, in 1892, when the Russian government demanded that the Volozhin yeshiva, one of the pre-eminent yeshivot in the world, include a substantial amount of secular studies in its curriculum, the rosh yeshiva, Rabbi Naftali Tzvi Yehuda Berlin, refused to agree and the yeshiva was closed.

The debate between torah u'maddah and the traditional view of education is still current.

Torah u'maddah is probably best exemplified by New York's Yeshiva University. Its Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary supplies rabbis to the centrist Orthodox community. At the same time, the university has faculties of medicine, dentistry, social work, law, biology and more.

The concept is seen most strongly in Toronto in the Bnei Akiva Schools, Or Chaim yeshiva for boys and Ulpanat Orot for girls. Secular studies are given approximately the same number of hours of the school day as religious subjects. The students, often after a year or two studying at yeshivot or seminaries in Israel, are strongly encouraged to get a university education.

Other yeshivot in the city, including Ner Israel and Darchei Noam, acknowledge that some of their student body – all male – will choose to go for further secular study, although it is not specifically encouraged, and prepare them to at least be able to go if they choose.

Others give the least possible time to secular studies.

On a recent tour of North American Jewish communities, Rabbi Aharon Leib Shteinman, a leader of the haredi population in Israel, and a strong advocate of moving children from the secular education system to the haredi one, made this comment on education for boys, as reported by Dei'ah veDibur; a window into the Chareidi World:

'Treif studies' called a 'terrible danger'

"HaRav Shteinman called on his listeners to devote themselves to Torah alone, saying that every bochur should avoid turning his thoughts to any other matter."

Later in the tour, answering the questions of educators, "he spoke about the terrible danger of treif studies, including university studies, saying that this trend must be combated. He also spoke out against the ambition to educate youth for tachlis [a specific profession]."

Rabbi Shteinman also talked about education for women. He said that there is "the obligation incumbent on the Jewish mother to fully dedicate herself to her children's education in Torah... The goal of bnos Yisroel [Jewish daughters] is not to be highly educated in secular studies... and even if advanced studies in a certain area are needed, certainly one should strive to limit them as much as possible."

The conflict in the goals and methods of education between those supporting torah u'maddah and those opposed to it mirrors the conflict between those referred to as centrist or modern Orthodox, and those who are haredi, or ultra-Orthodox, or whatever term is used. Will Jewish survival and Jewish blossoming be better served by trying to meld secular and religious worlds, or instead by remaining immersed in the Torah lifestyle and thus, it is hoped, impervious to the assault of the outside influences? That is the important question, and its resolution may well determine what kind of Jewish community our children will inherit.

Canada accepted 134 Israeli refugee claims in 2004

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Despite Israel's ongoing diplomatic efforts to end the practice, Canada continues to recognize and accept refugees from the Jewish state, believing their tales of persecution.

Figures released to The CJN last week show that in 2004, Canada accepted 134 Israeli citizens who successfully argued that they had a "well-founded fear of persecution" should they be returned to Israel.

The Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) finalized 592 cases from Israel, rejecting 366 claims. The rest were either abandoned or withdrawn.

The overall acceptance rate of Israeli refugees last year was 23 per cent, the highest since 1994, with the exception of 2003, when it was 26 per cent.

Israel ranked 16th overall last year as a source of refugee claims, sandwiched between Brazil and Hungary. Claims from Israel exceeded those from Bangladesh and the Democratic Republic of Congo.

It's not known how many of the Israelis granted asylum by Canada are Jews or Israeli Arabs, but Israel has long maintained that for the most part, they are Jews who left former Soviet republics and came to Israel under the Law of Return, which grants them immediate citizenship.

The issue has been a sore point between Canada and Israel since 1989, when the first wave of Jews were allowed to leave the Soviet Union. Since then, Israel has been trying to persuade Canada that ex-Soviets are taking advantage of the Law of Return to springboard to other countries.

Israel has always denied that it produces refugees, saying claimants' stories of persecution are spurious.

Typically, claimants allege that while in the Jewish state, they were harassed, denied jobs and housing, and even beaten because of mixed marriages or questionable Jewish status.

Canada's acceptance rate of Israeli refugees peaked in 1991 at 69 per cent of all claims. The lowest acceptance rate was two per cent, in 1998.

In years past, most of the successful claims in Canada were made in Montreal.

According to a recent report in the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz, some 74,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union left Israel between 1990 and 2000. About 40,000 of those went West, with Canada being a favourite destination.

Israel's absorption ministry says about nine per cent of emigrés from former Soviet republics leave Israel.

In a statement, Israel's embassy in Ottawa said the Jewish state "is a democracy that regards multiculturalism and successful immigrants' absorption as prime values. It is unfortunate that some Israeli citizens who were seeking to immigrate to Canada have opted for submitting bogus claims for asylum here, thus deliberately misleading Canadian immigration authorities about their past and personal background."

Embassy spokesperson Ofir Gendelman noted that "in more than a few cases," refugee claimants have used fake Israeli passports to enter Canada illegally and asked for asylum only when they were in the process of being deported.

The embassy added that Israel was established as a haven for persecuted Jews from all over the world. Thus, "it is saddening to see that this fact is being blatantly ignored by people who would do anything to cynically promote their own selfish interests."

Winnipeg community growing, federation says

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After four decades of decline, Winnipeg's Jewish community may finally be growing again.

While the 2001 census showed another drop in the Jewish population here of about 500 to 14,765 between 1991 and 2001, Faye Rosenberg-Cohen, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's planning director, estimates that the community has actually grown by about 500 people since the census was taken.

"We don't have an actual number," Rosenberg-Cohen said in an overview of community demographics that she presented to a small group earlier this month at the Asper Jewish Community Centre.

She said the community's aggressive recruitment of Jewish immigrants has attracted more than 100 families from Argentina in the past three years. There has also been a good-sized influx of families from the former Soviet Union by way of Israel.

"You can see that enrolment is up in at the Gray Academy [a junior kindergarten to high school Hebrew school]," she noted. "And we gave out quite a number of baby baskets last year."

The Winnipeg Jewish community's population peaked at 19,376 in 1961.

Its demographic woes have mirrored provincial population trends. And in addition to a 40-year decline, Winnipeg's Jewish population is also aging. The largest age cohort in the Jewish community – 4,090, representing 28 per cent of total – comprises people between the ages of 45 and 64.

The number Jews over 65 is 3,175, about the same as those in the 25 to 44 age group, at 3,180. The lowest numbers are in the 15-24 cohort, which numbers only 1,720, or 12 per cent of all Jews.

Rosenberg-Cohen said Jews make up 17 to 18 per cent of the population in three areas: Tuxedo and South River Heights – among the city's wealthiest areas – in south Winnipeg, and Garden City in north Winnipeg.

The bulk of the Jewish population used to live in the city's north end, but over the past 45 years, there has been a gradual shift to River Heights and Tuxedo, which are now home to 50 per cent of Winnipeg's Jews.

Garden City has the highest proportion of Jewish seniors, with more than 1,000 people 65 and older out of a Jewish population in the area of 2,535.

Rosenberg-Cohen said the census also shows that Jews are not as attached to traditional Jewish neighbourhoods as they used to be.

"We have greater geographic dispersion than every before," she said, noting that almost 20 per cent of Jews live outside the traditionally Jewish areas.

Turning to poverty in the community, Rosenberg-Cohen reported that 1,830 Jews live below the poverty line, which is $38 646 for a family of five. The hardest hit are elderly Jewish women. She also noted that 11 per cent of Jewish children under 14 – 280 in total – live in families below the poverty line, and that 395 adults are among the "working poor." There are also 440 single-parent families.

However, some 80 per cent of Jewish families with children have household incomes of more than $50,000 a year.

Rosenberg-Cohen also prepared a chart on the cost of belonging to the Jewish community. She estimated that for a family of four – including one teenager and one pre-teen – that does not keep kosher, the cost of being part of the Jewish community – with synagogue membership, school, camp and Jewish community centre fees – would come to $22,000 a year.

In the 2001 census, 84 per cent of Winnipeg Jewry identified their mother tongue as English, while just eight per cent named Yiddish.

As well, only 16 per cent of Winnipeg Jews identified themselves as immigrants. That's the lowest percentage of any Jewish community in Canada, Rosenberg-Cohen noted.

She also noted that there are about 500 Jews in Manitoba who live outside Winnipeg.

Leading Israeli author tours North America

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – As part of her North American speaking tour, Israeli author Judith Katzir appeared at Library and Archives Canada on International Women's Day.

Judith Katzir

The event was sponsored by the Ottawa International Writers' Festival and the Israeli Embassy.

Katzir is an award-winning author in Israel. Her books have been translated into several languages. Only one of them, Closing the Sea, was available in English; however, it is currently out of print. Closing the Sea was her first anthology, published 15 years ago.

Since then, her publishing credits have included two novels, an anthology of three novellas (also bestsellers), two books for children and a play about the first woman Hebrew writer, Dvora Baron. The play was produced at Tel Aviv's Ha'Kameri Theatre in 2000.

Aware that most people in the audience would be unfamiliar with her or her work, Katzir began the evening by discussing her family history, her own personal history and her current professional and personal life. It became clear to the listeners that her family tree would provide sufficient material for several novels and, indeed, that has been the case.

"Like many writers, I began writing about my own private world. Only as an adult did I begin to address my family heritage and the literary and human material I could draw from them," she said.

Though Katzir had been writing since childhood – mostly poetry – it was only after serving in the Israeli navy and studying literature at Tel Aviv University that she turned to fiction. "When I was 23, my mother fell ill with cancer. I felt the door closing on my childhood and needed to stick my foot and shoulder in, and take some verbal 'snapshots,' capture the few last memories," she said.

Katzir described the stories in Closing the Sea as "initiation stories," describing a girl's formative and adolescence years, a time of life that fascinates the author because of its emotional intensity.

Now immersed in writing an epic family saga, a novel beginning with the pre-state Zionist period and based upon the life of Katzir's great-grandmother, Tzila Margolin, she spoke of the tremendous challenge of the project, including "reviving the period, its ideologies and zeitgeist, portraying places as they really were" and "reviving the language used at the time.

"One of my goals in writing this personal historical drama is to bring the various strands of my identity together in a single coherent work; to combine my unique Israeli and family heritage with my current socio-political outlook, and to somehow embrace all this within my primal identity as a woman writer."

While in Ottawa, Katzir also spoke to students and faculty at Carleton University's Institute of Women's Studies. Her third appearance, at Temple Israel Congregation, included a question and answer period in Hebrew. Her books were available that evening in Hebrew.

Hezbollah's true nature must be recognized

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

After U.S. President George W. Bush met Jordan's King Abdullah on March 15, the media reported that Bush might be willing to recognize Hezbollah's role in the Lebanese political process. Bush said: "We view Hezbollah as a terrorist organization, and I would hope that Hezbollah would prove that they're not, by laying down arms and not threatening peace."

Anticipating a possible shift in U.S. policy, a March 13 Jerusalem Post editorial declared: "Hezbollah may indeed be a powerful player on the Lebanese arena, but it is not the type of player who should be tolerated, primarily because it will wreck the democratic process, not promote it. Hezbollah is not a political party, it is a ruthless and heavily armed militia with political ambitions. It is by nature inimical to democracy and an antithesis to what the U.S. claims to advocate."

Reporting from Beirut for the New York Times (March 13), Neil MacFarquhar wrote about the political vacuum created by the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri: "The question is whether anyone can fill his shoes as a kind of national arbitrator. The huge march [on March 8 organized by Hezbollah] served as Sheik [Hassan] Nasrallah's opening bid for the job."

Yet Hezbollah leader Nasrallah is well-known for his tirades against Israel. On Feb. 19, he told a crowd in Beirut that "our weapons and hatred must be turned against the Zionist enemy." In the same speech, railing against UN Security Council Resolution 1559, he said, "Disarming the resistance [Hezbollah] called the 'Lebanese militia' is without doubt an Israeli demand."

Nasrallah's extreme anti-Israel and anti-Semitic rhetoric is a staple of Hezbollah's message, which reaches audiences, not only in the Middle East, but throughout the world, thanks to its al-Manar satellite television station.

Al-Manar broadcast, in the fall of 2003, the infamous Syrian series Al-Shatat (The Diaspora), an Arabic version of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. It promoted the ideas that Jews are involved in a plot to control the world and that they participate in the ritual murders of Christian children.

In Dec. 2004, France banned al-Manar for violating its anti-incitement laws. The United States and Canada followed France's lead by also banning the broadcast of al-Manar. But al-Manar still reaches millions of viewers. Hezbollah also spreads its message of hate and violence via its radio station Radio Nur, and through a variety of websites.

The ostensible raison d'être of Hezbollah – its "resistance" to Israeli occupation of a security zone in southern Lebanon – ended with Israel's withdrawal in May 2000. The UN Security Council summarily rejected Hezbollah's claim that the Har Dov border post maintained by Israel is Lebanese territory, thus stripping Hezbollah of its rationale for "resisting" Israel.

Backed by Iran and Syria, Hezbollah's real aim is the elimination of Israel. For the past several years, the organization has infiltrated the West Bank and Gaza Strip, supporting terrorist gangs including the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade. In the March 7 issue of the Jerusalem Report, Isabel Kershner wrote that in 2004 alone, Israeli authorities "identified 68 attacks supported by Hezbollah, accounting for the deaths of 24 Israelis, or 21 per cent of that year's terror victims."

All of the media efforts to depict Hezbollah as a social and political organization with philanthropic aims, and its leader as a statesman-in-the-making, miss the true nature of this organization.

Jeffrey Goldberg, in his award-winning New Yorker series on Hezbollah (Oct. 14 and 21, 2002), described it as the world's most fearsome terrorist organization. "Hezbollah is, at its core, a jihadist organization" wrote Goldberg.

Hezbollah is dedicated not to democracy but to the creation of a rigid Islamic state built on Israel's destruction. All its resources – social and political – are devoted to this aim, as Goldberg made abundantly clear.

Distinguishing Hezbollah's radical military wing from its supposedly benign political wing is illusory. Bush's hope that Hezbollah will disarm, as the UN Security Council demands, will almost certainly prove to be equally illusory.

Paul Michaels is communication director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Israel Bonds to honour two couples

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Two couples who have shown outstanding dedication to their adopted Jewish community and to Israel will be honoured by State of Israel Bonds next month.

Steve and Roz Fremeth and Chuck and Bonnie Merovitz all moved to Ottawa from Montreal about 25 years ago, and they immediately immersed themselves, both individually and collectively, in their new community.

In the early years, the families lived on the same street, and they have "celebrated, grieved, vacationed and volunteered together for over 25 years," Roz Fremeth said.

"We are not native Ottawans, but we embrace the Ottawa Jewish community," Bonnie Merovitz said.

All four have been active volunteers in organizations both in the Jewish and general communities; their commitment to Israel has been at the forefront. For Bonnie and Chuck, their strong affiliation with State of Israel Bonds goes back to their first date in February 1971, when Chuck's father, Gordon, was honoured by State of Israel Bonds in Montreal.

Not only have they all been to Israel on many occasions, they have also taken leadership roles in UJA missions. The Fremeths led the Ottawa mission to Prague and Israel in 1997, and they joined the Merovitzes' mission in 2003.

"We are very proud of this honour and feel there are a lot of other couples who are equally deserving, because they recognize the obligation to give back to the community," Bonnie Merovitz said.

"To be honoured with good friends like the Merovitzes is a double honour," Steve Fremeth added.

A brunch will be held at Agudath Israel Synagogue on Sunday, April 17 to honour the two couples and present them with the Israel Bonds' Lion of Judah Leadership Award. Proceeds from the event will go to buy a State of Israel Bond that will be donated to the United Jewish Appeal of Ottawa.

חשבוע אי אפשר היה שלא לחשוות את הפוליטיקה של קנדה לזו של ישראל: גם כאן ממשלת מיעוט, גם כאן ניסו להעביר תקציב. חשמנים, שיכולים היו בהרמת יד להפיל את הממשלה לא עשו כן, כי רוב מוחלט של קנדים אינו מעוניין ללכת לבחירות. אבל שישאר בינינו.

"The SeaWithin"

ירון שלח לי את הסיפור הבא:

"זה נכון- ענה הרועה-קח לך כבשה אחת".

ואז אומר לו הרועה:

"אם אצליח לנחש מה תמקצוע שלך-תחזיר לי את מה שלקחת?"

האיש מסכים, והרועה אומר לו מיד: "אתה יועץ".

"מדהים! "אומר האיש-איך ידעת?"

"זה מאוד פשוט: אתה מופיע בלי שאיש צריך, אתה רוצה שישלמו לך עבור תשובה שידעתי מראש, ואין לך מושג כלשהו על תנושא עצמו. תכשיו תן לי חזרה את הכלב שלי...."

Record numbers vote in Montreal Hillel elections

By CHLOE MARKOWICZ
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL – A record number of students rushed to the polls across the city last week to elect the new leaders of Hillel Montreal.

Hillel has come a long way in its journey of reaching out to Jewish students, but now, chief returning officer Yoni Petel said, the movement has truly found its place on campuses around the city as "the anchor of Jewish student life."

Petel recalled the elections that took place during his undergraduate years, when voters consisted mainly of the general Hillel assembly and the number of ballots cast was closer to 10 than to the 1,067 ballots counted this year.

Not only did the 662 votes for city-wide positions equal four times last year's number, but voter turnout broke records on all campuses. The 230 ballots cast for McGill positions was nearly double last year's record, and at Concordia, the 143 ballots were more than twice the number cast last year. This year, too, progress was made in reaching out to both the French and the CEGEP student communities. For the first time ever, polling stations were held at the Université de Montréal, where 32 students voted, and at the various CEGEP campuses, where a total of 238 voters cast ballots.

The record number of voters, Petel said, was not just evidence of Hillel's move to become more accessible, but also proof of how the movement has evolved over the past year. Hillel has worked hard to enrich the student experience through its programming, and the voter numbers confirm its success.

Movement has evolved over past year

"To say that we've gone from nine voters at Concordia and 100 at McGill, when it used to be impossible to get interest, shows that this organization has really matured," he said.

Another reason Petel cited for the improved turnout was the quality of the candidates running for office. At the city-wide presidential level, the candidates were Jason Portnoy (Concordia), Sara Kemeny (McGill) and Marc Abergel (Université de Montréal).

Portnoy, the newly elected president of Montreal City-Wide Hillel, also expressed his delight at the turnout, saying that "every single candidate was amazing. The only real winner was Hillel. Hillel has boomed this past year… Hillel is now the cool thing."

His ambition is to reach out to even more students, he said. Students are becoming increasingly aware of Hillel and its activities, and the challenge now is to encourage these students to become more involved.

Current Hillel Montreal student president Yacov Fruchter was also ecstatic about the participation in the elections. "Hillel is not just an organization where people should do things for you. Students need to be involved," he said.

Fruchter stressed the importance of every Jewish student having a place in Hillel, adding that each student has the opportunity to make a difference. He said the turnout was evidence of the programming of the past year, which reached more than 10,000 students, and of the hard work that helped make the year a success.

"We're becoming bigger and stronger, and we definitely need to continue the growing process," Fruchter said.

Left-wing Israel supporters needed on campus: prof

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Why has the mainstream Jewish community been able to deal successfully with anti-Semitism from right-wing sources but not with its left-wing counterpart?

The answer, to social work professor Nora Gold, a research associate at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, is obvious. "Change has to come from someone within," she said as part of a panel last week at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

The discussion was the last in a series about "Being Jewish on Campus," co-sponsored by the congregation and Hillel of Greater Toronto. Also featured on the panel were Ken Green, professor of religion at the University of Toronto, and Elliot Malamet, who teaches Jewish studies at both the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Queen's University.

"The Jewish community for the most part doesn't understand the left, and can't relate to the left," said Gold, who described herself as an activist who is from the left. "Basically, it doesn't have the right people on its team. That is an enormous liability in this climate.

"If you want to go into the jungle in a foreign community, you need a local guide," she said.

"My hope is that the love we all feel for Israel can overpower divisions in our community. It is important that we begin to work together, so that all of us can defeat our current enemies."

> 'It is important that we begin to work together'

Gold advised the audience, consisting mostly of parents of university-age students, that it's important to avoid stereotypes about universities and the left.

"Not everybody who criticizes Israel is an anti-Semite," she said. "There are good people who are critical of Israel, both Jewish and non-Jewish. It's really important not to have a knee-jerk reaction any time there is criticism of Israel."

However, she noted, students at universities are confronted with challenges, including anti-Israel comments in class, anti-Israel posters, "misinformation tables," verbal assaults and, infrequently, incidents of physical violence.

"It's important not to feel there's nothing you can do," she said. Among the measures she noted were working with student unions and university presidents, putting on symposia, organizing counter-demonstrations, and circulating booklets outlining counter-arguments that students can bring to bear.

Based on her experience – and mixed success – trying to get some of her colleagues to recognize that anti-Semitism is a form of racism, Gold suggested that the Jewish community should be investing in campuses that have a critical mass of Jewish faculty and a presence of Jewish students; a bright, non-Jewish director or chair; and a prevailing ideology that is progressive but not radical.

She also advised targeting larger universities, "because others tend to follow suit."

She feels Jewish faculty in particular have a responsibility toward Jewish students that should be expressed in part by sensitizing their colleagues, both Jewish and non-Jewish, who are not aware of the issues. In that way, she said, colleagues who would not allow a racist remark to pass in their classroom can learn to address anti-Semitic remarks in the same way.

She said that, similarly, when she began to teach, she did not know much about homophobia, but a gay colleague educated her and other faculty members.

Green, who has a son in third year, is concerned about anti-Israel activity on campus, but said that "being Jewish on campus is not entirely [about] dealing with anti-Israel propaganda." Rather, he sees Jewish identity as the main problem for students in university.

"That's where many students will make a decision about how they will live the rest of their life."

He said in his experience three things affect those decisions in terms of Jewish identity: Hillel, personal involvement in Israel action, and Jewish studies.

He said that, at the risk of sounding like an "advertisement" for his own department, Jewish studies provides a Jewish milieu, even though not all the students are Jewish. It also deepens students' knowledge of Judaism at a higher level of maturity and intellect than in high school, he said.

Malamet agreed with Green that this is a good time to be Jewish on campus. "There are manifold opportunities [for students] to develop their spirituality." Jewish studies classes and programs like Shabbat celebrations can "enhance their sense of self as Jews," he noted. "I think we have a role to play in helping kids forge a Jewish identity."

Students are not spending the time to figure out what they want their life to be about, or where Judaism fits in, he said. "Those processes are slow… Students are being rushed today."

Also, he said, "most kids really don't give a damn about the political discourse. They care about their academic lives and their romantic lives."

Purim 'pan-pals' exchange hamantaschen recipes

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Hamantaschen (and kreplach), with their fillings hidden inside, are symbolic of the hidden aspect of the miracle of Purim. The dough for hamantaschen can be made from sweet yeast or cookie dough, phyllo or flaky pastry. Traditional fillings include prunes (lekvar) or poppy seeds (mohn). Ground dates, apricots, raisins, even thick jam or preserves also make delicious fillings.

This hidden treasure for hamantaschen comes from the recipe files of my "pan-pal" Rita Busman, formerly of the Bronx, who has lived in Charleston, S.C., since 1980. Busman is very involved in her sisterhood and volunteers with several Jewish organizations, theatre groups and the symphony.

Busman is a true foodie. She gives out wine at Shabbat services, offers cooking advice to the 1,700-plus members of the Jewish-Food listserve all around the world (www.jewishfood-list.com) and works as a greeter at a local Charleston restaurant where she's called "Rita the Greeta!"

After exchanging jokes and recipes via e-mail for a few years, Busman and I finally met in person on a visit to New York City two years ago. What do foodie-friends do when they meet? They eat! We went to a well-known New York deli for a super-sized sandwich.

Rita whispered, "Don't order a soft drink. Follow my lead." She asked our waiter for two glasses of cold water with lemon. She then proceeded to squeeze the lemon juice into the water, added some sweetener, and presto, free lemonade! That definitely compensated for the exorbitant price of the sandwich. We each took the other half of our sandwich home in a doggie bag, friends forever. We still keep in touch regularly.

Lately, each e-mail Rita Busman sends me includes a reminder on how to order a copy of More Love from Charleston: A Collection of Recipes from Sisterhood Synagogue Emanu-El. (Coincidentally, their Rabbi, Chezi Zionce, was formerly from Toronto.) Busman was on the cookbook committee, contributed recipes and is now busy promoting the book internationally – via e-mail, of course.

More Love from Charleston is a kosher three-ring binder cookbook with tabs (442 pages), compiled by members of the sisterhood. Recipes are designated as dairy, meat or pareve. There are also excellent chapters for the holidays, including Passover recipes, cooking and baking tips, equivalents, substitutions, food quantities for crowds of 25 to 100 people, even napkin folding. You'll also find child-friendly activities, including Scratch and Sniff Paintings, Drizzly Goop and an Edible Necklace.

The book retails for $20 US plus $7 shipping/handling per book. For details on ordering your copy, contact RitaBusman@Comcast.net … and be sure to tell her that Norene sent you! Enjoy!

RITA'S HAMANTASCHEN

Source: More Love from Charleston

2¾ cups flour
½ tsp. salt
½ cup sugar
½ tsp. baking powder
1 cup very cold margarine (2 sticks or ½ lb. If substituting butter, use only 2½ cups flour)
1 tsp. vanilla extract
3 egg yolks
filling of your choice
2 tbsp. ice water

Preheat oven to 400. Sift together the dry ingredients. Cut the margarine or butter into small pieces and then, as if making a pie crust, cut it in with either 2 knives or a pastry blender until the mixture is crumbly, with most of it like a fine meal.

Stir in the egg yolks, vanilla and ice water, using just enough water to form a ball of dough that barely holds together. If it is too sticky, add a little more flour.

Turn the dough out onto a floured pastry board or pastry cloth and, working quickly, knead the dough once or twice until it holds together. Be careful not to overhandle the dough. The dough should look solid yellow and fresh. If overhandled, it will turn dark or greasy and the end result will be hard, rather than light and crisp.

Cut the ball into 2 halves, wrap each half in waxed paper and refrigerate at least 1 hour. Roll out onto a floured pastry cloth and, for best results, also put a rolling pin cover on the rolling pin and flour it too. Some people can work with the dough rolled out between 2 floured sheets of waxed paper instead. Roll the dough out to ¼-inch thickness and cut to desired size. For best results, only reroll the dough twice at the most.

Put filling in the centre of each and moisten the edges a little with water; seal. Bake at 400 until brown (about 15 to 20 minutes).

NORENE'S FIVE FRUIT FILLING

Source: MealLeaniYumm

1 medium seedless orange (thin-skinned)
1 cup raisins
1 cup pitted dates
1 cup pitted prunes
1 cup dried apricots

Cut orange into chunks, but do not peel. Cut away both the navel and the stem end. In the food processor, process orange until finely ground, about 20 seconds. Add remaining ingredients and process until finely ground, about 15 to 20 seconds. Scrape down sides of bowl as necessary. Yield: about 3 cups filling. One cup filling is enough to fill 12 to 16 hamantaschen, depending on size. Mixture can be prepared in advance and refrigerated for several days, or frozen.

GINGER ALE PASTRY HAMANTASCHEN

Source: The Food Processor Bible

Versatile, easy and dairy-free. Use stick margarine, not soft tub margarine, otherwise the dough will be difficult to roll out. Sugar-free ginger ale can be used successfully.

2 cups plus 2 tbsp. flour
1 cup frozen margarine, cut in 6 or 8 pieces
½ cup ginger ale or soda water
1 tbsp. vinegar or lemon juice

In a food processor fitted with the Steel Blade, process flour and margarine with 4 or 5 on/off pulses (2 to 3 seconds each time), until mixture looks like coarse oatmeal. Add liquids through feed tube while machine is running. Process just until dough begins to gather in a mass around the blades, 8 to 10 seconds. Do not overprocess.

Remove dough from machine, divide into 4 balls and wrap in plastic wrap. Chill in refrigerator at least 1 hour or overnight. The colder the dough, the easier it is to roll.

Roll out each piece of dough on a lightly floured surface to ¼-inch thickness. (Use a pastry cloth and a rolling pin stockinette cover for easier rolling.) Cut into 3-inch circles. (A small juice glass is ideal.) Place a spoonful of your favourite filling on each circle. Bring up 3 sides to meet, then pinch edges of dough together to form a triangle. Repeat with remaining dough and filling.

Place hamantaschen on sprayed foil-lined cookie sheets. Brush with egg glaze (1 egg yolk beaten with 2 tsp. water). Bake at 400 about 15 minutes, or until golden. Yield: about 4 dozen. Freezes well.

EU wants Israel to ease limits on Palestinians

By ORA KOREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The European Union intends to offer Israel economic benefits in exchange for relieving the restrictions on the Palestinians, EU sources said.

A high-ranking EU delegation due to arrive in Israel in about a month will discuss ways to strengthen the economic, political and cultural co-operation between Israel and the EU.

The EU's action plan is based on a statement of intentions formulated by Israel and the EU at the end of 2004.

The Europeans are expected to offer a package deal – advancing the relations with Israel simultaneously on all fronts. They stress that they will not allow accelerated progress in economic issues while the political process is bogged down.

"The extent of the EU's economic cooperation with Israel will be equivalent to the extent of Israel's political co-operation with the EU," a senior EU source said. "The more we advance on the political clauses, the easier it will be for us to make progress in the economic ones."

The delegation will be headed by Christian Leffler, the EU's Middle East and south Mediterranean director. He is expected to ask Israel to alleviate a series of restrictions on the Palestinians as part of the political co-operation clause in the action plan. These will consist of opening roadblocks inside Palestinian Authority territory, relaxing the restrictions on the transport of Palestinian merchandise to Israel and overseas and facilitating the passage of Palestinian labourers to and from Israel.

The Europeans hope to hear from Israel that it is still committed to the "road map" peace plan – that is, to negotiations with the Palestinians over a permanent settlement based on two states, and does not regard the disengagement plan as the end of the road.

EU officials believe that Israel will agree to remove some of the roadblocks, subject to security considerations. In exchange, Leffler may tell Israel that the EU agrees to exempt Israel from customs on exports of products manufactured jointly in Israel and Jordan.

Israel asked for the custom exemptions a few years ago and is still waiting for an answer. A customs exemption on Israeli-Jordanian products will advance the co-operation between Israel and Jordan and strengthen the peace agreement between them.

The Europeans are expected to tell Israel that if it agrees to their requests, the EU will grant Israel similar custom benefits for joint production with other Middle East countries in the future.

The EU's action plan with Israel is part of the European Neighbourhood Policy (ENP), which includes some 17 east European and Middle Eastern states.

The ENP is intended to turn the EU into the second superpower in the world, after the United States. After the collapse of the Soviet Union, the EU expected international recognition of its status as an alternative superpower, but this did not happen as the U.S. preferred to be the sole superpower. The EU realized it would have to increase its political-economic volume to attain the superpower status. It launched the plan to add to its ranks east European member states and now declare it has accumulated an economic and political power that cannot be ignored.

The ENP is intended to add more countries to the EU – not as full members but as close partners. The policy is based on understandings anchored in respective action plans, which will be implemented on the basis of cooperation, rather than coercion, EU officials promise.

The standing clauses in all the action plans are political co-operation, expanding democracy, preserving human rights and academic co-operation. The economic clauses include co-ordinating infrastructure systems of transportation, communication, energy and environment.

The EU also insists on developing and preserving four basic economic liberties – freedom of movement for merchandise, capital, services and people. "The clause on people's freedom of movement startled certain east European states, which feared mass emigration. Consequently it was modified and the labour market will not be opened to neighbouring workers completely," a senior EU official said.

Rabbis opposing withdrawal differ on resistance tactics

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — At Orthodox synagogues across Israel and the territories, a short prayer is being recited against the planned Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and a portion of the northern West Bank.

The prayer asks for divine blessing for those "sons who are living selflessly and with perseverance in all parts of Judea, Samaria and Gaza," asking to "uplift their spirits and strengthen their heart" as they stand up against those who would wish them harm.

Rabbi Mordechai Eliahu, a former Sephardi chief rabbi in Israel, has asked congregations to recite the prayer as a protest against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to withdraw Israel from the Gaza Strip and a section of the northern West Bank unilaterally, evacuating some 8,000 Jewish settlers from their homes.

For many Orthodox Jews in Israel, the prayer taps into a deeply personal issue. Many of the Jewish settlers themselves are Orthodox. And many Orthodox Jews who live within the Green Line, Israel's pre-1967 borders, have relatives and friends who are settlers.

Across Israel's Orthodox spectrum, the majority of voices are solidly against the withdrawal plan. What varies is the degree of resistance that leading Orthodox figures are supporting.

Rabbi Eliahu and another former chief rabbi, Avraham Shapira, have been among the most high-profile voices to call on soldiers and police to refuse orders to evacuate settlers, a tactic that is gaining popularity in national religious circles.

Rabbi Shapira, considered by many to be the top figure in the national religious community, compared the possible evacuations to desecrating the Sabbath and eating unkosher food.

The highly influential spiritual leader of the Shas Party, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, another former chief rabbi, made headlines recently when he called Sharon "evil" because of the disengagement plan. He added, "God will strike him with one blow and he will die. He will sleep and not awake." Rabbi Yosef later said those comments had been misunderstood.

Many Orthodox rabbis maintain that Israelis now are living in messianic times and so should be promoting Jewish expansion in biblical Israel aggressively. Those rabbis see Gaza as a biblical birthright, promised to the Jews by God.

However, many scholars say that during biblical times Gaza was part of the land promised to the Jews but never was part of the land actually conquered and inhabited by them. There are, however, contradicting references on this issue. One passage in Judges often cited by Jewish settlers and their supporters says the tribe of Judah did take control of the area.

Questions of Israel's historical ties to Gaza aside, there are top Israeli rabbis, both within Israel proper and in the territories, who are calling for restraint and a focus on Jewish unity.

Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein, the co-head of Yeshiva Har Etzion in the West Bank settlement of Alon Shvut, is one of the leading Orthodox leaders to have come out against soldiers defying orders to evacuate settlements.

Members of Israel's national religious community are split on whether or not to disobey orders.

"I have spoken very clearly. I think that this kind of insubordination is intolerable in these circumstances. I think those soldiers there should obey" orders, Rabbi Lichtenstein told JTA.

Rabbi Lichtenstein does not oppose the idea of protest, but cautions against any protest that crosses the line into what he calls "frustrating the ability of the government to govern."

Rabbi Lichtenstein is among those leading Orthodox rabbis who say there is something that must be respected in a decision made by the government of the Jewish state.

Most religious lawmakers are against disengagement but have also been careful not to call for violence as a means of protest.

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin of the West Bank settlement of Efrat, like Rabbi Lichtenstein and other rabbis, has warned of the dangers to Israeli society that could grow out of rabbis advising soldiers to refuse orders.

"I am unalterably opposed to those rabbinic voices which call upon the soldiers of the IDF (Israel Defence Forces) to refuse to obey military orders of evacuation claiming that such orders are against absolute Torah law," Rabbi Riskin wrote recently in the Jerusalem Post. "I humbly insist that such is not the case, that Torah law grants the right to a sovereign State of Israel to determine its borders, and that a call to refusal on religious grounds is tantamount to a call to civil war. The State of Israel can withstand the evacuation of settlers from Gaza; it cannot withstand a civil war."

Inside Israel proper, the popular, young Rabbi Yuval Shirlogh, who heads a major yeshiva, Petach Tikvah, has come out against disengagement as a policy while remaining outspoken in his call that religious Jews not act against the state and its institutions.

Rabbi Yehuda Gilad, a former Knesset member of the Meimad Party who now heads the Yeshiva Maale Gilboa in the north of Israel, is one of the few Orthodox rabbis to give grudging support to the Gaza withdrawal.

"I am far from satisfied with the plan and how it was reached," he said, saying he would have preferred to see a national referendum. "But at the end of the day I don't see a way a Jewish state can be democratic and Jewish while remaining in control of 2.5 million Palestinians." That's the number of Palestinians living in the Gaza Strip.

Daniel Tropper, the founder of the Gesher Foundation, an Israeli organization that seeks to bridge the gaps between the secular and the religious in Israel, said that because so many Orthodox Jews in Israel have ties to the settlements, the idea of disengagement is especially difficult for them to accept.

"While Zionism is very much weakened in the secular world, it is still very strong in the religious world, so dismantling settlements is very, very painful," Tropper said.

Rabbi Shlomo Aviner, one of the chief rabbis of the Beit El settlement and the head of the Ateret HaCohanim yeshiva in Jerusalem's Old City, received attention in Israel for his moderate words when he called on settlers not to resist if security forces come to evacuate them from their homes.

Rabbi Aviner is against the idea of any kind of evacuation of Jews, but said that an internecine conflict should be avoided at all costs.

"I don't want a civil war, but to do protests is OK," Rabbi Aviner said. "I don't want even one person to die here. I don't want to see hatred."

The other chief rabbi at Beit El, Zalman Melamed, has sharply different opinions from those held by Rabbi Aviner. Rabbi Melamed, who, like Rabbi Aviner, is a major halachic figure, has publicly and repeatedly called on soldiers not to take part in anything related to the disengagement. His stance has received much support.

Rabbi Lichtenstein, meanwhile, tries to give voice to the conflict facing the country and the Orthodox.

"From a national standpoint, the country is undergoing surgery," he said. "That is always painful – but the question is what is going to be gained at the other end."

Lawsuits filed by family of activist killed in Gaza

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CHICAGO — The family of a 23-year-old activist who died in the Gaza Strip two years ago in an incident involving the Israel Defence Forces' use of a Caterpillar bulldozer has accused Caterpillar Inc. of aiding with "war crimes."

According to court papers, the suit was filed earlier this week in U.S. District Court in Seattle, Wash., by Cynthia and Craig Corrie, the parents of Rachel Corrie, a college student who died on March 16, 2003, while trying to block the demolition of Palestinian homes in the Rafah refugee camp.

A spokesperson for Peoria, Illinois-based Caterpillar declined to comment, but said the company is reviewing the suit, and referred an earlier statement indicating that the company has "neither the legal right nor the means to police individual use" of its equipment after it is sold.

Filed with the aid of the Center for Constitutional Rights, the lawsuit seeks at least $75,000 in compensatory damages plus unspecified punitive damages from Caterpillar.

"The family has been trying to get some accountability for awhile," said the centre's spokesperson, Jen Nessel. "They cannot bring a criminal complaint, so the only way is to file a civil suit seeking damages."

The complaint alleged Caterpillar was a party to "war crimes; aiding and abetting extrajudicial killing; cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment; wrongful death; and negligence."

Companion litigation was filed in Israel against the Israeli government, Nessel said.

In its investigation, Israel concluded that Corrie's death was an accident and that the driver of the bulldozer did not see her. The probe said a slab of concrete slid down a mound of earth and crushed her.

But the lawsuit claims there were two soldiers on the bulldozer as well as a spotter nearby who could not have missed seeing Corrie, who was wearing a bright red vest and waving her arms when she was run over. There were ongoing arguments between the demolition teams and the activists that day, the suit says.

Corrie was among a group of activists from Olympia, Wash., who arrived in the Middle East in January 2003 to stage non-violent actions and attempt to block the demolition of Palestinian homes.

Human Rights Watch and other groups have called on Caterpillar to stop supplying bulldozers and parts to Israel.

Mubarak calls Sharon

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak telephoned Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to update him on the results of the meeting in Cairo between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and the Palestinian factions. Mubarak said that the way was now open to move forward. Sharon thanked Mubarak for the update. However, he made it clear that this was an arrangement for an interim period only and that in order to move forward in the diplomatic process, the terrorist organizations will be unable to continue existing as armed organizations and certainly not as terrorist organizations.

Egyptian envoy returns

Egypt returned its ambassador to Israel after a four-year absence. "I am very proud that President Hosni Mubarak granted me the responsibility for representing Egypt in Israel," Ambassador Mohamed Assem told reporters when he landed in Tel Aviv last Thursday. Assem's predecessor was withdrawn soon after Israeli-Palestinian fighting erupted in 2000, and the new appointment is part of Mubarak's recent efforts to orchestrate a regional rapprochement with the Jewish state. Assem was to present his credentials to Israeli President Moshe Katsav on Friday.

Bombing plot thwarted

Five Palestinians are suspected of planning to bomb the Knesset in an attempt to impress Al Qaeda. According to an indictment filed in the Jerusalem District Court, the alleged terror cell's leader surfed Al Qaeda websites to gather information on bomb-making, hoping to attack Israel's Parliament building. The five are also accused of planning to kill Israelis by putting poison on the doors of their cars. Earlier this month, the Shin Bet said it had arrested an Israeli Arab who also planned to bomb the Knesset.

Improved French relations?

France's prime minister pledged to strengthen relations with Israel. Meeting Tuesday with leaders of the American Jewish Committee in Jerusalem before the new Yad Vashem Holocaust museum was dedicated, Jean-Pierre Raffarin said five French cabinet ministers soon will visit Israel to discuss joint projects.

No new residences in Gaza

The Israel Defence Forces has banned Israeli citizens from relocating to the Gaza Strip as part of its preparations for a withdrawal from the coastal area this summer, the IDF said in a statement Friday. At the beginning of May, after Passover, the IDF plans to declare the Gaza Strip a closed military zone. The army will then be able to prevent people who do not have proof of residency in the Strip from entering it. The move is meant to prevent activists from entering the area to prevent the planned disengagement.

New Yad Vashem museum opens

JERUSALEM — The Holocaust was not "man's inhumanity to man," Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel said last week at the dedication of the new Holocaust museum at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

"No. It was man's inhumanity to Jews. Jews were not killed because they were human beings. In the eyes of the killers, they were not human beings, they were Jews."

Wiesel, a Holocaust survivor, said only those who were there know the meaning of "being there," but he said we all have the obligation to try to tell and not to bury the memories in silence.

Wiesel's closing remarks summed up the moving ceremony held before foreign dignitaries from 40 countries, among them 15 heads of government and state, including French Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin, German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski, a representative of the Vatican and United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan.

Annan said that the UN felt a sacred obligation to fight hatred and intolerance, an obligation that tied him to the Jewish people and "the State of Israel, which rose, like the UN itself, from the ashes of the Holocaust.

"Our global mission of peace, freedom and human dignity was literally forged in fire – in fact the most awful fires humankind has ever seen," he said.

Israeli President Moshe Katsav called on members of the European Union not to allow Nazism to reside in the imagination of young people as some sort of entertaining horror show.

"We are concerned about Holocaust denial and anti-Semitism," Katsav said. Europe "must accept the burden of the memory and lessons of the Holocaust for the future it is building. It owes this to the millions of Jews who were murdered on its soil."

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said, "The state of Israel is the only place in the world where the Jews have the right and the power to protect themselves by themselves. This is the only guarantee that the Jewish people will never know another Holocaust."

The chairman of Yad Vashem, Shevah Weiss, said the cold weather at the two-hour ceremony, which began a few minutes after 6 p.m. local time, reminded him of his feeling six weeks before at Auschwitz in Poland, during the ceremony marking the 60th anniversary of the concentration camp's liberation.

Among the 2,000 or so guests invited to the Yad Vashem ceremony were Holocaust survivors from several countries, as well as heads of other Holocaust commemoration institutions and about 100 mostly foreign journalists.

The ceremony opened with a rendition of the national anthem, Hatikvah by singer Dudu Fisher. Numerous video clips, including one by artist Michal Rovner on the vanished Jewish world, readings of survivors' and victims' testimonies, and musical renditions were interspersed among the speeches that followed.

Among the readings was a rendition of the poem Every Person Has a Name, by Israeli poet Zelda Mishkovsky, which was set to music by Hanan Yovel. The ceremony ended with the singing of Jerusalem of Gold by Rita and Fisher singing the Hebrew prayer Oseh Shalom.

Following the ceremony, Katzav hosted a dinner for the dignitaries at the Chagall Hall in the Knesset.

The new museum was built at a cost of $40 million (US) and financed mainly by the contributions of Jews and non-Jews throughout the world, and by the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims. Israel's Foreign Ministry contributed $5 million to its construction.

Surgeon speaks about separation of conjoined twins

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Jacob Langer, the surgeon who led the recent operation separating the conjoined twins Tinashe and Tinotenda Mufuka, at the Hospital for Sick Children, will speak at the next program of Torah in Motion.

The event will be held on March 31, at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, at 8 p.m.

Langer is professor of surgery at the University of Toronto, and chief of pediatric general surgery at the Hospital for Sick children. His topic is "Surgery on Conjoined Twins; Medical, Surgical and Jewish Ethical Perspectives."

Among the aspects of surgery on conjoined twins to be discussed are whether one life can be sacrificed to save another, and whether high-risk surgery is permissible.

Also speaking at the event is Rabbi Chaim Rapoport, spiritual leader of Ilford Synagogue in London, England, and adviser to the chief rabbi of the British Commonwealth on medical ethics.

Tinashe and Tinotenda were delivered at the Salvation Army Hospital in Zimbabwe by Dr. Rachel Spitzer, who is currently a fourth-year resident in obstetrics and gynecology at the University of Toronto. She was doing a three-month elective at the hospital where they were born.

The children, now eight months old, were born joined at the abdomen, and with a shared liver. Their condition at press time was classified by the hospital as serious, and they have been moved out of intensive care.

Rabbi Rapoport also speaks at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation April 3 at 8 p.m. The rabbi, who recently published a book titled Judaism and Homosexuality, will lecture on "Same-Sex Attraction: Same-Sex Marriage."

The fee for each program is $10. For more information, call 416-633-5770, or go to the website, www.torahinmotion.org.

Health of liver transplant candidate deteriorates

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Last November, we wrote about Sheldon Farberman, a Toronto man who had been diagnosed with cirrhosis of the liver, although he is not a drinker.

He was urging people to fill in their organ donor cards, so that those, like him, who need an organ transplant, can have the chance of living a normal life.

Farberman was recently told that his liver has stopped functioning completely. His only chance is to have either a complete liver transplant or a partial one from a living donor. He is on the active transplant list at the Toronto Hospital, and as this article was written, was waiting to hear if he is high on the list.

"Since the previous article, my health has done a 90 per cent flip backwards," he said. Farberman speaks in a whisper, since he has almost lost his voice.

He said he is 75 per cent bedridden, and when he gets up, finds that he gets winded easily. Community Care Access Services has promised to send in an occupational therapist to assess his needs, and has arranged for a caregiver to come in twice a week to help him wash, do laundry, and do some light cooking.

Earlier this week, he went for tests at Sunnybrook Hospital, to see if he needs blood transfusions or iron infusion.

Since his diagnosis two years ago, Farberman has tried to remain upbeat and positive. The last couple of days, however, "I've been struck by the gravity of my situation," he said. "I have to cope with so much everyday stress."

His friends and family are working on a a fundraiser, to be held in May. This is to raise money for the benefit of his children, Noah, 6 and Julia, 3.

Aging Well forum targets boomers

One of the characteristics of the baby- boomer generation is a preoccupation with exercise, healthy eating, healthy living – in short, maintaining good health.

As they reach middle age, interest increases in how to achieve a long, healthy life.

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care is using its expertise in caring for the very old in Aging Well Starts Now, a one-day forum to be held at Baycrest on April 10.

A media release says that it is aimed at "boomers and beyond, who are feeling the creaks and stresses of time and looking for practical strategies to maintain good health."

Event organizer Lesley Miller said "the secret to aging well is about common sense in how we manage our busy lives and protect our most precious assets – our physical and mental health."

The forum will include keynote morning presentations from memory and mood doctors, and a lighthearted luncheon address by Toronto family physician Mel Borins.

Other scheduled speakers include Janet Polivy, professor, department of psychology, University of Toronto, discussing "Exploding the Myth of Easy Change"; Linda Jackson, Baycrest director of social work and community services, on helping caregivers; and Sid Feldman, head of the department of family medicine at Baycrest, discussing "How to Maximize the Time with Your Doctor – Asking 10 Questions in Five Minutes."

Registrants can also choose two workshops during the day. Some of the topics include conventional medicine and alternative approaches; good health through easy exercise; boosting good stress/minimizing bad stress; and "Where Are My %#@ Keys? – Keeping Your Memory Sharp."

Registration for Aging Well Starts Now is $80, and includes parking and lunch. To register, contact Baycrest at 416-785-2500, ext. 3005, or e-mail startingnow@sympatico.ca.

Author straddles pop-culture/non-fiction and cutting edge

The Program* by Hal Niedzviecki, Random House Canada.

Hello, I'm Special: How Individuality Became the New Conformity* by Hal Niedzviecki, Penguin Canada.

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

This just may be Hal Niedzviecki's best year yet. He has two new books out – a non-fiction opus entitled Hello, I'm Special: How Individuality Became the New Conformity and a just-released novel called The Program – and he's recently signed on as a film writer for NOW, the alternative Toronto weekly.

That's in addition to his regular duties as publisher/fiction editor of Broken Pencil, the magazine of zine culture that he founded in 1995, and his usual journalism in, among other publications, the Globe and Mail, The Utne Reader, Toronto Life and This Magazine.

If that's not impressive enough, the 34-year-old already has a half-dozen other books, both fiction and non-fiction, to his credit.

Niedzviecki, who will be reading from The Program on April 3 at the Miles Nadal JCC in the Al Green Theatre in Toronto, occupies a unique place in Canadian letters. He's likely the only one out there straddling pop culture/non-fiction writing (in the vein of Lynn Crosbie or Mark Kingwell) and cutting-edge fiction, à la Douglas Coupland and Barbara Gowdy.

Not that he specifically evokes those writers; his voice is a clear, smart one, all his own.

"For me, The Program is in a way a culmination of all the books that I've written, non-fiction and fiction, the culmination of 10 years of thinking about these issues and I hope that comes out in the book."

Interestingly, The Program, which revolves around the Stern family, including self-help guru Maury, his delicate son Danny, and Maury's disturbed, mysterious brother Cal, evokes characters who, for the most part, are fairly uninterested in the ebbs and tides of pop culture and its effect on them.

"In a way, I'm not very interested in pop culture," says Niedzviecki. "I'm interested in mass culture and the characters in The Program are very much affected by that intersection of mass culture and technology. Pop culture is the kind of specific entertainment apparatus that is disseminated through a mass culture system, whereas mass culture is extended to include advertising, products and the whole chimera of consumerist ideology that is pumped out through what we must call 'The System.'" Despite that description, Niedzviecki hasn't staked out a space as the rebellious tilter against the windmills of the evil corporations; in fact he doesn't even concede that the divisions between them exist at all.

"One of the biggest misconceptions we have in the cultural realm is this idea of selling out – one person is mainstream and the other is underground. The truth is esthetically, culturally, there is no underground anymore, and if there is no underground, then there is no so-called mainstream to sell out to. There is nothing I could write, create, produce, [or] say that offends the mainstream, that the mainstream won't purchase in some way and regurgitate back to me."

Is that good or bad?

"It's a neutral truth. It would be helpful for people if they could realize that. As long as you're doing something that you want to do, you pursue it in many different ways and the same is true of independent, underground culture and mass culture controlled by corporations. People have to realize that the lines between those things are not static, they're not even blurred, there is no gap.

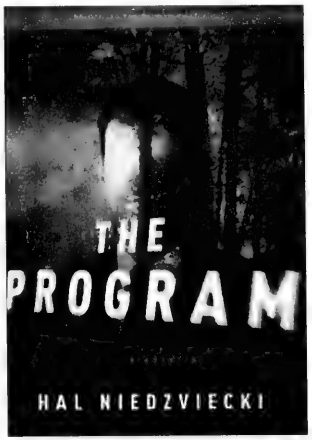
"That's what the Special book is all about. Look, you're not a rebel and you're actually wasting a lot of your precious energy proclaiming yourself a rebel. I'd rather you drop all the pretense and all the energy into making your own ideology and put it into work, and if your work is to change the system, then do that in the way you want to do that."

The witty introduction to Hello, I'm Special deals with how Niedzviecki worked through the concept of his own rebellion. It's a self-mocking take at his teenage self's (Teen Hal) run-ins with his parents, teachers at Hebrew school and society at large, mostly in Maryland where he grew up, only to discover that by his early 30s he was getting congratulatory birthday cards from his family saluting the rebel within.

That prompted the dismaying thought, as he puts it in the book, "If I'm a rebel sanctioned by society, encouraged by my parents, and cheered on by Hallmark, what is left to rebel against?"

Is he still conflicted about being a "rebel"?

"Well, you grow up," is his answer. "I think you're always conflicted between those desires, the desire to proclaim yourself special as a pseudo-rebel and the desire to conform, to go along with everyone else."



The Program comes from a different place. Like his previous novel, Ditch, it's dark in tone and deals with heavy subject matter, such as abuse, which is wholly unlike his usually breezy non-fiction.

"We live in a dark world and dark things are happening and yet we have this kind of sense that everything is great and everything can keep going on the way it's going and that sense is a pop-culture-instilled sense, of optimism and individual pursuit," Niedzviecki says.

"I'm very interested in exploring what lies beneath the surface of that sensibility and how people's lives are affected by this kind of orgy of individual consumerism and self-perpetuating ideology."

He hopes the novel will reach people "in a very meaningful, personal way, in a way that touches people in the sense that only fiction can really touch people and make them have really strong, powerful feelings."

Niedzviecki's path to where he is now, as one of the most respected cultural critics and writers in Toronto – NOW, for example, approached him to write for them – was never a clearly defined one.

Born in Brockville, Ont., he grew up in Ottawa and Maryland. He attended the University of Toronto where "I had no goal, I was just there. I started writing for The Varsity, the university college newspaper (alongside Naomi Klein) and I also started to volunteer for little magazines. I never really thought of myself as a writer. I just started writing and at some point I ended up starting a magazine (Broken Pencil) because I thought it was an important thing to do and I still think it's an important thing to do.

"That sort of set me on this parallel course of cultural studies. When you're writing about mass media from the perspective of the little guy, from the independent culture producer, the zine producer, the indie record label, that gives you a very interesting perspective to start commenting on mass culture and that's exactly what I did."

The Program prompts a different sort of inquiry; how much of the book comes out of Niedzviecki's life? "There are a few scenes that are really auto-biographical," he answers. "Really the only one that was substantively based on real things was my experiences at Camp Gesher, which is a real camp located near Cloyne, Ont., closer to Ottawa. The night game, with the kids having to pretend they're Jews sneaking into Palestine and the counsellors being the British, that really was an ongoing thing that happened at the camp. Of course, the characters aren't the same at all."

Niedzviecki's range of interests, accomplishments and chosen subject matter can be compared to one writer, he says. "If I had a predecessor who maybe had that kind [of varied] career, it would be Mordecai Richler, who was a very successful journalist, columnist, social commentator but obviously is known for his fiction. I wouldn't say I'm incredibly influenced by the content of his writing – and I do like his books – but if you're talking about someone who [had] a career I very much admire, [it's Richler]."

Like Richler throughout his life, it's a safe bet that Niedzviecki will continue to have an impact.

Ottawa artist, 28, is happy doing what she loves

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

When you step into this quaint downtown apartment in Ottawa, your eyes dance to the paintings splashing the walls with life. You move through the hallway and the gallery tour continues, until you sit in the living room and it explodes. There, an easel has a project in the works, and two portrait paintings of beautiful ladies rest on the floor below the television. A large couch to the left of the room swallows the young female behind all the art.

Meet Shayna Tate, 28, an aspiring young painter who looks remarkably like Ottawa's Alanis Morissette and who is sick and tired of people asking her when she is going to grow up and get a job.

"Happiness is about doing what you love, not what society tells you to do," Tate says with a smile. "People always want to know when I am getting a job."

Behind her, a framed painting of a dozen brilliant yellow daffodils hangs on the wall above her head. The two portraits on the ground are of her mother and her sister. She says the painting of her sister is exactly the style she likes to use.

"I don't just like to copy from a picture," she says, pointing at the painting and explaining that she likes to add to a picture when she paints it.

Tate likes to show her brush stroke, which, she explains for non-artists, means you can see lines that make the painting rougher rather than polished-looking like a photo.

"The goal is not to be perfect," she explains.

A graduate of the Ontario College of Art and Design, she also holds a degree in women's studies from the University of Ottawa and has been painting professionally for two years, receiving commissions from clients. Describing herself as a portrait and florist artist, Tate says requests come from friends, family and random clients.

The oddest request she has ever received – except for all the people that want her to paint pets – is typical of Ottawa.

"I got a commission to do a poppy and I really didn't know what to do," she says, giggling. "I guess people around here love poppies."

Like most young people, she went to school because she was "flipping out" about her future and doubted her ability and will to be an artist. But then, while dealing with some personal health problems, she had a lot of time to herself to paint.

"Here is a blank canvas and I get to create something. It was very therapeutic," she says, adding quickly that creating art is such a joy to do.

Ideally, Tate wants to work at an art gallery and then open her own gallery to take her work outside her living room and off the walls of her home. She shares the apartment with her long-term boyfriend.

Self portrait of Shayna Tate

Tate says she is a family person and is thankful that her mother and grandmother kept pushing her to follow her dreams. Her father and sister are musicians, and her paternal grandfather was an artist too.

As the interview ends, Tate says she loves life and enjoys the freedom of being her own boss, but adds, "I think I am good, but I know there are people out there that are better. I just want to learn and improve forever."

Lots of laughs in mockumentary about Jewish rapper

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

What if hip-hop star Eminem were Jewish? Would his mother worry about him backstage? What would a rabbi think of his incendiary lyrics?

These questions popped into Michael Cohen's head one day, compelling him to write a five-minute mockumentary called Jew Jube.

In the short, the Toronto actor adopts the personality of a squeaky-voiced rapper who blasts lyrics comparable to Eminem's edginess: "Yo Zundel and your propaganda/ In Canada here's my memoranda, read it/ Under my eternal lamp/ it wasn't summer when my grandparents went to camp."

Cohen packs the five-minute film with topical and cultural references. The rabbi from Beth Shpilkus Congregation, played by Jack Newman, exaggerates the harmfulness of Jew Jube's amusing lyrics; the rapper wears a doo-rag (bandanna) sporting two strands of material that resemble payes; and his German-Canadian manager, played by Bruce Hunter, has such a deep need to make amends for the Holocaust that he only works with Jewish artists.

"I'm trying to get a message out through parody," says Cohen, 39, in an interview at the Red Room Café on Spadina Avenue. "I'm not a rapper, but I'm trying to use this vehicle with a different intent."

Cohen skews misconceptions. For instance, Jew Jube's mother is such a cartoonish stereotype of a Jewish mother, she seems almost unreal.

Luba Goy, known for her work in the CBC television show Royal Canadian Air Farce, plays the overprotective mother. While she may not be Jewish, Goy fills the character with a paranoia most Jewish children would understand.

One scene shows the mother complaining to Jew Jube's manager about the shmutz and wrinkles on Jew Jube's new touring T-shirts. She also babies Jew Jube, raising the question of how many tough-guy music stars bend easily to the whim of their mothers.

"I wanted this to be a comedy that had legs, that isn't predictable," says Cohen. "These characters had to be multi-dimensional, with a certain enigma to each of them. If they were one-dimensional, they would be creepy because there'd be a side to them kept hidden."

Cohen's short is enjoying positive reception. Directed by Michael Davidson, it won an award for best mockumentary at the Moc Docs 2004 Script Award Festival in Toronto last year and was featured recently at the World of Comedy Film Festival. Jewish film festivals in Toronto and Vancouver also plan to screen it.

Jew Jube was born from Cohen's love of hip-hop, but it also has roots in his past. Growing up in Vancouver, he was the only Jewish boy in his public school. "I know what it feels like to be a minority and that's shaped me," he says. "Any time you experience being outcast, it builds characters."

The character Jew Jube was built around the pain of being on the outside looking in. Eminem was an outsider in the early stages of his career, too. Working as a white rapper in a black rapper's world is analogous to working as a Jew in a non-Jewish world.

"I gravitate to projects that impacts people emotionally," Cohen says. His manifesto is simple: "I want people to think and laugh and feel inspired."

Making the laugh-heavy Jew Jube was a departure from Cohen's day job as a script reader for the Harold Greenberg Fund, which finances submitted film scripts. The job is freelance, so Cohen makes additional income doing voice-work and acting gigs, which have included a guest role in the television series Queer As Folk.

He has studied improv with Second City and trained with the legendary Canadian clown duo Mump and Smoot.

Jew Jube may be reincarnated into a longer film or TV series, and Cohen says he's waiting for inspiration to write the next Jew Jube song.

It isn't far-fetched to imagine some more cheeky humour pouring from the mind that invented Jew Jube's fictional album title, Profits Prophets and Other Righteous Homonyms.

The Vancouver Jewish Film Festival will be screening the film on April 13 at 9:30 p.m. at the Norman Rothstein Theatre as part of their festival line-up. It will be shown before a documentary called Awake Zion about the connections between Jewish and reggae culture.

Clips of Jew Jube can be viewed at www.jewjube.com

EDITOR CYNTHIA GOOD HEADS NEW BOOK PUBLISHING PROGRAM AT HUMBER

Former Penguin editor Cynthia Good has been hired to establish a creative book-publishing program at the Humber Institute of Technology and Advanced Learning, the school announced recently.

As the former editorial director and president of Penguin Canada's publishing division for two decades, Good built up one of the country's leading publishing programs and personally edited manuscripts by an impressive list of notable scribes, including John Ralston Saul, Michael Ignatieff and Mordecai Richler.

Hal Niedzviecki

"Cynthia brings to Humber what no one else can: an extraordinary record of achievement combined with an uncanny instinct for teaching and learning," said Joe Kertes, dean of Humber's School of Creative & Performing Arts.

An intensive, four-month regimen, the book-publishing program includes courses on acquisitions, book design and production, creativity, contracts and legal issues, self-publishing and international publishing.

It is designed to prepare college and university graduates for careers in all aspects of book publishing – a field that has undergone "tumultuous change" over the last decade, Good said.

"My hope for the program is to encourage students to explore the future of publishing and, in doing so, to become that future," she said.

Applications are currently being accepted for the May to August semester. For details, visit the website ontariocolleges.ca or contact Good at cynthia.good@humber.ca

New book aims to improve Israel's image abroad

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel is constantly in the news, but its image in the media leaves much to be desired.

Mainly as a result of the second Palestinian uprising, Israel is often portrayed negatively, its achievements in a variety of fields all but ignored.

A new, illustrated book, Israel and the World: Changing Lives Through Innovation (Weidenfeld & Nicolson), aims at altering perceptions of Israel and burnishing its image as a progressive nation.

It is written by British journalists Helen and Douglas Davis, with a foreword by Australian media magnate Rupert Murdoch.

"The book looks at the Israel that exists behind the tragedies and dramas that form the daily headlines," said Mark Waldman, chair of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy Public Affairs Committee.

"It takes an in-depth journey around a remarkable country which has successfully become one of the world's technological, economic and cultural leaders."

Published in Britain, Israel and the World is scheduled to be launched in Canada on Friday, April 8, between 4 and 5:30 p.m. at the Indigo book store at Yonge and Eglinton.

Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert will attend the launch.

Israel's consul in Toronto, Yaacov (Cobie) Brosh, has given the 227-page volume to friends, particularly non-Jews.

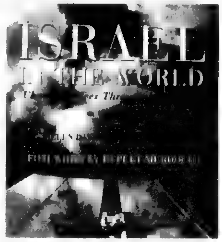
"It's a fabulous book," he said. "It shows Israel as it is beyond the (Arab-Israeli) conflict. It shows a modern developed country that contributes to the world. I'm proud of it."

Brosh pointed out it is privately published and was not issued by the Israeli government.

Israel in the World was conceived and underwritten by Trevor Pears, a Jewish philanthropist in Britain whose family has amassed a fortune in real estate.

Waldman, Pears' friend, has been given exclusive rights to the book in Canada.

All profits will go to the Emet Foundation, a charitable fund established by Pears to coincide with the publication of the album.



"Israel's portrayal is too often a negative one, and this book is a true testament to Israel's success story," said Waldman. "It is a story that needs to be known and needs to be told."

He believes Israel in the World could help tilt Canadian public opinion in Israel's favour and even boost foreign investment in the Jewish state.

Research conducted by the Canada Israel Committee and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy reveals a depressing picture.

Eight out of 10 Canadians know so little about the Arab-Israeli conflict that they prefer to be neutral.

Only 38 per cent of Canadians think Israel is one of Canada's important trading partners.

Only 42 per cent believe Israel is a democracy.

"Research tells us the best way to increase Canadian support for Israel is through education, through the shared values of our two countries," said Waldman.

"Israel in the World can be an important tool to support our national Israel advocacy strategy," he added. " It's an easy way to introduce non-Jewish Canadians to the Israel not represented in Canadian media."

In addition, the volume highlights the humanitarian and democratic values Israel and Canada share, he noted.

The introductory essay in Israel in the World sets the tone:

"Israel is probably the only country in history to have had a world class university, sophisticated medical, scientific and agricultural research institutes, and an internationally acclaimed philharmonic orchestra even before it became a state in 1948."

The text then goes on to list Israeli breakthroughs in technology, without forgetting Israel's status as an incubator of culture in terms of literature and music.

Taking note of Israel's remarkable accomplishments in technology, Murdoch writes: "I fully expect Israel to remain at the forefront of technological development into the future. This book is a record of some of the achievements of Israeli technology companies, and a testimonial to the Israelis' incredible originality, dynamism and entrepreneurship."

The book focuses on a number of related topics, ranging from Israel's path-breaking capabilities in medicine, science, technology and agriculture to its dynamic society.

The final chapter, titled Outreach, deals, in part, with the Center for International Cooperation (Mashav), an arm of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Mashav offers training courses to individuals in the developing world. They take these courses in Israel and their home countries.

Passion for nature motivates George Fischer

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Special to The CJN

From the exotic (Tunisia, Tuscany, Guatemala), to the domestic (Montreal, Toronto, Fredericton) George Fischer's eye-catching pictures are always vibrant.

His work has graced the covers of travel brochures, posters, books and postcards for a host of different nations and regions. From Malta to the Magdalene Islands, Tuscany to Toronto, Fischer's keen eye has captured the still images that have helped motivate untold thousands of people to travel abroad and see the sights for themselves.

His pictures have appeared in the Los Angeles Times, Le Monde and the Globe and Mail among others. He's published several books including Chariots of Chrome: Classic American Cars of Cuba and Castles & Cottages: River Retreats of the Thousand Islands.

"I just can't be without work," he says with a chuckle.

His newest book is Classic Wooden Boats of the 1000 Islands (Boston Mills Press). It's a gorgeous hardcover pictorial essay showcasing the boats from the 1950s which continue to glide over the waterways of the 1000 Islands region.

Writer Anthony Mollica collaborated with Fischer on this latest release. "George is an artist… [He] sees far more in an image than other people. He's also so personable… I wouldn't hesitate to work with him again for one moment," he said.

When promotion for this book is done, Fischer, 50, will follow with spring work trips to Turkey, the Maldives and Guatemala. And then there are 10 scheduled May poster releases, which include, Paris En Noir, Kentucky: Best of Bluegrass Country and Langarra Island, B.C.

George Fischer

The motivating force behind his work is his passion for nature. He is a self-admitted nature junky. "My friends call me 'nature boy'. I am totally happy sitting by a waterfall all day long and just listening to it," he says serenely. Yet Fischer's photography tactics are anything but tranquil. When it comes to getting "the shot" he's a daredevil.

"When I'm behind the camera I don't feel any danger. I feel invincible," he says. Some of the risky tactics he's employed include: hanging onto the front "cowcatcher" of a moving freight train in Kentucky, sitting half-exposed from a helicopter in British Columbia and negotiating treacherous ledges behind massive waterfalls in Ontario.

"I must have almost killed myself 40-50 times during the waterfall shoot alone," he says, amazing even himself upon recalling the experience.

But with risk comes reward, and Fischer's results have impressed all who have seen them. The Tourism Quebec offices in Toronto are graced by Fischer's many posters of the Magdalene Islands and thousands of copies of his books have been bought by eager fans.

Fischer initially entered the workforce as an accountant after graduating from Concordia University in Montreal. He soon realized that his need for more creative self-expression overrode his conservative upbringing and desire for financial stability.

"I wasn't following my heart," he says "It started to eat me up inside. This isn't me, I thought, I can't wear three-piece suits and ties and do this dry stuff."

He eventually found his calling with photography and ended up moving to Toronto to ply his trade.

Born in Hungary in 1954, Fischer came to Canada with his parents and siblings during the Hungarian uprising. Having spent a year in a displaced persons camp, they were eventually sponsored over by Sam Steinberg (of the now-defunct Steinberg's food chain). "My mother was in Auschwitz for a year. She survived that and then went back to the village she grew up in and then along came the revolution."

The memories are still painful but as with his photography, Fischer insists on wandering through this dangerous topical landscape.

"It was really an escape. We were hidden under hay carts and there were bullets flying all around. I'm still psychologically scarred from that," he says with a nervous laugh. Yet he acknowledges that his childhood traumas and memories have helped form his career.

"I definitely think there's a link between my mother's drive and my work ethic," he says.

While not a religious man, Fischer is proud of his heritage. "How my mother survived Auschwitz is still unfathomable to me. That drive has been instilled in [my family] to survive and succeed," he says.

He lives with his wife and two boys in Toronto and. has a summer cottage on Quebec's scenic Magdalene Islands where he can be close to nature and derive inspiration for his work. For more information and to see samples of Fischer's work, visit his website at: www.georgefischerphotography.com.

Yiddish is 'fun' in new York class

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Celebrants at a recent reception at York University were kvelling over the accomplishments of students in the school's first Yiddish language course.

"I love it. It's so much fun," Rachel Hindel told The CJN. The first-year student is one of 15 enrolled in the introductory course. An additional four students audit the class, which is taught by Kalman Weiser, holder of the Silber Chair in Holocaust and Eastern European Jewry.

"It's a phenomenal class," said David Goldberg, a second-year student. "It incorporates Yiddish language and Jewish culture."

Martin Lockshin, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, told the 80 people at the festive event, which included entertainment by musician Brian Katz, that many aspects of Jewish studies are closed to people who do not speak Yiddish.

Kalman Weiser

He thanked the university's administration for its support, and also thanked the organized Jewish community. The course was facilitated by a partnership between the Centre for Jewish Studies, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Committee for Yiddish and the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

Weiser, a 32-year-old New Yorker – speaking in Yiddish – said that Holocaust studies shouldn't be only about the death of Jews, but about the life, history and literature of European Jewry.

Fourth-year student Joshua Tanenbaum, one of two students who addressed the audience in Yiddish, said he didn't hear Yiddish at home growing up, but decided as he was reaching the end of his teens that he wanted to learn the language.

His classmate Rachel Libman said that Yiddish is not just a language of history, but a living language.

NEW HANDBOOK FOR STUDENTS: Students for Democracy, an ad hoc group of Israel supporters spread across several university campuses, has issued a new booklet packed with capsule information about Israel. The handbook was facilitated by Betar-Tagar Canada, the student wing of Herut-Likud. Fifty thousand copies have been printed and are being distributed to Hillels and Israel action committees on campuses across Canada. The booklet is also online at www.studentsfor democracy.ca.

Tigers fantasy camp a reality for Eisenstadt namesake

By DAVID EISENSTADT
Special to The CJN

LAKELAND, Fla. — In 1938 and 1939, "Hammerin'" Hank Greenberg led a Detroit Tigers lineup that included left-handed pitcher Harry Eisenstadt. For seven glorious days in January, I joined their alumni roster as the latest Eisenstadt to don Tigers' blue, albeit at the team's fantasy camp.

Learning to really play hardball, meeting phenoms of yesteryear, honing my skills, swapping tall tales, and generally having the time of my life made the week about as good as it gets.

The fantasy camp was a special birthday gift that my wife Rhoda, sons Harris and Evan and daughter-in law Sara made into a reality last July. Only 13 Major League teams (not including the Toronto Blue Jays) hold fantasy camps. Detroit's offerings were appealing and the Eisenstadt connection didn't hurt.

In preparation, I made three commitments: to get into better shape (to reduce the chance of getting hurt), to not play like a rookie, and to not expect a contract when the real spring training kicked off in March.

I started working with a personal trainer last September, becoming faithful to a two-day- to three-day-a-week gym regimen. When I entered camp, I was more fit than I'd been in years. I made a bunch of new friends and I didn't play like a rook. It was disappointing when no contract arrived.

Under the guidance of amiable camp director Jerry Lewis, 90 wannabees took to the Tiger Town diamonds in Lakeland, Fla., about 40 minutes from Tampa. Lakeland has a 68-year love affair with the Tigers as the team's spring training destination, the longest in the Major Leagues.

The weather was great, the camaraderie rampant, and the instruction first rate. And for a baseball lover, what a day job!

The Tiger Town crown jewel is Joker Marchant Stadium, where the Tigers play spring training "home" games. The complex includes five other fields, batting cages, pitchers' mounds, a clubhouse with training and equipment rooms, and lots of green grass for tossing balls and shagging flies.

Campers were divided into six teams. We immediately produced our first stats: average age, 49; oldest camper, 84; four women; two father-son combos, and four Canadians. Many were veteran campers.

My team coaches included legendary Tigers' outfielder/designated hitter Willie Horton and 1968 World Series relief pitcher Jon (King Crab) Warden.

Players had to be in better-than-average shape, which made me really appreciate the baseball program set for me by Debra Basch, my Toronto trainer.

It was quite a rush to enter the clubhouse and see my cubicle with my "home white" and "road grey" Eisenstadt-lettered uniforms, Number 1, hanging ready. I was able to take them home for keeps.

Camp began with "Kangaroo Court," a timeless tradition in which ballplayers are fined for infractions such as dropping balls and striking out.

Our misdemeanours included missing a belt loop or forgetting a mitt on the field, which resulted in levies ranging from $2 to $15. It was all for a good cause, as the fines were donated to an autism research facility in Michigan headed by former Tiger catcher, now broadcaster, Jim Price.

The day started with on-field stretching led by trainers, followed by batting practice and pitching and catching instruction. I had a personal batting clinic with Horton. It had been 42 years since I'd hit a hardball with a wooden bat, and his tips were invaluable. Pitcher Mickey Lolich, a Hall of Fame Veterans nominee, also made certain I understood the difference between fastballs, sliders, curves and change-ups.

We won our first game 16-10, and I went one-for-three against pitchers throwing 50 to 70 mph heat.

That night, coaches Horton, Warden, Lolich, Price, Dick Traciewski, Mike Heath, Rusty Kuntz, Juan Berenguer, Johnny Grubb, Milt Wilcox, Milt Cuyler, Dave Rozema, John Hiller and Doug Bair signed autographs for adults, who reverted to behaving like awe-struck kids.

On day two, I walked my first time at bat. Hitting behind me, New Yorker Jay Crawford (he hosts ESPN's Cold Pizza) hit a big-blast triple. I definitely learned that 90 feet between bases is a long way. But I was barely puffing as I rounded third on the coach's wave, scoring a run.

That game, I got two good hits, which made up for being stalled on base because of two outs and a slower runner ahead of me. Such is the game! Playing "under the lights" at nearby Henley Field, helped us jell as a team and we won 5-0 against the team that eventually took the week's championship.

Mid-week, I had some off-field fun. Tigers Radio, The Sports Station 1270 AM in Detroit, set up a remote broadcast and I was interviewed live. Apparently some Michigonians were listening, because the camp director told me he received "a half-dozen calls about the Toronto guy talking about his Fantasy Camp experiences."

Our team ended the "regular season" tied for third with an even win-loss split over six games. My best performance came in our semi-final playoff game, when I hit two singles in as many at bats, driving in a run.

My stats included 19 at-bats, four runs scored, five hits, two walks, two strikeouts, one run-batted-in and a .263 average. They say a Major Leaguer has it "made in the shade" if they can achieve a .270 average. Since I'm not quite there, I'll continue to enjoy the sunshine.

The final daytime match at Henley Field saw all campers bat once and take a couple of innings in the infield against the former Tigers who had been coaching us all week.

Prior to the game and U.S. national anthem, we lined up alphabetically along the first base line. Every player was introduced by name and number while running to home plate, past a photographer and videographer to capture the moment… while tipping our caps to the crowd of about 150 cheering fans. Yessss!

Mighty Ducks minyan honours team trainer

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Avenue Road Hockey Association is not a Jewish league per se, but it does manage to accommodate its more observant players and coaches on the Sabbath.

The league, which plays at Baycrest Arena, participates in weekend tournaments, but never on Shabbat itself. At a recent tournament in Niagara-on-the-Lake for midget select teams (16-year-olds), the league's Mighty Ducks went one better than its usual practice, bringing along a Torah scroll and a makeshift ark, davening on Shabbat, and apportioning the weekly Torah reading among various players.

The midget minyan was aimed at accommodating the team's trainer, Molyn Lescsz, and paying tribute to his father, Saul, who died a few months ago in Winnipeg.

Jack Frieberg, co-coach of the team, said preparations for the special Sabbath observance went on without Lescsz's knowledge, even though his son, Noah, the team captain, was included among the torah "leiners."

Frieberg constructed the ark of plywood and decorated it with a Star of David and the Avenue Road logo, which is modelled on that of the Anaheim Mighty Ducks. The boys, many of them students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, were asked to read one segment of the weekly parshah, Trumah, which dealt with the construction of the ark in ancient times.

The Torah scroll was provided by the Village Shul, where Frieberg davens, and the whole service was conducted in the hotel's hospitality suite in the White Oaks Resort.

Lescsz was kept in the dark about the team's plans right to the last minute and he was surprised at the elaborate preparations to allow him to say kaddish in a Shabbat minyan, Frieberg said.

Saul Lescsz, 92, was a Holocaust survivor who operated a grocery store and was known in the community for his charitable attitude towards customers who couldn't afford to put food on the table, said Frieberg.

"It was emotional. It meant a lot to [Molyn]," said Frieberg, who delivered a dvar Torah about the parshah.

The weekly Torah segment told the story of the ancient Israelites, who gave up their jewelry to help construct the ark. Similarly, the team members gave up their time to learn to read sections of the parshah, he said. And of course, the plywood ark was put together specifically for the event.

"It was a special thing," Frieberg said. "It brought up the sanctity of the whole situation."

It also served as a good team-building exercise though that didn't necessarily show on the ice. The midgets finished the tournament 1-1-1, but, as Frieberg said, sometimes there are things that are more important than hockey.

CHOCOLATE MACAROONS

1 1/3 cups mini semisweet chocolate chips divided into 1 cup & 1/3 cup
2 lg. egg whites
1/2 cup sugar
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
1 1/2 cup sweetened flaked coconut

Preheat oven to 325°F. Line 2 lg. baking sheets with parchment paper. Place 1 cup chocolate chips in microwave-safe bowl; microwave on low setting at 10-second intervals until chocolate is melted, stirring occasionally. Cool just to room temperature.

Using electric mixer, beat egg whites and salt in med. bowl until soft peaks form. Gradually add sugar, then vanilla, beating until whites are thick and glossy. Fold in melted chocolate and coconut, then remaining 1/3 cup chocolate chips.

Drop batter by heaping teaspoonfuls onto prepared sheets, spacing 1 1/2" apart. Bake cookies 10 min. or until tops are dry and cracked and tester inserted into centres comes out with moist crumbs attached, about 10 mins. longer. Cool cookies on sheets on racks. Store airtight at room temperature up to 2 days.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

The conviction of former Worldcom Inc. chairman Bernard Ebbers on multiple counts of fraud and related charges raises the question of executive responsibility for actions of others in a company. Ebbers' defence was that he did not understand the accounting irregularities engineered by his chief financial officer. From a Jewish perspective, what is most interesting is the fact the case revolved around the believability of his claim of ignorance about the goings-on in a company that he headed. There was never a claim that he himself perpetrated fraud – rather that he "pushed" his staff to achieve better results, leading them to doctor the books.

While the Torah is meant to serve as a moral guide, the Torah court system deals primarily in legal issues, and from a legal perspective, you can only be held accountable for crimes that you actually commit. Thus, Jewish law prescribes (in theory) a death penalty for the hit man who kills, while the organized crime leaders who sent him would escape such a fate.

The CEO who directs fraud to be committed by others escapes legal liability, whereas the underling who carries out such orders must bear the full brunt of the law. The moral failings of the "bosses" are to be dealt with by God at the appropriate time. You can be liable in the heavenly court but absolved in the earthly court. No such luck awaits the low-level employee who follows orders. The Torah demands that you take personal responsibility for your actions. Pinning the blame on another person is a moral failing with legal implications. Therefore, the CFO of Worldcom Inc., as the actual perpetrator of criminal activity, should receive the greater punishment.

Nevertheless, Jewish law recognizes the legal right of secular governments to establish law and order as they see fit. If that means greater jail time for overseers of crime, so be it. Furthermore, while the Jewish legal system itself does not allow for vicarious punishment, Jewish courts have extra judicial powers that can be used, provided there is a strong likelihood of correcting a social wrong. Thus, if evidence existed that jailing criminal ringleaders would actually serve as a deterrent to others, Jewish law would recommend looking beyond the legal issues in order to focus on the social one of reducing crime by all means possible.

Some Jewish praise for Filipino nannies

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Wouldn't it be thrilling if we could understand the makeup of our identity by scanning ourselves into a computer and then analyzing the data about the people who have influenced who we are? A child prodigy who is a product of a Sephardi-Ashkenazi marriage might produce data showing a bloodline dating back to Rabbeinu Moshe ben Maimon (the Rambam, born in 1135 in Cordova, Spain), one of the greatest Jewish legal scholars ever, and to Solomon ben Isaac of Troyes (Rashi, 1040–1105), the first major Ashkenazi literary figure on the Bible and Talmud.

The data would also reveal input from our families, teachers and friends. In many cases, the computer might also spew out a report showing the effect of the Philippines – or, more specifically, that of our beloved Filipino nannies.

The Philippines is the largest exporter of labour in Asia – more than 4 million Filipino migrants are scattered around the world in 43 countries, and about 70 per cent are domestics. Toronto has its fair share of Filipino nannies, and many of them work in Jewish homes.

I've asked a number of friends about the influence their nannies have had on their households. The response I have heard most often is that Filipino nannies exude a sophistication, consideration and civility that is extraordinary.

A friend said that his children learned a lot about authentic respect from their nanny, and that his household was more peaceful and serene with her there.

An acquaintance told me about a beautifully spirited Filipino nanny who passed away while in his employ. Tearfully, he said his family mourned her in a very profound manner, the way one might grieve a relative.

Many people I've spoken to said that their Filipino nannies integrated themselves into their homes almost seamlessly. These families would prepare a place for them at their table – weekdays and Shabbat – rather than allowing them to eat alone, as if unworthy of the family's attention and company.

Filipino culture is very rich, but the people are often very poor. The culture celebrates the beauty of life in all its splendour, yet many of the joyful Filipino women who walk children in our local parks have large families back home that rely on their wire transfers to subsist. Whereas coconut and sugar used to be one of the Philippines' main exports, today the country's largest source of foreign currency comes from Filipino workers abroad, including nannies, who send home billions of dollars each year.

Yet clearly, the nanny-family relationship is more than simply utilitarian. It represents a highly complex mixture of cultures, a meeting between people with great expectations and a willingness to trust.

In essence, by hiring a Filipino nanny, by inviting her into our home to help us raise our children – glistening trinkets tucked safely in the amulet of our souls – we are actualizing our belief that this woman, and the Asian culture she harbours, is able to care for, teach and love our little ones in a way that's in sync with our values and parenting methods.

Conversely, this courageous individual who travelled thousands of miles from the safety of her home, and often from her own children, has chosen to share her gift of child rearing with us – strangers, people of a different way and religion.

Throughout the millennia, numerous nations, peoples and states have influenced the Jewish way of life. Today, that list can be expanded to include Filipino nannies, to whom we entrust, and with whom we share, the arduous task of raising our progenies – a job strenuous in its execution and divine in its nature.

Pettigrew 'disappointed' by Israel

— CIC criticizes foreign minister —

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) has expressed its dismay at last week's condemnation by the federal government of Israel's plans to expand a large Jewish settlement in the West Bank.

Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew issued a statement last Wednesday saying Canada was "disappointed" by Israel's move to build some 3,500 new homes in Ma'aleh Adumim, a community on the outskirts of Jerusalem.

Canada "urges the Israeli government to reconsider this decision," Pettigrew's statement read.

Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew

"Canada calls upon both Israel and the Palestinian Authority to fulfill their reciprocal obligations under the Roadmap for Peace."

The minister said Canada "has repeatedly emphasized to Israel that these settlements are inconsistent with international law. This development runs contrary to the commitments Israel made" to recent U.S.-led peace negotiations.

Israel's announcement is also "out of step with renewed signs of co-operation between Israelis and Palestinians," Pettigrew said.

Halachah sheds light on Schiavo case

By JOANNE PALMER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — As a series of American courts struggled with the issue of whether to reconnect Terri Schiavo's feeding tube, Jewish scholars turned to Halachah, or Jewish religious law, for guidance on the issue.

Schiavo, the severely brain-damaged Florida woman whose parents and husband battled in state and then federal courts for more than a decade, became the insensate centre of a swirl of emotion and legal action.

Religious leaders also got involved: Terri Schiavo and her parents, Mary and Robert Schindler, are Roman Catholic, and many of their most fervent supporters are fundamentalist Protestants.

The Schindlers wanted to keep their daughter's feeding tube in, while Terry's husband, Michael Schiavo, wanted it removed so his wife can die a natural death.

Jews, like others caught up in the debate, have a range of beliefs, and their understanding of how to apply Halachah varies according. Virtually all the rabbis interviewed, though, told JTA that they did not agree with attempts by some conservative Christians to tie Schiavo's case to the public debate about abortion.

At the traditional end of the spectrum, Rabbi Avi Shafran of the Agudath Israel of America said the Schiavo case is "straightforward from

Ex-CJC Head Dies

TORONTO — Milton Harris, founder and CEO of Harris Steel and a former president of Canadian Jewish Congress, died in Toronto on March 26 of cancer. He was 77. "Milton embodied the true spirit of menschlichkeit," CJC president Ed Morgan said. "He led by example." The London, Ont.,-born activist "understood and appreciated the plight of the immigrant and the newcomer," and sought redress for Japanese Canadians and pushed to bring Nazi war criminals to justice, Morgan said.

Fees Too High: El Al

OTTAWA — Repeating earlier warnings, El Al's Canadian manager told a federal transport committee last week that there's a "very real possibility" El Al will end service to Toronto's Pearson International Airport because it can't afford the $12,000 in fees per landing. Stanley Morais said fees have left El Al with razor-thin profit margins on its five weekly flights to Canada. Pearson's fees are the world's fifth highest, government figures show. By contrast, landing fees in Israel are about $3,000, said Morais, who was speaking as chair of the Association of Airline Representatives in Canada.

WORLD

Hezbollah TV Banned

BRUSSELS — European Union broadcasting regulators in Brussels said that as of March 21, no European satellite would carry al-Manar, which has already been banned in the United States and France because of its ties to the Lebanese terror group Hezbollah and because of its inflammatory anti-Semitic content. The move was prompted by the discovery that a Dutch satellite carrier was relaying the station.

Arrest in Arson Case

ZURICH — An unemployed Swiss man was arrested for setting fires that destroyed a synagogue library and a Jewish-owned clothing store. Police said the man who lit the fires March 13 in Lugano acted alone and was not part of an anti-Semitic or racist group.

Jews Kept Off Juries?

SAN JOSE — A former prosecutor in California says he worked with a judge to keep Jews off juries in death penalty cases. John Quatman told a court last Tuesday that the late Alameda County Superior Court Judge judge Stanley Golde told him he wanted Jews off capital cases because they would never vote for the death penalty. Quatman's testimony has been forwarded to the California Supreme Court, which is considering whether to grant a new trial for Fred Freeman, who was convicted of murder and robbery at a bar in 1987.

No Songs for Lebanon

BEIRUT — Lebanon pulled out of May's Eurovision song contest to avoid broadcasting a possible Israeli victory. "According to Lebanese national legislation, Tele-Liban is not permitted to broadcast the performance of the Israeli participant, thereby breaching [Eurovision] rules," said a statement on Eurovision's website. The station will pay a fine. "Lebanon is in a state of war with Israel," Ibrahim Khoury, Tele-Liban's director said. "If the Israeli contestant wins, we would have to show the celebrations." Israel has won the popular contest three times. This would have been Lebanon's first appearance.

Hate Up in France

PARIS — Attacks on French Jews and Muslims and their institutions doubled last year, a new report says. There were 1,565 recorded threats and violent attacks in 2004, up from 833 in 2003, according to the National Consultative Commission of Human Rights' annual report. The number was the highest in a decade. There were 970 anti-Semitic acts in 2004, compared to 601 in 2003, the report said.

CJC Praises Federal Anti-Racism Plan

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress says it welcomes the federal government's new $56-million anti-racism plan, which was unveiled last week in Ottawa.

Congress said that the plan shows Ottawa's commitment to eradicating racism, and that it was"pleased" it made fighting hate on the Internet a priority, but it also urged the government to change the way it defines racism.

Executive vice-president Manuel Prutschi said Ottawa "must recognize that members of minority communities can themselves be both victimized by, and perpetrators of, racism… [The plan] fails to recognize the more contemporary sources and manifestations of racism that spring from the importation into Canada of geo-political frictions from around the world, and their subsequent negative impact on domestic civil discourse."

Prutschi was also surprised anti-Semitism was not included among the plan's examples of racism, given its recent resurgence domestically and internationally. "Why has anti-Semitism become the racism that we recognize implicitly but dare not speak its name?" he asked.

'Hero' of Ethiopian Jewish struggle battles for kidney donation

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Baruch Tegegne, the man credited with rescuing untold numbers of his fellow Ethiopian Jews, is now in a fight for his own life.

Tegegne, 61, needs a kidney transplant and a group of his friends, led by Toronto filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, thought they had found one, from a man in India, through a website that connects live persons willing to donate an organ – without compensation – to strangers.

The Royal Victoria Hospital (RVH), the leading Montreal transplant centre, refuses to conduct transplants under such circumstances, for both ethical and practical reasons.

The buying and selling of organs is illegal in Canada, but there is no law explictly prohibiting so-called "altruistic" donations from unrelated persons.

Last week Tegegne's lawyer, Michael Bergman, launched what he called precedent-setting legal action against the RVH, part of the McGill University Health Centre (MUHC). In a letter to RVH director general Timothy Meagher, Bergman states that the hospital's refusal to "even consider" testing the potential donor for his compatibility, let alone perform the transplant, endangers Tegegne's life and, thereby, his rights under the Canadian and Quebec charters.

Bergman also says it violates the right to medical treatment under the Canada Health Act and Quebec health-care legislation, as well as the medical profession's Hippocratic oath.

If the RVH does not act "within a reasonable delay," the letter states that Bergman will seek a court order to force it to do so.

MUHC spokesperson Seeta Ramdass said the hospital is making no comment now that the matter is the subject of legal action.

In February, Dr. Douglas Keith, head of the RVH's living donor transplant program, was quoted in the National Post as saying the hospital has never performed a transplant between strangers as a result of an altruistic donation. He said the RVH could not be sure there is no "quid pro quo" agreement between Tegegne and the potential donor, and that it looks suspicious because the latter is from the Third World and the contact was made via the Internet.

Baruch Tegegne

Tegegne, who undergoes dialysis four times a week at the Jewish General Hospital, has been waiting for a transplant for more than two years and his health is said to be deteriorating. None of his seven brothers in Israel are able to donate a kidney, he said at a media conference where the legal action was announced.

Speaking softly and looking somewhat frail, Tegegne said: "I want to live like everybody… When the donor in India was found, I was so happy – I thought I would have another life."

Tegegne, a pioneer of the Ethiopian Jewish aliyah movement, moved to Montreal 1979 and is believed to be the first Ethiopian Jew to settle in Canada. His dramatic escape by foot from Ethiopia in 1974 to get to Israel and his activism in persuading the Israeli government to rescue the little-known Jews of Ethiopia was featured in Jacobovici's 1983 documentary Falasha: Exile of the Black Jews. Tegegne has spent much of the past 20 years working among the Ethiopian community in Africa and Israel.

Jacobovici, also at the conference, called Tegegne "a hero who has saved hundreds, if not thousands, from the refugee camps in war-torn Ethiopia."

Jacobovici paid a $441 (US) fee to advertise Tegegne's request for a kidney on www.matchingdonors.com for three months. It was answered by a 30-year-old Indian man, Shree Dhar, who participated in the conference by telephone hook-up. Jacobovici said he, and other friends of Tegegne, will pay for Dhar's travel expenses to Canada, as well as a "reasonable" amount to compensate him for lost wages during his recovery.

'Expose the hypocrisy'

From the editor's desk

The world of make-believe generally has three characteristics: it is usually the domain of children; it evokes good feelings and it remains in the realm of dreams.

There appears, however, to be one striking exception to this observation: the United Nations.

The UN is the adult domain of the representatives of the governments of 191 member states, only a minority of which are democracies. It evokes disappointment, sadness and rage, the cumulative effect of the chilling inversions of wrong over right. And their deliberations have become something of a nightmare for the supporters of Israel and other peace-loving individuals.

At a recent presentation in Toronto, human rights expert Anne Bayefsky described the UN as "the leading purveyor of anti-Semitism today."

As reported in The CJN, for the last four decades, Bayefsky pointed out, the UN has been crafting a message of Israel as the leading racists of our time. "Discrimination against Israel has turned to demonization," she said.

Within the imposing umbrella structure of the UN, the Human Rights Commission is the small, fractal body reflecting back the non-make-believe, nightmarish inversions of its larger whole.

The 53-member body began its six-week-long term of deliberations last week. It should be noted that among the members of the commission charged with protecting the human rights of the citizens of the world are Sudan, whose government, without cease, slaughters its own citizens in Darfur; Cuba, whose government has remained for almost 50 years, since 1959, the rule of a strong-armed dictator; and China, whose anachronistic communist system of government allows no political freedoms for the more than one billion people it governs.

Despite the publicly stated resolve of the commission's newly appointed Canadian head, Louise Arbour, to abate the anti-Israel rhetoric and the hopeful UN reform plan unveiled by Secretary General Kofi Annan, the nightmare continues.

Israel continues to be singled out unfairly, vilified, demonized and cast as a pariah among the nations of the world and deserving of a pariah's fate.

Last week, the item on the commission's agenda dealt with the right of states to self-determination.

As reported by UN Watch, the discussion around the commission's table "was almost entirely consumed with speeches invoking Palestinian rights and Israeli violations, by Muslim states as well as China and Cuba."

The communique issued by UN Watch pointed out that Saudi Arabia accused Israel of "inhuman practices against the Palestinian people" and of "inhuman attempts to impose its domination on the Palestinian people," of having "usurped Palestinian rights" and of committing "grievous" violations" under a "policy of repression."

The only appropriate response to the patently false accusations from this phony human rights forum is, as Bayefsky urged, "to expose the hypocrisy."

Many groups worldwide, including closer to home, the Canada-Israel Committee, do precisely that.

They fight the verbal onslaught against Israel and the Jewish people by closely monitoring and responding to the hate that emanates from the UN and its many subordinate agencies.

One of the key groups is UN Watch.

Based in Geneva, UN Watch is a non-governmental organization established in 1993, whose stated aims are "to promote the balanced, fair and non-discriminatory application of the purposes and principles of the UN Charter and to encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, gender, culture, language, or religion." Hillel Neuer, from Montreal, is its executive director.

Neuer took his turn last week at the microphone and spoke eloquently.

"Israel, which is again trading land in the hope for peace, has officially recognized Palestinian self-determination, in the 'road map' [peace plan] and elsewhere. What, then, can be gained by resolutions and rhetoric asserting that which has already been accepted?" he asked.

"For these regimes, one thing only: an entrenchment of their decades-long campaign, centred at the United Nations, to demonize and delegitimize Israel and the Jewish people."

"This campaign is pernicious – and should outrage all who believe in equality, peace and human rights," he said.

"First, the singling out of Israel for differential treatment constitutes a gross violation of the UN Charter's guarantee of equal rights for all nations, large and small...

"Second, the anti-Israel campaign is an obstacle to Middle East peace. The effect of one-sided resolutions in the region is to encourage extremists over moderates, intransigence over compromise.

"Finally, if the commission's human rights agenda remains captive to the Israel-haters' political agenda, our goal of restoring its credibility shall be elusive indeed."

This current session of the UN Human Rights Commission began on March 14 and is slated to continue until April 22. We must all fight and expose the hypocrisy.

SO LONG, AND THANKS FOR ALL THE FISH: Haifa Bay became a temporary haven last week for a pod of about 50 rough-toothed dolphins. The rare mammals likely came to the bay by following a school of gray mullet. The unusual occurrence attracted a number of marine biologists, supported by naval personnel and harbour police, who tried to ensure the animals did not get trapped in the bay or injured by ships coming into Haifa's port. It was also feared the dolphins might beach themselves and die. Shipping movements were curtailed to encourage them to return to the open sea, which they eventually did. [Israel photo]

Israeli products, family fun just part of annual Shuk

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

A celebration of Israeli goods, grub and grooves brought together hundreds of people on Sunday for the third annual Shuk In The Park festival.

With "see, taste, hear and feel the spirit of Israel" as the motto, the event featured vendors selling Israeli products, bands playing Hebrew tunes and various booths from Jewish community groups.

"We are bringing Israeli culture and an Israeli marketplace to Toronto… to see the community come together to support Israel," said Vivian Ringwald of Olive Branch For Israel, co-organizer of the event with Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

"It brings a taste of Israel to Toronto."

Shuffling between the 30-plus booths, patrons purchased a diverse array of Israeli items, ranging from cosmetics and CDs to chocolates and juices.

"Business has been very good," said jeweller Lilah Ishaik, who showcased several sterling silver items including bracelets, rings, pendants and chandelier earrings from her Lilah Diamonds collection.

"It's been busy."

Hungry revellers munched on falafel while music fans danced to the beat of Hebrew and Judaic songs.

"It's grooving and I'm having fun," said Nili Abrahams, 47, while bopping to the sounds of the Bais Groove Band.

"It's a nice way to spend the day with the kids. And I think it's a great way of continuing to make people aware that Israel needs our support."

The event's launch three years ago was prompted by the boycott of Israeli goods in several countries, particularly in Europe.

In addition to bolstering business for Israeli products and celebrating Israeli culture, the Shuk also has a charitable mandate, as net proceeds are directed to Orr Shalom, a non-profit organization that cares for Israeli children suffering from neglect and abuse.

The Shuk has previously been held outdoors, but a rainout last August led to its being rescheduled indoors at the Kolel centre on Eglinton Avenue West.

The change of venue didn't affect the turnout.

"We're part of the community and the community is here today," said Darryl Borden of Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

"You just have to look around… Everybody is here."

Tired, fearful men squander opportunity

The esteemed leaders and representatives of the 22-member Arab League last week concluded their annual three-day meeting. Before the conclave, which was held this year in Algiers, King Abdullah of Jordan generated some excitement among western observers, and even among some of his more progressive co-religionists, by suggesting that the members of the League not wait for the signing of a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority to take some small, tentative steps to normalize relations with the Jewish state.

The king sensibly surmised that so demonstrable a welcoming gesture by the League toward Israel would send a powerful, positive, confidence-building signal to the Israeli public and would likely increase the motivation for Israelis to take even more risks to achieve peace with their Palestinian neighbours.

But the proposal was publicly rejected before the meeting began.

The king was embarrassed and chose not to travel to Algiers.

The final Arab League communique merely threw sharp Mediterranean sea salt into the king's sorely wounded monarchical pride. "We don't see any reason for a rush [to normal relations]," said Arab League secretary-general Amr Moussa. "Israel is still building settlements and the [West Bank] barrier. They don't deserve anything… If they had taken any step, we would have taken a step," he said. (Our empahsis.)

Moussa's statement was breathtakingly ignorant. To say that Israel has not taken any step is to have been wilfully blind to a society-wrenching decision by Prime Minster Ariel Sharon to disengage from Gaza and from northern Samaria. As a result, the communique was simply more of the same obtuse, self-serving political piffle that has characterized the head-in-the-sand Arab League since its creation.

But credibility has never been a hallmark of the august proceedings of the Arab League. In what can only be characterized as one of the most pungent oxymorons of all time, Algeria's foreign minister Abdelaziz Belkhadem said, "We should exploit the moral authority… of the Arab world to revive the peace process with all its components, in order to make the declaration of the Palestinian state and the restoration of the Syrian and Lebanese land lost in 1967 a tangible reality."

Belkhadem talked of the moral authority of a group that failed to offer even one tangible suggestion for moving the shaky Israeli-Palestinian peace process forward and that failed to advance any initiatives for political or democratic reform of the freedom-less Arab societies. The group did succeed, however, in deciding to convene next year's summit in Sudan, thereby conferring the league's self-vaunted prestige upon the government that continues to this very moment to be responsible for the displacement, torture and murder of hundreds of thousands of its own people. Moral authority indeed!

The recently concluded Arab League summit was nothing more than a meeting of tired men who are fearful of the possibility of any change in their region. They squandered yet another opportunity to do some good.

Removing 'Israel' in passports

Canada continues to support two policies that will destroy Israel if implemented – the right of return for Palestinians and the end of Israel's political, administrative and jurisdictional control of Jerusalem.

The Canadian Coalition for Democracies is encouraging supporters of Israel and of democracies to recognize the inherent danger of Canada's position on these two issues and demand that Prime Minister Paul Martin cancel his support for them. As Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker pointed out in the article "Passport flap political, envoy says," (CJN, March 17), the decision to remove the placeline "Israel" from any passport whose holder was born in Jerusalem is a "political position" not just "an administrative action" as claimed by Foreign Affairs. Paul Martin has implemented a dangerous policy at both the political and the administrative levels that denies any Israeli claim to Jerusalem.

Canadians, especially those who believe in Israel, must not allow this government to make right of return and the status of Jerusalem part of any negotiations, compromise or peace deals. To do so would be to invite Israel's destruction.

Supports Israel Bond as a gift

Having had two children in day school and having (barely) survived the bar/bat mitzvah gift-giving ordeal, I must wholeheartedly support Laura Orzy in her efforts to get school parents to contribute to the purchase of an Israel Bond and I must strongly take issue with Ellen Hennick's views ("Balancing the bar with the mitzvah," CJN, March 24).

Hennick's comments make it clear she does not view receiving an Israel Bond as getting a gift. This is just absurd. My kids' cash and bonds were put away for university and travel, which they are now enjoying eight and six years later.

I think the benefits to the giver are even greater. Because I did not have unlimited means, energy or creativity, I would have welcomed the opportunity to contribute with other parents and, in doing so, been saved the time-consuming search for the latest and greatest gifts.

Hennick complains that when school-wide programs are implemented, "other people's values get forced on the entire community." But that is exactly the point. I sent my children to United Synagogue Day School because I wanted them to share the values of that community.

I do not see school-wide gifts as an issue of political correctness but quite frankly as gift gluttony. No child really needs dozens of gifts in order to feel special. There are many other ways for parents and teachers to develop a child's self-esteem.

When Hennick says that "for some kids, the giving of one gift… takes away the acknowledgement that this is their special year," she misses the point. Receiving an Israel Bond helps explain why it is a special year indeed.

Never heard of the Holocaust

It is a sad fact in our society that the only history requirement from grade school through university is a smattering of Canadian history, and no one else's. Is it a wonder then that so many people are ignorant of the Shoah? Why should Sheldon Kirshner ("Auschwitz television series is superb," CJN, Feb. 17), or anyone else, be shocked to hear "the results of a recent survey" attesting to this ignorance when so many of the respondents have no historical, let alone moral, context in which to place the Holocaust?

God and the tsunami disaster

Norma Baumel Joseph's column, "Disasters – how and why," (Jan. 20) was a wonderful piece of writing.

Writers in the media have asked where God was and how He could have allowed the recent tsunami tragedy. However, with enough money, talent and technology, certainly early-warning and communication systems could have been developed that could have saved thousands, just as deadly diseases have been beaten and untold millions saved. "First mourn. Then work for change," Joseph exhorted.

Furthering this theme, I'd like to tell a story. A man once stood before God, his heart breaking from the pain and injustice in the world. "Dear God," he cried out. "Look at all the suffering, the anguish and distress in your world. Why don't you send help?" God responded, "I did send help. I sent you."

Women ought to be included in minyanim

I read with interest and with sympathy the guest column by Avron Shore ("Will someone say Kaddish with me?" CJN, March 17), wherein he pleads with the Jewish community to be part of the minyan so that he will be able to say Kaddish for his mother.

I recently lost my mother and underwent the experience of sitting around the chapel with nine men, impatiently glancing at their watches, waiting for one more so that Minchah services could commence.

Women were recognized as persons under Canadian law a long time ago. Perhaps it is overdue for minyan services. Then Shore would have double the pool of congregants with whom to say Kaddish.

Lessons for Abbas from the Altalena Affair

By RICK LAVERE

The peace process in the Middle East appears to be gaining momentum. On March 17, a meeting of the various Islamic militant groups in Cairo resulted in a victory of sorts for the newly elected Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Although the Palestinian factions present at the meeting refused to join the official ceasefire agreement, they did agree to a conditional cessation of hostilities for the remainder of the year. While it is unlikely that Israel will be able or willing to meet all of the militants' demands, the temporary halt to violence offers the Israeli and Palestinian governments a window of opportunity to solidify the still-fragile truce and to negotiate further confidence-building measures.

The longer-term problem of just how to deal with the militant groups, however, remains the proverbial elephant in the living room. Even if the primary groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad agree to join the political process (Hamas, for its part, recently announced that it would participate in the next round of Palestinian elections), there will undoubtedly be some within their ranks who will refuse. And undoubtedly there will be other groups who will remain opposed to any peace with Israel. It seems likely, then, that at some point in the not-too-distant future there will have to be a reckoning. To have a meaningful peace, the Palestinian Authority (PA) will have to use force against those opposed to the peace process.

Surprisingly enough, Palestinian leaders may find that, in this case, they have something in common with the Israelis. In 1948, the newly formed government of Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion had to deal with a similar challenge to its authority. Although the challenge posed by Jewish militants was on a much smaller scale, Ben-Gurion's response to it offers Palestinian leaders a clear-cut example to show to its people of how the Israeli government has dealt with its own terrorists in the past.

Jewish extremists had been a problem for Ben-Gurion and the Haganah since 1937. In that year, the Irgun, a right-wing militant group, made the decision to break with the policy of havlagah – self-restraint against the Arabs and the occupying British in Palestine.

Over the next decade, relations between the Haganah and the Irgun (Etzel, as it was known by its Hebrew acronym, and its smaller sister organization, Lehi) fluctuated between active co-operation and open hostility. Although this was due primarily to the violent tactics of the right-wing militias, the personal antipathy that Ben-Gurion had toward the Irgun's leader, Menachem Begin, undoubtedly played a part in explaining the tense nature of the relationship.

According to an agreement reached in May 1948, members of the Irgun were incorporated into the newly formed Israel Defence Forces (IDF), largely on a unit basis, meaning that Irgun units would remain largely intact after their incorporation into the IDF. Although friction between the two groups appeared to have abated, the Altalena Affair, as it later became known, would not only reignite old tensions but, more importantly for Ben-Gurion, offer a pretext to act against the entire Irgun organization and squelch further independent action by the right-wing militias once and for all.

The Altalena was an American loading ship bought by the Irgun for the purpose of smuggling fighters and weapons from Europe to Palestine. A secret operation worked out between the French government and the Irgun in the spring of 1948 called for the movement of 90 fighters and a large cache of weapons from France to Palestine. But news of the secret landing soon reached the ears of Israel's prime minister.

That the planned arms shipment would break the ceasefire recently established between the IDF and the various Arab armies was of little concern to Ben-Gurion. The warring sides had, in fact, routinely broken the agreement not to import additional arms from third parties. The fact that the Irgun had entered into secret agreements with a foreign government without going through official channels, however, was unacceptable to Ben-Gurion, as was the fact that Begin insisted that a percentage of the weapons be sent directly to Irgun units recently incorporated into the IDF, as well as to still-independent units then fighting in Jerusalem.

The inability of the government and the Irgun to reach a consensus on the weapons transfer and the ensuing violence that took place over the following days proved to be a death blow for the Irgun and established the newly formed Labor government as the sole voice of Jewish resistance to the invading Arab armies.

Despite repeated warnings to captain and crew of imminent attack if they attempted to land, in the end, Begin simply did not believe that Ben-Gurion would ever order the IDF to fire upon fellow Israelis. His miscalculation would result in the deaths of 16 Irgun fighters and two members of the IDF, as well as the bombardment and eventual sinking of the Altalena by the Israeli army.

Furthermore, large numbers of Irgun fighters who had been incorporated into the IDF were relieved of their duties when they abandoned their army units in a vain attempt to come to the aid of the lost ship and its crew.

Over the following weeks, Irgun members looked on helplessly as their offices were raided and most of the Irgun's senior leadership was arrested. With what some have described as ruthless efficiency, Ben-Gurion quickly broke the back of the right-wing militias. Never again would they openly challenge the IDF.

While they may appear extreme to some, Ben-Gurion's actions were effective. He saw what amounted to a challenge both to his own government and to the rule of law as it was beginning to take hold in the new state and dealt with it before it became a major hurdle to democratic governance.

The Palestinian Authority, having passed that point, must now deal with a much more entrenched and overtly antagonistic group of extremists. At this point, it's not clear that the PA has the capability to force them into capitulating even if force was used. What is clear is that if Abbas is to have any hope of success, he must move quickly to establish his authority (i.e., legitimacy) within the Palestinian community as a whole. Additionally, the now partially neutered PA will need at least the covert assistance of both the United States and Israel.

In the final analysis, there are few good options open to the PA. The possibility of integrating the various militant groups into a single Palestinian "army" (as the Israelis attempted with the Irgun) is an untenable proposition as long as the militants' primary loyalty rests with a leadership other than the PA. If a settlement with Israel is reached and an independent state of Palestine is established, many of the militants will most likely set down their arms and accept the peace treaty. However, there will be some diehards who will never accept a settlement that includes a Jewish state in their midst.

Even under the best of circumstances, the PA will have to use force against fellow Muslims. Abbas must hope that the legitimacy that comes with elected office, coupled with battle fatigue, will make the Palestinian population as a whole more receptive to the forced disarmament of those opposed to peace with Israel.

The PA now faces the unenviable task of confronting several militant groups at once, some of which are arguably more powerful than the PA itself. Abbas' only real hope for success is to bring as many of the militants into the political process as possible, thus marginalizing and eventually attacking, if necessary, the diehards who refuse to abandon the use of terror. Hamas' decision to run candidates in the next election is a positive step in that direction.

Ben-Gurion had the foresight to see that for democracy to flourish and the rule of law to firmly take hold, military challenges such as the one put forward by the Irgun could not be allowed to stand. For the same reason, the PA must come to a similar conclusion or risk leaving yet another generation of its people unfulfilled and devoid of hope.

Small things worth sweating

"Don't sweat the small stuff" is a cliche that, for the most part, is correct.

Oftentimes, we do fixate on silly details. However, sometimes details are larger than they appear.

In his autobiography, Amos Oz describes a scene from his childhood in Jerusalem in the 1940s. In Auster's grocery shop, there would be passionate discussions over which cheese to buy: should it be the kibbutz cheese or the cheese from the local Arab villages?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Yes, there's a duty to support the kibbutzim, for "charity begins at home." On the other hand, you may not discriminate against outsiders, for "one law shall be for you and the stranger in your midst." So a trip to the grocery could turn into a heated debate over – one's choice of cheese.

Incidents like the "cheese debates" are an essential part of Jewish culture.

One of the hallmarks of the Talmud is attention to detail. A classic example of this is a discussion about the obligation to dispose of bread before Passover. The Talmud ponders the following questions: A mouse goes into a room with some bread, and later leaves with some bread. Can you assume it took out the original bread? Or is this is a new piece of bread and he left the original behind? What if a white mouse goes in, but a black mouse comes out with bread? What if a mouse goes in with bread, and a weasel comes out with bread? Finally, the Talmud declares "teiku," it has no definitive answer!

This attention to detail is more than academic. Details make a big difference. Small gestures express larger commitments. In the right context, a suitor's simple rose may represent profound love.

I once read about an executive who threw out any CVs with typos. This may seem harsh, but it is appropriate. Looking for typos in a CV is not nitpicking. If an applicant is truly interested, his CV would be flawless. On a CV, presentation equals commitment.

Indeed, the very fabric of society is woven from small details. When Rudy Giuliani became mayor of New York, he began to combat crime by concentrating on the squeegee men. On busy corners, men would rush out at red lights to wash windshields and then intimidate the drivers for spare change.

While they had been ignored by previous administrations as a mere annoyance, Giuliani realized squeegee men played a key role in the perpetuation of crime. By tolerating the minor infractions of the squeegee men; the police department fostered a culture of lawlessness. The squeegee men gave the city an ambience of disorder. By cracking down on these minor infractions, Giuliani transformed the culture of New York.

We should never fixate on petty details. But there is small stuff worth sweating, little acts of commitment that make a big difference.

The convergence between Jewish and secular ideas

I just launched my third American history book. Morning in America: How Ronald Reagan Invented the 1980s does not have much Jewish content – although it salutes Elie Wiesel's moral grandeur in condemning the former U.S. president's plan to visit a military cemetery in Bitburg, Germany, with 49 SS graves, and it praises Anatoly (soon to be Natan) Sharansky's heroism in championing freedom against Soviet oppression.

Gil Troy in Montreal

At one point, I noticed that most of the Jews in my book appeared when I discuss '80s excess, spending too much (Saul Steinberg), stealing too much (Ivan Boesky), or making too much (Michael Milken). But I call 'em as I see 'em – I did not replace these greedy Jews with greedy Christians. And when I see friends from the Jewish world, I joke that this book proves I still have "a real job."

Nevertheless, while this is not a Jewish book, and I probably would bristle if reviewers tried to read my Zionist activism or Jewish identity into this American history monograph, being Jewish has shaped my historical identity and this work. I belong to a people with a proud 4,000-year history, who venerate tradition and deify memory. Having spent my childhood re-enacting the Exodus every Pesach, the giving of the Ten Commandments every Shavuot, the wandering in the desert every Sukkot, I wonder how you can grow up Jewish and not become a historian.

My grandfather, Leon Gerson, always taught that Jews invented the idea of history, for without a sense of moral purpose and progress, history is merely chronology. My father, Bernard Dov Troy, further shaped my historical consciousness, mixing memoirs of his exploits smuggling machine guns to Palestine in matzah boxes before 1948 with inspiring tales about Jewish heroes and sages (often one and the same).

Growing up in New York, and thanks again to my father, who taught American history in public school by day and Jewish history in Hebrew school by night, the proud national narratives of both the United States and the Jewish people resonated together. While it is fashionable to contrast our Jewish and secular identities, I learned there also can be harmonic convergences – being a good Jew makes me a better American, just as being a good American makes me a better Jew – even in Canada!

Being a Jew heightens my appreciation for American liberty; being an American increases my respect for Judaism's moorings. From this invigorating pool of ethics and ideals, stories and sentiments, I learned to juggle identities and ideas, to delight in nationalism's positive potential, democracy's duties and freedom's fruits. I learned about the power of the written word, critical thought, and the well-chosen rhetorical flourish. I learned to balance faith and skepticism, optimism and realism, individuality and community, memory and vision, traditionalism and modernity.

I know that being an Israel-loving, tzedakah-giving Jew sensitized me to the challenges of modern terrorism and inspired our family decision to donate a dollar from every book sold to help terror victims. I know that being a people-oriented, freedom-worshiping Jew made me fear Soviet oppression, priming me to applaud Reagan's condemnation of the "Evil Empire," even when the professoriate shuddered. I know that being a community-minded, tradition-venerating Jew honed my ethical sensibilities, heightening my discomfort with the shop-till-you-drop, MTV '80s ethos.

I know that being an action-oriented, democracy-loving Zionist sharpened my respect for American nationalism and thus Reagan's patriotism, even as remembering the Holocaust illustrated the dangers of demonization and demagoguery. And I know that being an American, a Zionist, and a Jew living in Canada these past few years has intensified my disdain for neutral postures that often foster immorality.

Still, I'm most proud of the way my Reagan and the 1980s book has insulated me from the passions of the last few years. While taking strong stands in the public square, I took refuge in writing a non-partisan history of a critical time in American life, and the adjective I was happiest to read in the first review was "balanced" (although "thoughtful" and "entertaining" were gratifying, too). So, for me, this book symbolizes the ability to remain reasonable, normal, secular, sane during insane times – but isn't that trait, epitomized by the Fiddler on the Roof, Jewish, too?

Gil Troy is professor of history at McGill University. His latest book is Morning in America: How Ronald Reagan Invented the 1980s.

Yad Vashem of tomorrow

The magnificent new history museum at Yad Vashem has just been inaugurated. Visitors who have not been to the museum and memorial site in Jerusalem should make a point of visiting.

Over the past decade, Yad Vashem has steadily worked to modernize its facilities, to make its resources more useful to educators and researchers. In the works for several years, the new history museum brings together technological, educational and other advances in museology through the architectural genius of Moshe Safdi. Safdi's visionary design cuts a wedge into the mountain that has housed Yad Vashem since it opened in 1957, incorporating a series of underground exhibition rooms.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Last December, I wandered through the site of the new museum. The underground structure had been completed, its triangular concrete hallway sliced through the mountain. Above the ground, the glass tip of the triangle was visible, functioning as a skylight that brings natural light to the exhibit space below. At the end of the long, triangular hallway, the concrete sides burst forth from the mountainside, gesturing outward towards the Jerusalem mountains like hands in supplication. Construction workers in hard hats were still there, completing the electric circuitry and finishing materials below the ground.

Milling about the older exhibitions and memorials were tourist and pilgrim groups from all over the world: Africans clad in kinta-cloth crossed paths with IDF soldiers, Asian travellers with Israeli high school students, survivors and their families with educators. No doubt, the new museum will bring more visitors.

What will people learn when they visit Yad Vashem? The historical facts of the Holocaust, of course – the irretrievable losses of Jewish lives, the destruction of European centres of Jewish learning and Jewish culture. But what will they make of these facts?

The monuments at Yad Vashem – particularly the devastatingly powerful children's memorial – provide settings in which to mourn the losses of the past. Perched atop a Jerusalem mountain looking out on the hills of Zion, the setting invites visitors to engage with the future, as well. How do we bring the past to bear on the future?

The redesigning of Yad Vashem comes at a time when many Israelis are rethinking their country's relationship to the Diaspora past – both its catastrophes and its glories. Several years ago, I saw a controversial short film by an Israeli director that grappled with the meaning of the Holocaust for Israel. During their daily commute to work, two neighbours, both Holocaust survivors, argued about what the Holocaust teaches us about our future. One insisted the lesson of the Holocaust is that we Jews will always be alone in the world, vulnerable and unprotected. Our only hope for survival is to stand on the alert for enemies, to overpower them and not be deterred by misplaced compassion. Her neighbour disagreed. The lesson of the Holocaust, he asserted, is that, having been radically oppressed, we may never oppress others. He worried that his son, serving in an IDF unit on the West Bank, might be brought to harm civilians or children, thereby harming his own soul.

The film captures an ongoing debate about what the Holocaust can teach us about Jewish destiny and Jewish responsibility. It poses the terms of the debate in stark – one might say extreme – terms: given the choice to be victimizers or victimized, (a) our history teaches us to risk becoming victimizers, because this is our only option to survive, or (b) our history teaches us to risk becoming victims, because we know the evil of victimization.

Across the ideological spectrum, current political rhetoric emphasizes the starkness of those two positions. Depending upon who does the talking, Israelis may be termed Nazi-like occupiers of Arab land; Palestinians may be considered Nazi and Amalekite murderers; the Israeli government has been likened to the Judenrat for ousting the Gaza settlers.

If the boldness of Yad Vashem's new facilities is matched by curatorial boldness, it will not only explicate the past, it will invite visitors to become self-conscious of their own interpretations of the past, compel them to complicate the ways they bring the knowledge of the past to bear upon the present.

For surely those opposing poles – victimized or victimizer, oppressor or oppressed – are not the only real choices left to us. Posing the options in such starkly binary terms not only falsifies the complexity of the past, it limits the possibilities of the future.

West Bank outposts come back to haunt Sharon

A call by Ariel Sharon to Jewish settlers to seize hilltops and establish outposts in the West Bank has come back to haunt Israel's current prime minister.

Sharon was foreign minister in Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud government when he issued this nationalistic appeal in 1998, less than a year after Israel ceded parts of Hebron to the Palestinian Authority under the Wye agreement.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In all probability, he wanted to make amends for giving up much of Hebron and to consolidate Israel's grip on the West Bank. But Sharon's declaration was in conformity with his long-held, unwavering belief that, for security reasons, Israel should retain certain areas of the West Bank, particularly around Jerusalem and along the old Green Line.

Taking heed of Sharon's call, young men and women from the national religious camp, who were born and raised in West Bank settlements built since the 1967 Six Day War, took him at his word. Without asking the government for official permission, they seized hilltops and set up crude, unauthorized outposts, which often consisted of a handful of ideologically driven individuals and their trailers and generators.

If Sharon was their guiding light, their fathers and grandfathers were their shining exemplars. In the face of government opposition, they, too, had established unauthorized settlements, thereby setting a precedent their grandchildren and children would emulate.

Under the 2003 road map to peace, which Sharon accepted with reservations, Israel was required to halt all settlement activity and immediately remove outposts that had sprouted since Sharon's accession to power in March 2001. (By contrast, the Palestinians were immediately expected to act decisively against terrorism and incitement).

Israel took preliminary steps to tear down the outposts. But the effort was half-hearted, possibly because the Palestinians did not fulfil their end of the bargain to curb violence. But even when outposts were eliminated, they were usually rebuilt, leaving the Palestinians outraged and the United States – one of the sponsors of the road map – fuming. Sharon, having solemnly promised to dismantle the outposts as a sign of his commitment to the road map, came under intense U.S. pressure to demonstrate good faith.

Eager not to upset the United States, Israel's ally and benefactor, Sharon agreed to form two investigative teams to study the issue. The first team, headed by lawyer Talia Sasson, a former chief state prosecutor, would clarify the history and legal status of the outposts. The second, led by reserve general Baruch Spiegel, would demarcate the boundaries of existing settlements.

In the meantime, Israel did precious little to dismantle outposts or freeze construction of settlements. Throughout the summer and autumn of 2004, as Sasson and Spiegel worked on their respective reports, the United States periodically reminded Israel that it was not living up to its road map obligations.

In a rare public criticism of Sharon, Daniel Kurtzer, the U.S. ambassador to Israel, issued a critique of his performance. Shortly afterward, Condoleezza Rice, President George W. Bush's national security adviser and now his secretary of state, called on Israel to halt all settlement expansion. And then in late October, the Bush administration rejected a list of unauthorized outposts Israel had submitted, claiming the number was actually much higher. This past January, U.S. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State David Satterfield reiterated Rice's admonition.

Israel's disinclination to abide by its pledges may, in part, be a function of American ambiguity on settlements. Last April, much to Sharon's delight, Bush tacitly endorsed Israel's retention of major settlement blocs in the West Bank and agreed they could be expanded vertically rather than horizontally. However, the United States has adopted a clear and consistent position on outposts.

Early this month, with the release of Sasson's blistering report, the outposts emerged yet again as an issue. Finished in January but released only on March 8, the report accused Sharon's government, as well as previous governments, of "blatant violations of the law" and institutional complicity in helping settlers build illegal outposts in contravention of stated Israeli policy and laws. According to Sasson, several ministries – including defence, education and housing – colluded systematically with the settlement division of the World Zionist Organization and the civil administration, which governs the West Bank, to channel funds to the settlers. Furthermore, she disclosed, the state budget financed the construction of roads and infrastructure for outposts.

Sasson found that at least 105 outposts, with some 2,000 inhabitants, had been built without government authorization since the mid-1990s, when the Oslo peace process was still a going concern. [Peace Now, in a Feb. 2 report, cited a figure of 99 outposts]. She revealed that 50 or more outposts had arisen since Sharon took office, saying that settlers had used the time-honoured method of establishing facts on the ground to gain retroactive approval."The very heart of the report," she wrote, "is about the enforcement of the law, which is not a political issue, but a legal one of tremendous importance for a democratic state."

In response, the Israeli cabinet promised to dismantle 24 outposts. But no timetable was set, nor was the fate of the remaining outposts announced.

According to reports, Sasson is skeptical about the government's intention. As she put it in an interview on Israeli television: "Let no one be fooled that just because a report has been published, and is being discussed nicely on television, that it means this has been brought to an end."

Ariel Sharon

Aerial colour photographs, released by the defence ministry on March 20, show that extensive construction has taken place in outposts and settlements since last summer.

These photos confirm a Feb. 2 Israeli army report that settlers are proceeding with construction in such unauthorized outposts as Givat Haroeh (between Ramallah and Nablus), Givat Asaf (near Beit El) and Givat Hadegel (close to Karnei Shomron).

Washington, which is still waiting for Spiegel's report, reacted quite sharply to Sasson's findings, warning Israel that failure to remove all outposts will have a negative effect on relations with the United States.

Labor party ministers in Sharon's national unity government want the outposts to be dismantled now. "We need to take immediate action," said Matan Vilnai, a Labor minister and the army's former deputy chief of staff.

But Likud ministers, notably Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz and Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, believe that Israel's top priority should be the planned withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and four isolated settlements in the northern West Bank, which is scheduled to start in the third week of July.

The Likud's rationale for its footdragging is that the government cannot afford to be sidetracked by extraneous issues, namely the outposts, and that the immediate dismantling of outposts would only inflame an already tense atmosphere.

To some observers, the outposts are a relatively minor irritant, at least compared to a much more important issue – the continuing expansion of the more than 100 settlements, with their estimated 230,000 inhabitants.

The latest chapter in that story unfolded last week when Mofaz confirmed that Israel is planning to build 3,500 homes in Ma'aleh Adumim, the largest settlement in the West Bank. Israel's objective is to create territorial contiguity between Ma'aleh Adumim and eastern Jerusalem.

The news came on the heels of a recent report in Yediot Achronot – Israel's biggest daily – that the Israel Lands Administration intends to build 6,391 new housing units in the West Bank. Two thousand of them will be erected in Ma'aleh Adumim, with a population of nearly 30,000.

These developments lend credence to widespread speculation that Sharon hopes to trade a withdrawal from Gaza for a continuing Israeli presence in the West Bank. On the day Israel's cabinet officially voted to vacate Gaza, Israel published the revised route of the separation fence, which will incorporate about seven per cent of the West Bank.

The Palestinians, who have yet to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure but who have nevertheless taken concrete steps to abide by the informal Feb. 8 truce with Israel, are of course, furious that settlements are being expanded and that outposts are being left in place. Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, has accused Israel of bad faith. Bush, who is scheduled to meet Sharon on his Texas ranch on April 11, has remained conspicuously silent. But last week, a U.S. State Department spokesperson said, "We are opposed to unilateral acts by either side that creates facts on the ground and (prejudges) issues that are to be settled through negotiations..."

NCJW launches 22nd annual Passover food drive

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The National Council of Jewish Women has launched its 22nd annual Passover food drive.

Supported by Mazon Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the drive assists more than 10,000 people including 4,000 children and 2,000 seniors, by supplying essential items for the week of Passover and the seder meal.

Recipients include recent immigrants, the disadvantaged, seniors, shut-ins, students living away from home, women in shelters, and others who are referred by social service agencies, clergy, doctors and educators.

Boxes include juice, wine, Passover non-perishables and a Haggadah.

Sheila Mostyn, who is co-chairing the drive with Paula Frisch, said this is the first year it will be totally volunteer-run.

At the end of last year, she said, NCJW began contacting schools and synagogues, asking for their help in collecting food and volunteering at the drive.

"Some schools have made it a 'mitzvah challenge' for students and teachers to donate food and money to the drive.

"We've tried to make it a community-wide campaign," Frisch said.

Delivery day for the boxes is April 17, and Mostyn and Frisch are encouraging people to come out and help.

"We hand out a list of names and addresses with directions and help load up the cars. Our recipients are depending on the generosity of the community to deliver the boxes," Mostyn said.

They have had an "overwhelming" response from schools and groups to help put together the boxes and pack them, but it is imperative that they have enough people to help move boxes to the cars and to deliver, she said.

In past years, she said, volunteer drivers have come back to tell us how touched recipients have been. "Some volunteers have been invited in for tea."

Frisch said that parents have told them that teaming up with their children to deliver boxes has been the most meaningful part of Passover for them. "The children begin to understand how fortunate they are. They always hear about people in need, but by helping out they are seeing it first hand.

"It is one thing for a child to donate food to a drive, but to come out and help deliver is a hands-on mitzvah.

"It's a huge project, but it is something that makes a huge difference in the lives of many people."

Volunteers can come to Council House at 4700 Bathurst St. on April 17 at 9.a.m. Breakfast will be served.

TZEDAKAH BAKERS: Students at Leo Baeck Day School's Holy Blossom campus spent time baking and selling their wares last week to raise funds and awareness for continuing aid to Africa and for Tsunami relief. In less than one hour of selling, the kids raised more than $1,000. The school thanks St. Urbain Bagel Bakery and Ammmazing Donuts for their generous support.

From one proud heritage to another, you're invited to a celebration.

Jewish Renewal event planned for Oshawa

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Aleph Caravan, a one-day travelling learning event put on by the Jewish Renewal movement, will take place April 10 in Oshawa.

The small Jewish community, about 40 minutes east of Toronto, has approximately 60 families affiliated with Beth Zion Congregation, its one synagogue.

Koren Kassirer, a Jewish and arts educator and Beth Zion board member who lives in Bowmanville, about 20 minutes east of Oshawa, heard about the program and thought it would be a good way to "get people excited about Judaism.

"It's also an introduction for us to the renewal movement."

The transdenominational movement, which emphasizes spirituality and mystical teachings, has 37 communities formally connected to it in the United States, and another dozen that have a less formal relationship, including Congregation Or Shalom in Vancouver.

The Vancouver congregation was founded by Rabbi Daniel Siegel, now Aleph's director of spiritual resources, and his wife Hanna Tiferet, who is now also a Renewal rabbi. The couple are co-spiritual leaders of B'nai Or of Boston, but in June they will be moving to Hornby Island, B.C., where he will continue his work with Aleph. Rabbi Siegel will be one of the presenters at the Oshawa event.

A native of New York, he has a strong Canadian connection. His grandmother, Ida Siegel, was the founder of many Jewish organizations in Toronto and the first Jewish woman to serve on the Toronto Board of Education.

The Siegels lived in Thunder Bay, Ont., from 1972 to 1974, where Rabbi Siegel served as spiritual leader of Shaarey Shomayim Congregation, and three times in British Columbia, going back to the early 1970s. He was rabbi of Victoria's Temple Emanu-El in the mid-1970s, and spent 10 years in Vancouver from 1977 to 1987.

Rabbi Siegel was the first rabbi to be ordained by Renewal movement founder Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi in 1974.

The Oshawa synagogue has no prior affiliation with Renewal. It was affiliated with the Orthodox movement for an estimated 40 to 45 years, but is in transition now, reflecting the more liberal observance level of its members, said Kassirer. Cantor David Harel is their part-time spiritual leader, and last fall for the first time, there was mixed seating at High Holy Day services in addition to more traditional separate seating for men and women.

Kassirer, who is organizing the Renewal event with a committee of volunteers, said participants will come from places like Ajax, Pickering, Peterborough, Millbrook and Port Perry, as well as Oshawa and Toronto.

Spiritual educator Paula Baruch, of Peterborough, is one of the presenters, joining Rabbi Siegel and Rabbi Elliot Ginsburg, who is based in Ann Arbor, Mich.

Rabbi Siegel will lead a workshop on "A mystical look at Passover practice," and one on custom and law in Jewish communal life. Rabbi Ginsburg, who has a PhD in Jewish mysticism, will explore chassidic teachings on friendship as a spiritual practice, and the idea of "Leaping vs. Waiting."

The event will take place at the Beth Zion, and will include a pareve lunch. Participants will be able to choose one of three workshops in the morning, and again in the afternoon. There will also be an egalitarian minyan at the beginning of the day.

This is Aleph Caravan's first foray into Canada. Now in its second year, it has run about half a dozen times in the United States.

Tickets are $54, including lunch. For more information, call 905-697-7710, or e-mail korenkassirer@yahoo.ca or go to www.aleph.org.caravan.html

JWI takes steps to end domestic violence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the sixth time, members of Jewish Women International (JWI) are taking steps to end domestic violence.

The sixth annual Walk for Hope, set for April 10 at Centerpoint Mall, promotes awareness and raises funds for JWI's domestic violence program.

Walks are also taking place in Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWI/Canada, says the walk is held indoors because the roof and walls of the mall represent the security that all women deserve.

It is a family event, she says, and "it is important to come together as a community and teach kids about healthy relationships. When parents come out with their children, they can tell them they're helping people whose homes are not happy."

Domestic abuse affects one woman in four, says Krowitz, "so every person knows someone who is being abused."

The majority of abuse is emotional or psychological, she says, so it often goes undetected. "Abuse is all about one person's control over another. It is a complicated, complex issue, and it is a crime."

The Jewish community has not brought domestic violence into the mainstream, she says. "It needs to be put on the agenda. We have to make sure that young people are educated, and that abused women are not alone. They should know that they don't have to live that way."

The walk takes place between 10 a.m. and noon, and pledge forms, available online, can be turned in at the JWI office, or at 9:30 a.m. at the mall the day of the walk.

For information or to obtain a pledge form, go to www.jwicanada.com or call 416-630-9313.

The pre-existing solution

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As the Torah readings continue, we have celebrated Purim and are turning our thoughts toward Pesach. On the Shabbat after Purim, it is customary to read the chapter from the Book of Numbers that speaks of the ritual surrounding the red heifer. This became the custom because all Israel needed to purify itself before beginning one of the three national pilgrimages to Jerusalem.

The Torah portion teaches us of the red heifer and its ritual ability to convert the status of someone who has been in contact with the dead.

The Jewish state of being either tahor or tameh, loosely translated as "ritually pure" or "ritually impure," is a constant concern in ancient Israel. One can engage fully in ritual, communal and marital life if one is tahor, but only very limitedly if one is tameh. The most extreme state of tameh is reached when someone comes in contact with a dead body.

The instructions for the red heifer detail the ritual through which the most severe form of tameh is reverted back to tahor. A red heifer without defect was sacrificed and its ashes were mixed by a special formulation and then used in the purification.

It is only once these instructions are in place that the text informs us of the death of Miriam. We understand the juxtaposition of these two narratives, the red heifer ritual followed by the death of Miriam, as informing us of a fundamental truth about creation: the solution pre-exists the problem.

By teaching us of how to reverse the status of tameh in its most severe instance, the Torah is telling us that we can now approach the most extreme of our human vulnerabilities and weaknesses. We can allow ourselves to physically approach those who have died, knowing that we can travel the road back to our natural states through the ritual of the red heifer.

Of course, the spiritual message is equally clear. In that most frightening, most devastating of events, the death of someone close, we now know that when we are thrust into dealing with it, there is a road back to a natural state. The solution pre-existed the problem, and therefore we can securely deal with the issue.

Had we not known of the red heifer before hearing of Miriam's death, the process would be reversed and every problem would find us desperately searching and hoping to invent a solution. However, written as it is, the Torah has taught us that every problem has a solution that already exists, and now it is not a question of inventing the answer, but of discovering the answer.

There are many instances in which we find ourselves grateful to Miriam. When we first meet her, she is watching over her baby brother, Moses. She later defines a woman's community by leading at the Red Sea. We are told that Bezal'el, the Jewish artist centrally involved with the design of the Tabernacle, is Miriam's son. With her death, we are shown that the answer to every dilemma in creation exists before the dilemma is expressed.

The midrash echoes Miriam's final lesson to us when it declares in Exodus Rabbah, "She established Bezal'el and from him we acquire David."

When the Messiah finally arrives, we will be thanking Miriam once again.

Adult bar/bat mitzvahs, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Could it all have begun on The Dick Van Dyke Show?

Way back in 1966, a Jewish character on the popular situation comedy decided that since he never had a bar mitzvah ceremony as a child, better late than never. [http://classicsitcoms.com/shows/dvd5.html] Little did "Buddy Sorrell" know that he would become a trendsetter and that a few decades later, many Jewish adults would decide to celebrate the rite of passage that they missed when they were young. Today, a look at adult bar and bat mitzvahs.

Stuart Schoenfeld has studied the history of adult bar mitzvahs and clarifies an important misconception. You don't need to have the party or to read from the Torah to be a bar mitzvah.

"A youth becomes bar mitzvah at age 13 with or without a ceremony. Yet rabbis welcomed men who came in search of a ritual confirmation of their Jewish identities. They created opportunities for these men to study and applied the name 'bar mitzvah' metaphorically to the adult ritual."

Schoenfeld mentions that one of the pioneers in this area was Rabbi Albert Axelrad at Brandeis University, who held "belated" bar and bat mitzvah ceremonies in the early 1970s. [http://tinyurl.com/4e9am]

Hadassah Blocker was another pioneer when she developed the adult bar and bat mitzvah program in 1976 at Temple Emanuel in Newton Centre, Mass. Visit her temple's website and read the touching thank-you notes that graduates have sent to Blocker over the decades. "Words alone cannot express the feelings of gratitude that I have for you for giving me the chance to learn about my heritage and to become a Bat Mitzvah... I always envied my husband and sons for having such a love and understanding for Torah and Judaism, and always felt ashamed that I didn't have the same feelings, and wondered if the feelings would ever come to me. You taught me how to find that love and to express those hidden feelings." [http://tinyurl.com/4cmkc]

The commitment to have the ceremony usually means attending a synagogue-based class or one-on-one study with a rabbi for a year or more, as well as learning Hebrew skills to chant from the Torah, the Haftorah or conduct part of the service. Jaffe-Gill met adult bnei mitzvah who fell into two categories: as children, they couldn't or they didn't want to.

People such as:

- Jane, who at 13 felt spiritually alienated;
- Joe, who converted to Judaism after he was 13; and
- David, whose parents were "left-wing educators" and not at all religious.

David chose to celebrate his bar mitzvah almost three decades later. "As much as I will deny having any type of spiritual connection, I have to say that reading from the Torah was a magical experience." [http://tinyurl.com/6z8mg]

For Suzanne Brodden, the decision to finally have a bat mitzvah ceremony came during the eighth month of saying Kaddish for her mother. That began a joyful exploration into Judaism, its traditions, prayers and psalms. "Yes, funerals are usually thought of as endings. For me, my mother's was a beginning. My mom is still giving me gifts, and I still don't have to say goodbye." [www.ritualwell.org/Rituals/ritual.html?docid=1274]

Dan Pine explains that he decided to have a bar mitzvah to give him an idea of what his 12-year-old son was about to go through – and fighting against. But "by the time of the ceremony, I had done a 180. I was no longer doing this for Aaron; I was doing it strictly for myself. When I stood before the Torah in the sanctuary that night, the Hebrew letters seemed ablaze. The sound of my own chanting voice resonated deep inside me." [http://tinyurl.com/6e9y8]

Did Dan's bar mitzvah have a profound impact on his son? It didn't seem so at the time. But "perhaps I planted a seed when Aaron saw me up on the bimah that night, a seed that may sprout someday. There's no way to know yet, but I hope he will reconnect with Judaism, maybe when he has children of his own, as I did."

Historic reversals in Ukraine

Guest voice

My recent visit to Odessa and Kiev in Ukraine was filled with an awareness of historic reversals. I last entered the former Soviet Union in 1987. The country was politically repressive, economically stagnant and religiously barren. We came to help Refuseniks, Jews who were not allowed to emigrate, had lost their jobs and faced social isolation. We met Jews surreptitiously and brought medical care, Torah study, emotional support and financial assistance, and were constantly under the scrutiny of the KGB.

This time, I was part of a group of 28 rabbis who came to Ukraine to see the work done by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). We entered the country freely, ate in excellent kosher restaurants, watched engaging song and dance performances in Jewish community centres, met with serious Jewish students involved in Hillel, davened in beautiful synagogues and studied with animated teenagers in Hefzibah, a school program sponsored jointly by JAFI and the Ukrainian government (Queen's Park take notice).

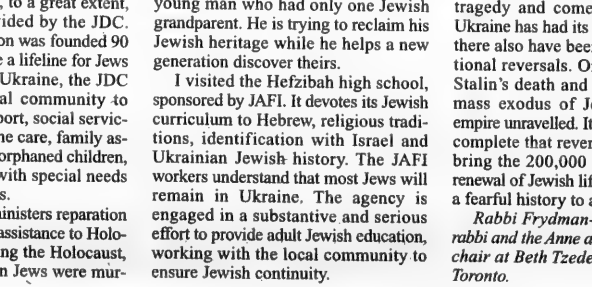
We stood in the plaza where millions had demonstrated in December for free elections and we entered elegant malls filled with western merchandise and eager buyers. I was constantly amazed by the political, economic, social and religious changes resulting from the end of communism, the break-up of the former Soviet Union, the independence of Ukraine and the restoration of religious freedom.

Still, not everything is sunshine. There is extensive poverty: the average monthly salary is about 400 hryvna or $80 (US). There is no middle class. It will take a long time for this socially stabilizing phenomenon to develop. At the moment, the Jewish community depends, to a great extent, on the support provided by the JDC. This great organization was founded 90 years ago and became a lifeline for Jews at risk. Throughout Ukraine, the JDC works with the local community to provide medical support, social services, food baskets, home care, family assistance, housing for orphaned children, education for those with special needs and religious services.

The JDC also administers reparation monies to offer extra assistance to Holocaust survivors. During the Holocaust, more than 1.5 million Jews were murdered in Ukraine. Three colleagues and I spent time with Emilia P., an elderly woman whose father had been killed by Josef Stalin and whose mother was murdered by Adolf Hitler. She is sustained by the Gemilus Chesed organization, which is supported by the JDC. There are 27 such organizations throughout Ukraine. In 2003, Gemilus Chesed distributed more than 425,000 food packages to some 46,000 people.

The Ukrainian Jewish community has reclaimed former communal assets from local authorities. In Kiev, the main synagogue had been used as a stable and a puppet theatre. Now it is the site of a thriving Chabad community where I was honoured to lead Shabbat Musaf services. Although most synagogues in Ukraine are Orthodox, there also are a series of small Reform congregations. Masorti Olami (Conservative) sponsors Camp Ramah in the summer; it needs funds to rent space for a synagogue in Odessa and to engage a part-time rabbi for a year.

After years of Soviet rule, most Jews have no idea about their heritage. The country has 25 million citizens, of whom approximately 200,000 are Jews.



In the Chabad synagogue in Odessa, Ukraine, are, from left, rabbis Len Muroff, originally of Toronto and now in Los Angeles; Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Toronto; Adam Scheier of Montreal; Simon Elkeslassy of Montreal; Ron Muroff, originally of Toronto, now in Harrisburg, Pa.; and David Bauman of Toronto.

These Jews may be halachically Jewish, or Jewish by virtue of having one parent or grandparent who is a Jew. In the Reform congregation in Kiev, a Sunday school class was being conducted by a young man who had only one Jewish grandparent. He is trying to reclaim his Jewish heritage while he helps a new generation discover theirs.

I visited the Hefzibah high school, sponsored by JAFI. It devotes its Jewish curriculum to Hebrew, religious traditions, identification with Israel and Ukrainian Jewish history. The JAFI workers understand that most Jews will remain in Ukraine. The agency is engaged in a substantive and serious effort to provide adult Jewish education, working with the local community to ensure Jewish continuity.

Ukraine was once a major centre of Jewish life. Odessa was the centre of Hebraic culture, a city where Leon Pinsker wrote Auto-Emancipation: An Appeal to His People in response to the pogroms of 1881, and Chayim Nachman Bialik penned The City of Slaughter, in reaction to the Kishenev pogroms of 1903. In Kiev, I saw a statue in honour of Sholom Aleichem, the great Yiddish satirist, and a building plaque celebrating the birthplace of Golda Meir.

In both Kiev and Odessa I looked at statues of Bogdan Chmelnitski, the Cossack who is considered a Ukrainian national hero, but who is known to Jews because his hordes slaughtered more than 100,000 Jews. On the outskirts of Kiev, where the Nazis shot 120,000 Jews in 1941, we stood at Babi Yar and recited memorial prayers.

Last week, we celebrated Purim. It was a celebration of the dramatic turnaround that we associate with the thwarting of the evil plans of Haman. While Esther originally concealed her family background, she ultimately revealed her identity. The vulnerable Jews scheduled for death and destruction were delivered to a life of "light and joy, celebration and delight" with "many of the people of the land acting as Jews."

Purim is associated with another historic reversal, one that took place in the former Soviet Union. In February 1953, Stalin ordered the construction of four giant prison camps in preparation for a campaign directed against millions of Soviet Jews. However, two weeks after the camps were ordered built, Stalin collapsed during an all-night dinner and drinking evening. The night ended in the early hours of March 1, which, in 1953, corresponded to the 14th day of Adar, which we celebrate as Purim.

Narrative reversal, what Aristotle called peripeteia, is essential to both tragedy and comedy. Jewish life in Ukraine has had its tragic reversals, but there also have been two partial salvational reversals. One took place with Stalin's death and the other with the mass exodus of Jews as the Soviet empire unravelled. It is time now to fully complete that reversal, as we strive to bring the 200,000 Jews of Ukraine a renewal of Jewish life, taking them from a fearful history to a new time of faith.

Jewish a capella group goes 'HardCOR!'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Varsity Jews, a Jewish a capella group at the University of Toronto, has a name that is as catchy as the Jewish, Israeli and Hebrew tunes they perform.

The group, which was founded three years ago and is affiliated with Hillel of Greater Toronto, is preparing for its first public concert, to be held this Sunday evening (Apr. 3) at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation. The event, presented by the congregation and the Jewish Students Association at U of T, is a fundraiser for the One Family Fund, which supports families of Israeli victims of terror.

Founding Varsity Jews member and musical director Jeremy Burko was excited last week, not only about the upcoming concert, but about the group's participation for the second year in Shabbat A Capella, an annual Jewish a capella festival at Rutgers University that was scheduled for this past weekend. The Varsity Jews was the only Canadian group participating.

The fourth-year Jewish studies and music student will be entering cantorial school at the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) in New York after his graduation. A bass who sang in his synagogue choir at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Burko also sings in Onoscatopoeia – an a capella group affiliated with U of T's Hart House that sings jazz and 1980s pop music.

His longtime friend Adam Cutler, now in JTS' rabbinical program, co-founded the group with Burko. When Cutler suggested the idea to him, Burko had never heard a Jewish a capella group. "He introduced me to Pizmon, a Jewish a capella group in New York City. I listened to their music, and I loved it. I thought the idea was brilliant, and would be so much fun."

Varsity Jews has grown to 16 students, but Burko talks fondly of its early days in 2002 when he and Cutler, along with three other students, used to gather to rehearse in Hillel's cramped quarters in the basement of University College, "with pipes running through the ceiling." (The Jewish student group at U of T was recently renamed the Jewish Students Association, and is now based at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Student Life, home of the umbrella organization Hillel of Greater Toronto.)

Burko believes the Varsity Jews, which includes some singers with trained voices, has attained a professional quality over the past three years.

Shayna Levitan, the group's manager, said in a news release that the group was "the key factor" in bringing her into Jewish life at U of T. "I originally joined the group because of my love of music, but the group has also given me lifelong friendships and a deeper connection to Judaism."

The Varsity Jews' repertoire, most of it arranged by Burko, includes Hebrew melodies like Yerushalayim Shel Zahav, as well as parodies.

Their concert, "Goin HardCOR," will also feature a new Jewish campus a capella group. Kol Neshama, based at York University, will be the opening act.

Kol Neshama, which has 11 members, was founded at the beginning of this semester and is directed by Etta Abramson, a York theatre student whose brother Philip is a member of the Varsity Jews. Etta was part of a Jewish a capella group last year when she was a musical theatre student at New York University, and she missed it when she returned to Toronto.

Tickets, at $18 each or $14 for groups of eight or more, are available at the door, or in advance from the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Student Life. For more information, go to www.varsityjews.com, or call Hillel of Greater Toronto at 416-913-2424.

NOBEL LAUREATE JOINS STUDENTS' PROTESTS: Thousands of students from universities and colleges all over Israel last week protested the government's intention to reduce the funding of post-secondary school education. Avraham Hershko, in the centre of the photograph, is a Haifa Technion professor who participated in the demonstration at the Technion in support of the students. He is one of three winners of the 2004 Nobel Prize in chemistry. Hershko warned that the proposed cuts in the funding posed a risk of collapse in the higher education system. [Israel photo]

URGENT CALL BY MOST PROMINENT JEWISH LEADERS TO WORLD JEWRY TO DO EVERYTHING IN THEIR MEANS TO STOP THE MADNESS

An Urgent Call to All
Rabbis, Jewish Communal Leaders, and Friends of Israel throughout the World

"For the sound of wailing is coming from Zion: 'How have we been plundered? We have been shamed tremendously, for we have abandoned the land; our own dwellings have cast us out'" (Jeremiah 9:18)

Open your eyes and see what the government of Israel is planning to do:

Jewish communities that are more than three decades old will be destroyed;
Torah centers and yeshivos will be torn down;
Cemeteries where terror victims lie will be given over to the very hands who slew them;
Parents and grandparents, young children and flowering youth, will be driven from their homes; and Businesses and corporations employing thousands will be closed.
A victory will be granted to terror.
Our enemies will celebrate in the streets and be encouraged to further acts of violence.

Jews throughout the land of Israel will be endangered when the bases of terror will be brought closer to their homes (as stated in the Jewish Code of Law "Orach Chaim" Chap. 329) and thousands of terrorists will be set free. Success that our foes could never dream to achieve will be granted to them.

For what? What is being given in return? There are still terror alerts throughout Israel. Rockets and mortars are still falling on Jewish homes. Suicide bombers are still blowing themselves up in the heart of Israel murdering innocent Jews.

"Do not stand idle while the blood of your brother is endangered" (Leviticus 19:16). We must object by raising an outcry, fasting and giving charity. As in all times of difficulty an extra measure of Psalms including Chapters: 20, 83, 103 should be recited daily.

The emperor has no clothes. But the media in Israel are so slanted that they celebrate his parade through the streets while exposed.

You can help! Raise an objective voice. Speak in the name of our Torah and our Jewish tradition.

Tell the government to stop. Speak to your local Member of Parliament. Let the media throughout the world know. Let an outcry be heard so that the heroes risking their lives and fortunes in Israel will take heart.

"They will contrive a scheme, but it will be foiled; conspire a plot, but it will not be realized, for G-d is with us" (Isaiah 8:10).

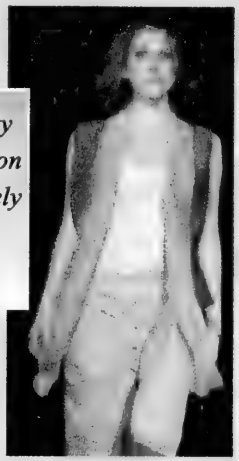
Israel's hottest fashions go on display at Hillel show

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Fashionistas from around the city flocked to the Great Hall on Queen Street West last week to see Fashion for Passion, a fashion show and fundraiser that featured some of Israel's hottest clothing designers.

The show, which was sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto and National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL), showcased well-known designers such as Yael Orgad and Sigal Dekel, and drew a crowd of more than 400 people of all ages.



'Every city really put on a completely different show'

More than 30 students worked together to put on the show – the MCs, models, choreographers, and even the bartenders and the waiters who handed out hors d'oeuvres at the pre-show reception were students from the University of Toronto, Ryerson University and York University.

"It was really head-to-toe student work," said Ravit Kadosh, Israel affairs co-ordinator for Hillel. "It was amazing."

Fashion for Passion had been in the works since last summer, but students didn't start working on it until two months ago.

"The idea started when we were brainstorming for ideas to promote Israel in alternative ways, and combine a university atmosphere with something exciting that would draw people who aren't your typical Hillel students," said Ryla Braemer, NJCL's programming and resource co-ordinator.

'The show showcased well-known designers such as Yael Orgad and Sigal Dekel'

NJCL made contact with the Israeli designers and arranged to have the clothes shipped to Canada.

Fashion for Passion also visited Vancouver, Montreal and Ottawa. Toronto was the last stop.

"Each Hillel committed to organizing the show on a city level," Kadosh said.

How each city interpreted the ideas behind the show – to promote Israel, showcase new fashions and have a good time – was up to them.

In Montreal, students put on a production complete with an audio-visual show and dance numbers.

Hillel in Ottawa hosted the show in a bar and had models mingle with the crowd, while the show in Vancouver had a dancer who united the different designs.

"Every city really put on a completely different show," Kadosh said.

The Toronto show and an accompanying silent auction raised more than $2,000, with proceeds going to the One Family Fund, which provides financial and emotional support to Israelis who have lost family in terror attacks, and the Make-a-Wish Foundation of Toronto, which is part of a wish-granting charity that gives children with life-threatening illnesses a chance to experience the joys of a healthy childhood.

Genetic research advances raise ethical, religious concerns, panel told

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Advances in genetic research have raised complex ethical and religious concerns, according to a panel at a recent Torah in Motion program.

Held at Shaarei Tefillah congregation, the panel consisted of Warren Goldstein, a neurologist at York Central Hospital and Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Science Centre, who acted as moderator; Ellen Warner, medical oncologist at Women's College Health Science Centre and associate professor at the University of Toronto; Steve Gallinger, hepatobiliary and oncologic surgeon at Mount Sinai and Princess Margaret hospitals, professor at the University of Toronto and co-director of the Samuel Lunenfeld cancer research centre; Melissa Aronson, genetic counsellor at Mt. Sinai and Princess Margaret hospitals; and Rabbi Jay Kelman, founder of Torah in Motion and a teacher at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Genetic studies have found that mutations of the BRCA1 and BRCA2 genes seem to predispose people to breast and ovarian cancer, including breast cancer in males, Warner said, noting that a disproportionate number of Jews have these mutations.

"It is passed through autosomal dominant inheritance," Warner explained, meaning that only one copy of the gene in either parent is needed to manifest itself. This means that each child has a 50 per cent chance of inheriting it.

The appearance of either gene mutation gives women a 50 to 85 per cent lifetime risk of breast cancer at an average age of 45, and it is more likely to travel to both breasts.

There is also a 40 per cent lifetime risk of ovarian cancer, and some increase in the risk of prostate cancer in men and cancers of the skin and pancreas, she said.

Some women choose to have their breasts or ovaries removed to prevent the possibility of developing cancer, especially if one or more close relatives have had the disease.

The downside to that, Warner said, is that even this drastic step doesn't always work.

Gallinger said there is not as strong a genetic link in the case of colorectal cancer. Besides, there is a highly effective, if unpleasant test for it – a colonoscopy. People who get the disease are treated with surgery, chemotherapy if it has spread, and radiation therapy for rectal cancer. In addition, he said, there is a new drug that seems to be helpful, 5-FU.

Genetic counselling, Aronson said, is given both before and after genetic testing, dealing with such issues as anxiety, guilt, whether or not to abort a problematic pregnancy or whether to have children at all.

In the haredi community, she said, this may unreasonably prevent a shidduch.

Rabbi Kelman dryly commented that this last point probably says something painful about the "crazy" shidduch system.

"One is not obligated to inform a prospective mate, or the shadchan, for that matter, about a potential problem before the couple get to know each other," he said.

Human beings are partners with God in the creation, healing and future of the world, and so cannot cavalierly make decisions about their bodies, Rabbi Kelman said. Besides, he added, genes predispose one to certain conditions, but this doesn't guarantee that a person will have the condition.

And where does one draw the line, he asked, if we find genes that predispose one to, say, homosexuality or violence? These are issues that are not necessarily predetermined.

The panel brought up serious ethical issues that can arise from genetic testing. Suppose a woman is tested for the breast cancer gene, but doesn't want to be told the results. Medical ethics dictate that the genetic counsellor who receives the information cannot contact the daughter, or even the doctor, without the patient's permission.

Rabbi Kelman said a doctor is obligated to use his expertise and knowledge to save lives, and thus is obligated to take necessary steps. However, even if he has the moral obligation, he is not required to lose his licence over it, if that would happen.

When Gallinger brought up the new, stringent privacy laws, Rabbi Kelman said that while confidentiality is important, it does not take precedence over saving a life.

He added that pikuach nefesh, the ultimate duty to save a life, refers to a "clear and present risk – not something that may happen in 20 years."

Warner discussed the issue that would arise if there is a question of prophylactic ovarian surgery in a woman, 38, with one son and an extensive family history of early development of breast or ovarian cancer. She wants to have another baby and to breastfeed him. Some people might say she does not have the right to risk delaying the surgery to accomplish these goals. What are Warner's obligations to her in this regard?

While the panel had no definitive answers, Rabbi Kelman pondered, "How much risk is one obligated to take to have a child," when having children is one of the main obligations of a Jewish man, and by extension his wife?

Tasty ways to use up your chametz

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Purim is past and it's time to start thinking Passover – time to go through your cupboards and freezer to begin using up the flour, grains, leavening agents and legumes that must be gone before the holiday begins.

Getting rid of chametz is not as simple as one might think. Yes, it's easy to justify pitching a ½ cup of rice or a few pieces of bread that have been hiding in the recesses of the pantry or freezer. We also don't think twice about noshing on those cookies or candies that will just get "wasted" if we have to throw them away, but what about the full or almost-full boxes of other chametz?

I must admit that I've come up with some unusual meals during these weeks. The combinations I've used have, nevertheless, been delicious. The following recipes should give you a good start at using your grains, pasta and other things that you need to use up in the next few weeks.

LENTIL SOUP

This recipe, from my cookbook Budget Cooking – Elegant Dining is my daughter Amy's favourite soup. I love to have a batch of it simmering in my crockpot in chilly weather.

1 12-oz. package lentils
3 carrots, sliced thin
3-4 stalks celery, sliced thin
2 medium onions, chopped
2 cloves garlic,chopped
1 bay leaf
salt and pepper to taste water to cover
2-3 beef bouillon cubes
8-10 hot dogs, in thick slices

Combine all ingredients except bouillon cubes and hot dogs in a soup pot or crockpot. Gently cook ingredients until lentils burst (several hours). Add bouillon cubes and hot dog slices to soup and continue simmering until the lentils are soft. Makes 8 servings.

SPINACH NOODLE KUGEL

12 oz. medium noodles
1 cup sour cream
1 cup cottage cheese
½ cup butter or margarine
16 oz. mushrooms, sliced
1 pkg. onion soup mix
1 (10-oz.) package frozen chopped spinach, thawed and drained

Cook noodles as directed. Drain thoroughly. Saute mushrooms in butter or margarine. Mix all ingredients and pour into a 9x13-in. greased baking dish. Bake at 350 for 45-60 minutes until set. Makes 10 servings.

THREE CHEESE BREAD PUDDING

I'm a big fan of bread puddings and now is the perfect time to use up all those packages of leftover challah and other breads that seem to multiply in my freezer. This dish is light and delicate, rather than dense like most bread puddings. The combination of goat cheese, Gruyere and Parmesan gives the dish loads of flavour, while using just the inside of a hollowed out loaf of Italian bread makes the dish fluffy and ethereal.

This makes a perfect week-night dinner. Just add some steamed broccoli or asparagus to round out your meal.

1 1-lb. loaf French or other bread
2 cups milk (do not use skim)
4 eggs
1 tsp. salt
3 dashes hot sauce
3½ oz. goat cheese, crumbled
1 cup shredded Gruyere cheese
1 cup shredded Parmesan cheese

Cut the loaf of bread in half and scoop out the fluffy inside bread, reserving crust for another use. Tear bread into 1-in. pieces and place in a 9x13-in. glass baking dish that has been sprayed with nonstick cooking spray.

Beat the milk, eggs, salt and hot sauce in a medium bowl. Sprinkle the cheeses over the bread and drizzle with the milk mixture. Toss gently with a spoon to distribute ingredients. Bake for 45 minutes. Makes 8 servings.

Some new wines from outside the Galilee

Debuting for Passover this year are two new brands from Abarbanel Wines – Efron's Cave and Shemesh.

Efron's Cave is named after Efron the Hittite who, for 400 silver shekels, sold Abraham his field and cave in Hebron to use as a burial ground. This site today is the Cave of Machpelah, where Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Sarah, Rebecca and Leah are buried – Judaism's second-holiest site. Not far from Machpelah in Qiryat Arba, Abarbanel has crafted five original new wines.

Efron's Cave Triple Red and Triple Plum are produced from grapes grown in Israel's Judean Hills, the most ancient area for viticulture in Israel. It was from Hebron that Caleb and Joshua brought back a giant cluster of grapes to Moses when spying out the land from the desert.

"We are extremely proud that these wines are the first high-quality, popularly priced wines from the Judean Hills," said Howard Abarbanel. "Get beyond Galilee and see what the rest of Israel has to offer the discerning wine lover."

Efron Triple Red is one-third Cabernet Sauvignon, one-third Merlot and one-third Syrah, produced in stainless steel with pronounced forward fruit, big Bing cherries with a peppery mid-palate and smooth finish. Efron Triple Plum is 35 per cent Cabernet, 35 per cent Merlot and 30 per cent Syrah.

"We've crafted these wines as an easy choice for every day. Plenty of fruit. Smooth. Compliments food," said Abarbanel.

Joining the reds is Efron's Cave White, a 100 per cent Sauvignon Blanc, also made in stainless – a crisp, angular wine with lemon, citrus, mineral notes and great acidity. The perfect wine for fish, white meat poultry and salads. Mevushal and O-U certified, it is from the Dan region of central Israel.

Also new are Shemesh Sauvignon Blanc Fumé and Shemesh Moscato. "Shemesh" is the Hebrew word for sun, and the grapes for these wines have ripened under the Mediterranean sunshine.

The Sauvignon Blanc Fumé has rested in new French Oak Barrels to achieve a supple level of smokiness along with kiwi, mango and other tropical fruits. It goes especially well with smoked turkey, smoked salmon or smoked trout.

Shemesh Moscato is supple, delicate and mellow, also from the Dan Region. It is semi-sweet, not sweet-sweet. It is light, breezy with hints of peaches, nuts, kumquats and honey. Excellent with poultry, it won't overwhelm food.

Debuting for Passover are new 375-ml half-bottles of Jerusalem Heights, a blend of Cabernet and Merlot with grapes hailing from vineyards in and around Bet Shemesh in the Judean foothills. Aged 18 months in French Oak Barrels, this wine is non-mevushal, O-U-certified and made in the best classic European tradition. It's perfect when you only want two or three glasses of wine with dinner (not a whole bottle) and also want something truly exceptional.

Megiddo is a rare Special Reserve, barrel aged for 24 months from the finest grapes in the Judean Hills, a blend of Cabernet, Merlot and Syrah that can be collected and aged for many years. About $100 a bottle, it's expensive but worth every penny.

Other offerings this year include two original wines from Byblos, produced at Argentina's only full-time 100 per cent kosher winery. New for Passover are Byblos Bonarda and Byblos Semi-Sweet Bonarda. Bonarda is an Italian grape variety that was transported to Argentina by Italian immigrants in the 19th century. The wine is a rich, fruity grape that will remind you of a cross between Shiraz and Chianti. The dry Bonarda is perfect with beef, veal or lamb dishes of any kind. The semi-sweet Bonarda is great for dessert, Kiddush and whenever a touch of sweetness is called for.

Passover Food Ideas

A flavourful Passover menu

By DAPHNA RABINOVICH
Special to The CJN

At our seders, as with most families, tradition tends to reign supreme. Somehow, I doubt my husband would feel it's a proper seder, if I didn't make him his favourite brisket. My son would be severely disappointed if I didn't make his favourite matzah balls.

My mom loves this and my dad loves that other dish, and so on. During the rest of the week, however, tradition can take a back seat as I get to satisfy my own culinary needs and tastes.

After allowing our appetites some time to regain their vigour after the seders, I plunge back into the kitchen ready to concoct a lovely dinner that still follows all of the Passover edicts.

Short ribs are a great antidote to the still cool weather outside and easy on the cook, since they can be made the day ahead. Carrots and spinach provide lively colour contrast to the earthy tones of the meat and hint at the vibrant tones waiting to greet us soon outdoors. So, lie low for a few days and then, post-haste and post-seder, enjoy the delicious and flavourful menu below.

HONEY AND VINEGAR BRAISED SHORT RIBS

2 tbsp. olive oil
5 lb. beef short ribs
2 large onions, chopped
7 large cloves garlic, minced
1½ cups each chopped carrot and celery
1½ tsp. dried thyme
½ tsp. dried oregano
½ tsp. each hot pepper flakes, salt and pepper
⅓ cup honey
½ cup red wine vinegar
4 cups chicken broth
2 cups kosher for Passover dry red wine
⅓ cup tomato paste
1 bay leaf
1 tbsp. potato starch

In Dutch oven set over medium-high heat, heat oil. In batches, brown beef short ribs on all sides, about 10 minutes per batch. Transfer to roasting pan large enough to fit all of the ribs in single layer.

Add onions, garlic, carrots, celery, thyme, oregano, hot pepper flakes, salt, pepper and 3 tablespoons of water to pot. Cook, stirring to scrape up any caramelized brown bits, for about 8 minutes or until softened. Stir in honey for 1 minute. Pour in vinegar, boil until almost all of the vinegar is absorbed, about 5 minutes. Pour in broth, wine, tomato paste and bay leaf. Bring to boil. Pour over ribs in roasting pan. Cover loosely with foil and bake in preheated oven at 350 for 2½ to 3 hours or until meat is very tender. Remove bay leaf. (Meat can be cooled and refrigerated for up to 24 hours at this point.)

Transfer ribs to serving platter and keep warm. Skim off fat from cooking liquid, pour liquid into large pot. Boil, stirring occasionally, for 20 minutes or until reduced to 4 cups. Dissolve potato starch in 1 tablespoon cold water. Pour into boiling liquid. Cook, whisking constantly, for 1 minute or until thickened. Pour over meat to serve. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

PAN FRIED SPINACH

2 bunches fresh baby spinach leaves (about 1½ lbs.)
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 leek, white part only, finely chopped
3 garlic cloves, minced
½ tsp. each salt and pepper

Trim and wash spinach, shaking off excess water. Heat oil in non-stick skillet set over medium heat. Add leek, garlic, salt and pepper and cook, stirring, for 2 minutes or until softened. Add spinach, with water still clinging to the leaves, stirring for about 3 minutes or until wilted. Season to taste with more salt and pepper if desired. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

This is also delicious if you substitute arugula for the spinach.

GLAZED CARROTS WITH FRESH THYME

2 lb. carrots
1 cup chicken broth
2 tbsp. honey
1½ tsp. salt
2 tbsp. kosher for Passover margarine
2 tsp. chopped fresh thyme

Peel and cut carrots diagonally into coins. Place in high-sided skillet with broth, honey and salt. Bring to boil, cover slightly, reduce heat to medium high and boil gently until carrots are just starting to become tender, about 10 minutes. Uncover, continue cooking, stirring often until all of the liquid evaporates and carrots are starting to turn golden. Stir in margarine and thyme until margarine is melted and carrots are well glazed. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Passover Food Ideas

Plan an enjoyable mid-week Passover meal

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

For many years, my daughter and I were lucky to be invited out for Passover. In addition to joining a big group of people and sampling a variety of Passover foods, I relished the added benefit of not having to plan, shop and cook for the daunting seder meals. Unfortunately, this also meant no leftovers, no matzah kugel in the refrigerator, no beef and vegetable tsimmes to reheat in the microwave or even charoset to sweeten the box of matzah sitting on my kitchen counter.

My daughter was just fine with this arrangement. Because, other than matzah ball soup, she is not a fan of Passover fare. One year, she unintentionally lost weight by avoiding all matzah-related dishes and living off hard boiled eggs, fruit and cheese.

So this year, our first in Austin, I asked myself how I could create a mid-week Passover meal she would enjoy but I could prepare easily with ingredients on hand, avoiding all bread, pasta, and pizza for the required eight days.

In the Haggadah, there are four questions intended for the youngest person present to read aloud. The series begins with, "Why is this night different from all other nights?" and goes on with "On all other nights, we eat either leavened bread or unleavened; on this night why only unleavened bread?" And "On all other nights, we eat herbs of any kind; why on this night only bitter herbs?" These questions, posed by children but listened to by all, bring into focus the Passover food rituals and their significance.

These not-so-easy changes in diet are meant to convey a story – of Jewish slavery in Egypt, of the bitter trials of oppression, of the unleavened bread eaten by the Jews as they hurriedly fled their oppressors and finally, of the fruitful and brave adaptations leading toward freedom.

For my growing daughter and me, a delicious, moist, homemade chicken meal would be different from all other nights. Because on all other days of the year, we buy our chicken – fried, roasted, or baked – from the store. Because, on all other nights, unless immersed quickly and safely into soup, my chicken ends up dry, under- or over-cooked, or tasteless.

Determined to prepare at least one simple Passover meal, I needed to buy potato starch to replace corn thickeners and kosher for Passover pareve "cream." The menu: moist baked chicken, new red potatoes and creamed spinach. And for dessert, I decided on a child friendly project, almond brittle, because most nuts and sugar are kosher for Passover, but as we stirred the ingredients together over low heat, all feelings of dietary restrictions melted away.

When I began the chicken recipe, I was filled with images of past failures and anxious about wasting pounds of poultry, let alone my time. But when we sat down to our colourful meal, with orange carrots, green spinach and seasoned red potatoes surrounding truly tasty chicken, watching my daughter eat two hearty portions made all my trepidation worthwhile. I even started talking about other scary chicken dishes I might attempt.

Passover Food Ideas

Enjoy mid-week Passover chicken

As the Passover Haggadah emphasizes, important changes do not come about without sacrifice, and often they begin by asking a question.

MOIST BAKED CHICKEN WITH NEW POTATOES

You can use all legs or breast sections, whatever you prefer. The simple ingredients will deeply flavour and moisten each bite, and it is impossible to mess up.

2¼ lb. chicken legs (approx. 3)
1½ lb. skinless, boneless thighs
¼ cup pareve margarine
7 gloves garlic, cut in half
8 new red potatoes, washed, cut in half
8 baby carrots, washed
1½ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. pepper
½ tsp. paprika

Preheat oven to 425. In large roasting pan, melt margarine. Scatter garlic and carrots in melted margarine. Arrange chicken, skin side down, and potatoes skin side up, in roasting pan. Sprinkle salt, pepper and paprika evenly over chicken and potatoes.

Bake 30 minutes. Turn the chicken and baste before baking, 15-20 minutes more, or until chicken is fork tender. Makes 8 servings.

CREAMED SPINACH

1 lb. chopped, frozen spinach, thawed
1½ tbsp. margarine
1 clove garlic
½ small onion, minced
½ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. pepper
½ cup pareve cream substitute
1 tbsp. potato starch

In medium saucepan, sauté onion and garlic in margarine until onion is tender. Remove garlic. In small bowl, mix pareve cream with potato starch. Stir in salt and pepper.

Over low heat, gradually add cream mixture to sautéed onions, stirring continually as sauce thickens. Stir in drained spinach, heat through, and serve immediately. Serves 6.

PASSOVER ALMOND BRITTLE

This is not great for your teeth, but kids love to help make and eat it, and in the middle of a long Passover week, it is well worth their sugary smiles.

2 cups sugar
1½ cups blanched almond pieces
pinch of salt

Generously grease large cookie sheet. In heavy skillet on medium-low heat, heat sugar, stirring regularly, until it dissolves into liquid. Add nuts and salt and continue stirring until nuts are coated in golden liquid.

Remove from heat and pour at once onto greased baking pan, spreading thinly with a spatula. It will begin to harden quickly. Cool completely. Using hands, or asking your kids to use theirs, break into pieces and store in an airtight container. Serves 20.

Transport minister explores security in Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

How does a nation balance security with normalcy? It looks to Israel.

At least that's the view of Jean Lapierre, Canada's transport minister, who returned this month from a visit to the Jewish state to explore how the country combines the life-and-death need for security in an especially vulnerable area while still appearing to go about a normal existence.

Over four days, Lapierre toured Israel's transportation infrastructure – airports, roads, border crossings and ports – and came away impressed with the country's ability to maintain high levels of security without succumbing to a fortress mentality.

Canada can learn from that balance, Lapierre told The CJN in a telephone interview from Ottawa a few days after his return.

"How do you balance the need for security [while] you want to keep trade open [and] you want people to keep on travelling? That balance between security and a normal life [in Israel] – that was impressive."

Especially, he stressed, at Ben-Gurion International Airport. "The way security is done, you don't feel oppressed because there are no uniforms. It looks easygoing but it's quite efficient."

Lapierre held discussions with his Israeli counterpart, Meir Sheetrit, on common concerns arising from transport security issues and how to implement the latest cutting edge technologies.

He and justice minister Irwin Cotler also represented Canada at this month's opening of a new museum at Yad Vashem designed by Canadian architect Moshe Safdie.

Lapierre also travelled to Ramallah for meetings with Palestinian transport officials.

He toured the Port of Ashdod to examine marine security and the control centre of Israel's Highway 6, an automated toll highway operated by Derech Eretz, a division of the Canadian engineering company AECON.

The toll road was built using the same technology as Highway 407 north of Toronto "but it's even better," Lapierre noted. "[The Israelis] improved it.

"Frankly we could use that here. I was making jokes about Montreal's Highway 30. We call it Highway 30 because we've been promising it for 30 years."

He praised Israeli safety practices as "the best in the world."

"The systems are impressive because contrary to some others, they don't rely only on technology. They know that there's no better censor than a human being. So the mix of human talent and technology and the practical steps that they go through to make the place more secure…it's fascinating."

At Ben-Gurion Airport, Lapierre saw what Israeli officials are doing in the areas of passenger screening, baggage and cargo inspections, and the gathering of data.

He was especially impressed with technology at some border crossings that allow Israelis to leave and re-enter using only their fingerprints. "This is pretty efficient," he said.

At the Karni border crossing between Israel and Gaza, "I could also see the limitations. How this is done is pretty heavy stuff. It's certainly not the most efficient way of doing trade, [and] I can understand the security concerns, but this is quite a stressful spot."

Still, in Ramallah, as in Israel, Lapierre said he found a pragmatic outlook.

Jean Lapierre

In meetings with the Palestinian Authority's transport minister, "there was a sense of optimism. They were not trying to sell a story. They were just trying to make it work. He told me, 'We need better roads to go to Israel and people to go to work there.' It was all about wanting to make it work. We were not being spun [and] there was no judgment of anybody else. It was a good mood."

In Israel too, "I had the feeling people were hopeful, that they can arrive at a solution. So there was a lot of optimism, but also realism."

Lapierre first visited Israel as a young MP in 1979. This time, he was struck by a commitment to make peace work. "You never hear people say it's impossible."

Though Canada has spent more than $3 billion on transportation security since 9/11, the minister is frank about Canadian safety measures.

"Frankly I think we have a lot to learn. The problem is, we don't have a culture of security. And we're a bit relaxed about it because we don't feel threatened. But the threat is still there, not only for us but also to our neighbours. It's real even if we don't feel it. And it's even worse because you're not alert. That's why the Israeli experience is really good for us."

Coast to Coast

Sympathy from unexpected quarters

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Jeffrey Simpson, in a Feb. 1 Globe and Mail column on Canadian attitudes toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, wrote: "There was a time in Canada… when Israel was the political left's darling, and enjoyed considerable popularity across the entire political spectrum.

"Those days, however, have disappeared, and their disappearance worries some leading members of Canada's Jewish community. The Canadian political left has become almost reflexively critical of Israel, sometimes with great shrillness."

Yet the attitude of the media is much more fairminded, Simpson argued. "A lot of Canadian Jews apparently think the media is biased against Israel. This belief is quite wrong, as any reasonably objective reading of the Canadian media would reveal."

On this point, the evidence appears to back up Simpson. While in Canadian media circles there are staunch critics of Israel, not only from the left but also from the right (Israel being the one country around which the far right and left are united, uniquely, in their vitriol), overall the "sympathetic attention" (as Simpson would have it) is not insubstantial.

What is most unusual today – and this may only be temporary – is to find sympathetic understanding of Israel where one would have least expected it.

From time to time, this column has attempted to point out that publications such as the Economist – an influential, conservative (British) magazine – though traditionally quite hostile to Israel, have recently tempered their criticism. The Economist has even gone so far as to extol Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon as a peacemaker while at the same time denouncing the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat as a "terrorist recidivist."

To be sure, compared with the Canadian media, the European media are far more critical, even hostile, to Israel. In Britain, newspapers such as the Guardian and the Independent come to mind, as do Le Monde and Le Monde Diplomatique in France.

However, even in these newspapers, there have been changes in attitude not only toward Israel and the broader Middle East, but also toward the United States and its foreign policy, especially regarding the war in Iraq.

Take two recent examples from the March 11-17 issue of the Guardian Weekly.

In an article first published in Le Monde, Dominique Moisi, a special advisor to the French Institute of International Relations, said Europe needs to play a new and constructive role in the Middle East. Since Arafat's death and the elections in Iraq, the "overall context" in the region has changed, as have relations between Europe and the United States.

Moisi said the overthrow of Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein's regime has "released a tide of change throughout the Arab and Muslim world" and Europe, by "combining pressure and persuasion… can bring Arab leaders round to compromise and moderation."

Moisi wrote: "[A]n end to the killing in Israel and Palestine depends, albeit indirectly, on achieving a new balance of power in Baghdad." This totally reverses the standard European refrain which says no regional change is possible until the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is resolved.

He reflected on this volte face in European thinking: "[A]fter maintaining that peace could never be achieved without Arafat, [European leaders] are now praising Ariel Sharon's political courage. By a neat twist of fate, a hawk now stands the best chance of achieving peace."

Perhaps most surprising is Moisi's conclusion: "Europe, with its colonial and anti-Semitic past, bears a heavy responsibility for the Middle East conflict. In view of its geographical proximity and demographic makeup [a reference to Europe's growing Arab/Muslim population], it needs peace in the Middle East more than anyone else, except of course the Israelis and Palestinians themselves."

Similar points are made from a left-wing perspective in Jonathan Freedland's Guardian article, "The war's silver lining: We need to acknowledge that the Iraq invasion has intensified pressure for democracy in the Middle East."

Freedland observed: "[W]e have to say that the call for freedom throughout the Arab and Muslim world is a sound and just one… Put starkly, we cannot let ourselves fall into the trap of opposing democracy in the Middle East simply because Bush and Blair are calling for it."

'Motives are pure:' Dhar

Speaking in an English that was not always clear, Dhar repeated that his "motives are pure," that he is not looking for money, beyond his costs, or to immigrate to Canada. Married and the father of two, he said he made 9,500 rupees a month as an investment consultant, and described his circumstances as middle class.

He said he is motivated by religious conviction – he is Hindu – and was touched by Tegegne's story of his often risky work among Ethiopian Jews. He also said his grandfather, an army general, died of kidney disease.

Asked why he has not donated a kidney to someone in India, Dhar said he and his wife are registered with an Indian organ bank, but he would have to pay part of his medical costs in India. He also feels the level of health care is higher in Canada. He said he understands the risks of having a kidney removed from speaking to a nephrologist in his area of southern India. "I believe God will be with me," he said.

Jacobovici accused the RVH of "obstructing compassion" and of "arrogance, paranoia and a bit of racism" because, he says, it assumes that anyone donating a kidney, especially if he or she is from the Third World, is doing it for the money and not for noble reasons. He doubts any policy exists, and the RVH is "just making one up as it goes along."

Jacobovici said a donor's word that he is not going to take compensation for an organ should be enough for a hospital and, if not, an affidavit could be drawn up. In this case, he said Dhar is "totally credible," a point Bergman agreed upon.

Bergman and Jacobovici refuted suggestions that, if a Canadian hospital accepts Dhar's donation, Tegegne is "jumping the queue" because he has the advantage of a lawyer and the public advocacy of a well-known filmmaker.

On the contrary, they say that if the legal action is successful, it will benefit everyone by changing the way organ donations are managed in Canada. "There's an unwritten policy in Canada that, other than family members, no one can donate a kidney to anyone else" to avoid the chance that the organ was actually purchased, said Jacobovici.

"In other words, they treat live donors as guilty until proven innocent. On the off chance that a bad apple may slip through the system, compassion is obstructed and thousands of Canadians are left to die."

Bergman and Jacobovici say about 3,000 Canadians are on the kidney transplant waiting list, and on average 200 die each year before an organ is available.

"I believe I am opening doors for others," Tegegne added.

Also participating by conference call was Dr. Robert Hickey, a Canadian living in the United States, who recently underwent the transplant of a kidney donated by a young American man with whom he made contact through www.matching-donors.com. The operation was done at Presbyterian/St. Luke's Medical Centre in Denver after its clinical ethics committee approved the arrangement.

Hickey said he has made inquiries with British Columbia's transplant authority and St. Paul's Hospital in Vancouver to see if it will undertake to test Dhar and perform the transplant if he is found compatible.

Ottawa rabbi remembers logotherapy pioneer

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — To mark the 100th anniversary of the birth of the late Viktor Frankl, the psychiatrist and Holocaust survivor who founded logotherapy, Rabbi Reuven Bulka gave a lecture recently at Library and Archives Canada about logotherapy's exploration of man's quest for meaning.

Rabbi Bulka was introduced by Tim Hogan, the University of Ottawa professor who led him to Frankl's ideas in the late 1960s.

While discussing the young scholar's plan to pursue graduate studies that would combine his interests in Judaism and psychology, Hogan suggested that he read a book by Frankl, who was, until that time, unknown to Rabbi Bulka.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

Thus began a personal and professional relationship that would last until Frankl's death in 1997. Rabbi Bulka completed a PhD in logotherapy and religion and has gone on to publish many books of his own.

"Frankl was a psychiatrist and also a philosopher," Rabbi Bulka said. "He had ideas that apply to everyone."

The basic premise of logotherapy is that life has meaning, for without meaning there is no life, and even while enduring the horrors of the Holocaust, Frankl was able to find meaning, Rabbi Bulka said.

By focusing on ideas and thoughts beyond himself and beyond the immediate, he managed to maintain sanity and hope, the rabbi said.

When he entered the concentration camps, Frankl had with him the manuscript for a book that was to be his life's work. When it was confiscated, Frankl became depressed, but he came to the conclusion that there must be more meaning to life, that his life had a purpose with or without the manuscript.

"He insisted that this quest for meaning is the primary motivation of man," Rabbi Bulka said.

"What has meaning? That could be loving someone. It could be ideas that you promulgate. It could be causes that you champion.

"When there is no meaning to life, then a serious question is 'Why continue?' Why not suicide?" said Rabbi Bulka.

"Man is the only being who can contemplate suicide. Frankl turns that around and says that since you can say no to life, you can also say yes to life. In a situation of suffering, the attitude you take toward the suffering is a value."

The greatest test of life's meaning is how we deal with suffering and death, and Frankl was able to find a positive side even in times of extreme suffering, Rabbi Bulka said.

"You should not run after suffering, but if it hits you, make the best of it," he said. "No matter what cards you were dealt, no matter what circumstances confront you, you have the ability to make choices. The choices are choices toward values."

Following Rabbi Bulka's lecture, the film The Choice is Yours – The Life of Viktor Frankl, by Ruth Yorkin Drazin, a New York woman in her mid-80s, was screened. The film is narrated by actor Richard Dreyfus.

At the conclusion of the evening, Rabbi Bulka signed copies of his 1990 book Uncommon Sense for Common Problems: A Logotherapy Guide to Life's Hurdles and Challenges. He donated the proceeds of book sales to the Ottawa Regional Cancer Centre Foundation.

Islamic school suspends teachers

OTTAWA — Two teachers at a private Islamic school in Ottawa were suspended last Wednesday following allegations that incitement of hatred against Jews was expressed in a student's writing project.

The Ottawa Citizen reported that one teacher at the the Abraar Islamic school was apparently involved in the production of the student's eight-page story of killing and martyrdom. Handwritten in Arabic, the cover page was illustrated with a drawing of a burning Star of David beside a machine-gun and Palestinian flag atop Jerusalem's Dome of the Rock.

The text in the sketch read, "With the call of God is the Greatest, the flag of Zionism will fall and will be destroyed."

The other teacher reportedly had written comments on the student's paper, praising the boy's story of revenge for the assassination by Israeli forces a year ago of Sheik Ahmed Yassin, a co-founder of Hamas.

"Without thinking, Ahmed took his M16 machine-gun and threw the bombs, and he showered the Jews; this resulted in the killing of the soldiers." the boy's text read.

"God bless you, your efforts are good," the teacher wrote on the title page.

Aisha Sherazi, the principal of the 260-student school, said the seven members of the school's board of directors were "shocked" by the teachers' involvement in the project, and decided at an emergency meeting to suspend the instructors.

Sherizi said an investigation is pending. "Then we'll see what action we decide we want to take," she told the Citizen.

"Encouraging or inciting hatred is strictly prohibited at our school. We will take all measures to investigate this matter and ensure that it does not reoccur."

She said the subject may have been a submission in a creative writing contest for the Arabic studies class, where students can choose their own topics.

Chai Folk Ensemble receives rave reviews on tour

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble recently returned from a triumphant tour of southern California.

The troupe of 45 Chai dancers, singers, musicians and technical people drew about 800 people and received a standing ovation at a performance last month at the Fred Kavli Theatre for the Performing Arts in the Los Angeles suburb of Thousand Oaks, and about 450 more at a second show a few days later at the San Jose Heritage Theatre in Campbell, Calif.

At their final stop in Palm Springs, the ensemble sold out the Palm Springs High School Theatre following a front-page spread in the Desert Sun, Palm Springs' only newspaper.

"We sold 300 tickets in the two days between the time the story was printed in the Desert Sun and the show itself," says Earl Barish, the organizer and executive producer of the tour, called Take the Chai Road – California '05.

"There were about 900 at the Palm Springs performance. There are 200 to 300 Jewish Winnipeggers who spend the winter in Palm Springs, [but] most of the audience, both Jewish and non-Jewish, were from the community as a whole. The performers were magnificent."

Some two dozen people made donations above and beyond the cost of their tickets, he added.

The Chai Folk Ensemble recently returned from a tour of southern California.

The master of ceremonies for the tour was David Gale, an entertainer and television personality who co-created and hosted the cooking show Loving Spoonfuls. Gale is a Chai alumnus – he danced with Chai from 1974 to 1979 – who now lives in Toronto. For the past four years, he has served as MC at all of Chai's major productions.

"It was a fantastic experience," Gale says of the California tour. "There are those in Winnipeg who may take Chai for granted. But in Southern California, they don't get to see a group like Chai very often. The audience response is great everywhere in the world that Chai has performed."

The Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble was founded by music teacher Sarah Sommer in 1964 in the basement of her home. She started with eight girls. When Sommer died of cancer at age 39, the Winnipeg Jewish community took Chai under its wing. The performers are mainly between 18 and 25. While they volunteer their time, the troupe is billed as a professional ensemble because of the high calibre of the show.

The group does music and dance from all over the world where Jews have lived, including Morocco, Greece, Russia, Israel, Yemen, Spain, Poland and Africa. The ensemble has performed across Canada and has made appearances in Florida at Walt Disney World, in Mexico City at the Festival Aviv, and it toured Israel in 1998.

The idea for the ensemble's first California tour was proposed by philanthropist and events promoter Earl Barish. "I became enamoured of Chai's professional ability and dedication," he says. "I thought the Chai show this past year was exceptional."

Last August, Barish had relatives visiting from California who attended the Chai performance at Winnipeg's Folklorama Festival. Afterwards, Barish and his relatives talked about the prospects of giving the group some exposure in southern California. His relatives thought Chai would succeed in California.

Barish approached Chai's board and received approval to proceed. He says he is working on another American tour for next February.

"I believe very strongly that this talented group of professionals is an asset to the Jewish community and the City of Winnipeg," he says. "We want to introduce their music and dance to other communities."

In the meantime, the ensemble is gearing up for the annual Folklorama Festival in August, and an alumni review is being planned for June.

Talk radio host wins Birthright essay contest

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — At the age of only 24, Adam Grachnik has already racked up an impressive string of "firsts" in his media career.

He is, to the best of his knowledge, the first Canadian to have won the Birthright Israel writing contest, and he and his co-host at Ottawa talk radio station CFRA are by far the youngest hosts at the station. He is also the managing editor of Kitchissippi Times, a local community newspaper.

Grachnik, who grew up in Richmond Hill and Thornhill, came to Ottawa to study communications at the University of Ottawa, where he wrote for the campus paper.

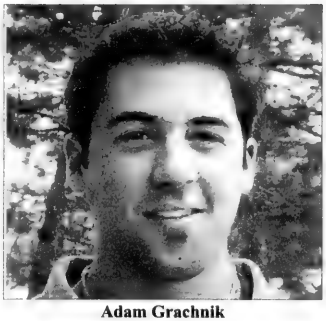
"Eventually, after four years, I became editor-in-chief. Campus journalism, outside of journalism school, I feel, is an excellent place to practise the craft," he said.

Along the way, he also completed internships at The CJN in Toronto and at the Ottawa Citizen, and he went on a Birthright Israel trip.

"I had wanted to go to Israel for a long time. Many of my friends had gone and I just wanted to go," he said.

Last spring, before leaving for his Birthright trip, Grachnik pitched a story to the Citizen, suggesting that he could write about his experience as a first-time visitor to Israel, one whose father was born there and whose grandparents arrived there after surviving the Holocaust. The experience was profound and the story documented it.

He also decided to enter an essay in the Birthright Israel writing contest. The selection committee narrowed down the entrants to five finalists and Birthright alumni voted on the Birthright website for the winner. In early March, Grachnik found out he had won.



Adam Grachnik

The prize is a "very generous" gift certificate to Amazon.com, he said.

Grachnik's late-night radio show Last Call is on air every weeknight from midnight to 2 a.m.

"Each and every night, I am shocked by the number of people that actually listen at that time," he said.

"The topics are wide-ranging and vast. We tend to focus on topics that are not mentioned during the day… overseas stories, quirky news, something that people may not have heard before by listening to the same newscasts all day. We bring energy to the news, a younger perspective to the issues.

"The main thing about our show is that we have fun. We don't take ourselves too seriously. We laugh a lot on the show."

Grachnik's plans for the future include more of the same.

"I hope to continue to write and talk on the radio. I would love to do both for the rest of my life."

Grachnik's winning essay can be read at www.birthrightisrael.com.

Muslim's criticism of Abbas rebuffed by Jewish journalist

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A Winnipeg audience recently heard two conflicting assessments of Palestinian Authority President Mohammed Abbas.

Khaleel Mohammed, a respected Muslim cleric and academic, described Abbas as a less flamboyant version of his predecessor and a Holocaust denier with whom Israel was unlikely to get very far in any peace negotiations. But an audience member countered that Abbas is sincere in wanting to end the violence and may be Israel's best hope for peace. The Palestinian leader's defender is a well-respected Jewish Israeli journalist, Shmuel Segev, who makes his home in Winnipeg for part of the year.

Mohammed was the first of this year's Asper Foundation Lecture Series speakers. The series is co-sponsored by the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative.

Mohammed, who is from the Caribbean, is an assistant professor of religious studies at San Diego State University and one of the few Islamic scholars and imams who is respected by both Sunni and Shitte Muslims. He also spent two years as a research fellow at Brandeis University.

"Whenever I speak to a Jewish audience, I know I leave people frustrated because I don't leave them with much hope for peace," Mohammed said. "While peace is a worthy goal to strive for, you have to accept reality."

While Mohammed said he recognized that there have been stirrings of hope again in the past few months – with Arafat's passing and the succession of Abbas – he charged that Abbas can be trusted no more than Arafat. Mohammed added that Abbas has been foisted on Israel as a partner for peace by Europe and the United States because he is not Arafat and the western powers like what they hear him saying.

Like Arafat though, Mohammed reported, Abbas is telling his own people a different story than he is telling westerners. He is telling them, Mohammed said, that he will not compromise on the right of return for all Palestinians or on the release of all Palestinian prisoners or on the question of Jerusalem. Although Abbas has publically and repeatedly called for an end to violence, Mohammed argues that his stance against violence isn't moral but, rather, tactical.

"He doesn't say that violence is wrong," Mohammed pointed out. "He says that violence plays into the hands of the Israelis and gives Israel an excuse to use its superior firepower.

"He has repeatedly said that he will not try to disarm the terrorist groups."

Mohammed also talked about Abbas' role as a Holocaust denier, noting that Holocaust denial was the subject of Abbas' doctoral thesis, which he earned at university in Moscow. In his thesis and in a subsequent book, Abbas disputed the total number of Jewish victims of the Nazis and he claimed that the gas chambers were used only for disposing of the bodies of individuals who died from starvation and disease. In his thesis, Mohammed also said that Abbas claimed the Nazis and the Zionists colluded – the Zionists stole Arab land and in return allowed the Nazis to confiscate Jewish-owned property.

"In the Muslim world, anyone with a university degree is considered an expert on everything and many people will believe anything they say," Mohammed said. "Therefore people will believe Abbas when he says that the Holocaust was an exaggeration, just as they believed Arafat when he claimed that the Temple in Jerusalem never existed."

During the question and answer session that followed, Segev took issue with Mohammed's portrayal of Abbas. Segev, who says he has known Abbas for 25 years, said that Abbas explanation of his Holocaust-denying thesis is that in order to earn a PhD from a Soviet university, he had to write what the Communists wanted.

Segev noted that Abbas has been conducting dialogues with Israelis since the mid-1980s, that he has never deliberately misled Israel, that he has never supported terrorism and that he was one of the original negotiators at the Oslo accord.

"He was not foisted on us by the Americans," Segev said. "If anything, we encouraged the Americans to accept him after he was elected by his own people."

Mohammed disagreed with much of what the Israeli journalist said. "It's not that I am trying to discredit Abbas," he said. "You have to know who you are negotiating with."

Mohammed added that in his travels in the Arab world, he has observed that Palestinians in Israel are far better off than Palestinians anywhere else in the Arab world, in contrast to the current image of Israeli oppression prevalent on North American university campuses.

More federal funding for human rights museum

WINNIPEG — The federal government is set to announce an additional $1 million in funding for the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, the Winnipeg Free Press reported last week.

The paper quoted senior sources as saying it's the first step toward a major new partnership with the project spearheaded by Winnipeg's Asper family.

One source says the new federal commitment will mean an expansion of the mandate of the project.

It may also include an international think-tank on human rights, which would be consistent with Prime Minister Paul Martin's ambition of having Canada play a bigger role on the world stage.

For the past year, the Aspers have been campaigning for an additional $70 million from Ottawa to pay the capital costs of the planned $200 million human rights museum.

To date, Ottawa has committed $27 million in capital funding plus $2.3 million for development costs.

Manitoba and Winnipeg have each pledged $20 million to the project.

International quest to recover art lost to Nazis

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The three universities that are the main beneficiaries of the estate of prominent Montreal art dealer Max Stern plan to seek restitution of the 250 works so far identified that the Nazis either confiscated from Stern or forced him to sell in the 1930s, when he had a gallery in Dusseldorf, Germany.

Concordia University is leading the effort on behalf of the other two, McGill University and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and the executors.

Clarence Epstein, director of special projects in Concordia president Frederick Lowy's cabinet, says the international investigation launched about six months ago has thus far located five of the works in public, corporate and private collections in the United States, England, Holland and Germany.

Epstein said two of the current "possessors" have been contacted, and he was scheduled to meet one of them in New York last week. The other three are aware that a claim has been made on the works.

Epstein said the universities and executors hope to avoid going to court to get the art back. Retrieving the work from museums and especially dealers is relatively easy once the claim has been backed up because a "black mark" has effectively been put on the work until it is restituted.

Stern's ownership of the 250 known works is quite irrefutable, Epstein said. Proof consists of a Stern gallery stamp on the back of a painting, a purchase receipt, a museum or auction house catalogue or other documentary evidence.

Persuading private collectors to return the works may be more difficult, he acknowledged, and it's conceivable some of the works may have been in the same hands for 50 years. Epstein is for now relying on "moral suasion to convince them to do what is right."

The sense of obligation to return works also varies by country. The United States and Germany, for example are sensitive to the need for restitution, while Austria is less so. Epstein said Concordia is committed to this undertaking for as long as necessary and resources from the estate can fund it.

Epstein said Stern, who died in 1987, probably lost more than 250 works to the Nazis. "There aren't hundreds more, but there could be tens more," he said.

Among those identified are some valuable Dutch and Flemish Old Masters and 18th, 19th and early 20th-century German works. Stern owned the Dominion Gallery on Sherbrooke Street for many years.

The official announcement of Concordia's pursuit of Stern's art holdings was made at the Norton Museum of Art in West Palm Beach, Fla., which was also a beneficiary of Stern's estate.

The Norton was chosen because it has decided to earmark funds from the estate for research into the ownership history of their own collection, thereby serving as a "model" for other institutions, Epstein said.

As the works are reclaimed, the executors plan to loan them to museums and galleries for certain periods. In the long term, however, they are the property of the universities and could be sold, Epstein said.

Concordia is working closely with the Art Loss Register in London, which collects information on stolen or lost art and is assisted in this effort by Interpol; the Commission for Looted Art in Europe, primarily during the Nazi period; and the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office.

Major auction houses like Sotheby's and Christie's have also contacted Epstein when the Stern provenance of a work is discovered.

Stern took over his father's gallery in Dusseldorf after his father's death in 1934. The demands from the new Third Reich began almost immediately.

"I have had the opportunity to read letters written to Max Stern by Nazi officials in 1935, 1936 and 1937, letters filled with arrogance, disdain and insult," said lawyer Robert Vineberg, one of the co-executors. These letters, "stamped with swastikas, ordered Stern to immediately liquidate the gallery and to cease carrying on his business."

In 1937, Stern placed many of his holdings with a shipping agent for safekeeping and consigned the rest of the gallery's contents to the Lempertz Auction House in Cologne, which sold them at a fraction of their value. (A Lempertz catalogue has been valuable in tracing many of the works.) Stern fled to Paris, and then went to London.

In 1940, he was interned by Britain along with other German nationals, and the following year, he was shipped to Canada where he spent more than a year in internment camps in New Brunswick and Quebec.

After the war, Stern did recover some of the art taken by the Nazis.

Epstein said that even though works sought were sold, "it's virtually as wrong as if they were looted because the sale was under duress and for perhaps 10 cents on the dollar."

Stern and his late wife Iris had no children. They amassed a huge collection of Old Master, European modern and Canadian art that they began donating from the 1960s to more than 20 museums in Canada, the United States, and Israel. Still, a large estate was left.

Concordia is spearheading the reclamation of the Stern holdings because it gained a certain expertise in handling his estate.

Children's musician to play at diabetes fundraiser

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — When her three-year-old daughter started having flu symptoms, taking numerous trips to the bathroom and being constantly thirsty, Andrea Zians never imagined Sarah Leah could be suffering from a serious, chronic disease.

But soon Sarah Leah was diagnosed with Type 1 diabetes, a condition that afflicts about 200,000 Canadians.

People with diabetes don't produce enough insulin to properly metabolize glucose, or the insulin they have works inefficiently. As a result, those with the disease require insulin injections to metabolize glucose properly.

"She kept wanting to go to the bathroom. She would go the bathroom, drink, go to the bathroom," Zians said. "I learned later these are the classic symptoms of diabetes. I didn't even know what it was.

"Then our whole life changed."

Zians and her husband had to test Sarah Leah's blood five times a day and inject her with insulin three times a day.

"When it was time for her needle, her siblings would hide her from us. They thought they were doing her a favour. One of our other daughters, who was five, would hit my husband when he was giving the needles," Zians said.

Meeting the challenges of having a young child with diabetes had now become routine for the family, although it isn't always easy.

That is why Zians and the Hamilton Hebrew Academy fundraising committee have teamed with the Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation to bring popular children's musician Fred Penner to Hamilton for two concerts April 10.

The event will raise funds for the JDRF and the resource room at the Hamilton school. The honorary chair of the event is Dr. Hertzel Gerstein, director of the diabetes care and research program at Hamilton Health Sciences.

Fred Penner celebrated his 24th year as a performer in 2004. He has written several children's books and starred in his own television show for 12 seasons, and his 11 albums have sold one million copies.

Prior to the concert, Fred Penner will do private story readings for children with diabetes. Children will be given a snack during the story time and a loot bag. Tickets for this reading and the concert are free to children with diabetes and one parent, on a first-come, first-served basis.

"Many times, a fundraiser holds a meet and greet with its big donors before the main event," Zians said. "Since this is about children with diabetes, we thought we would do something for the kids."

Now seven, Sara Leah uses an insulin pump, a device which delivers insulin through a small needle just under the skin and can be worn on a belt or kept in a pocket. The pump gives a steady amount of insulin throughout the day and can be programmed to increase dosage depending on mealtime and other factors.

While the family still has to chart her blood sugar levels and match the insulin dose to her needs, the pump has given Sarah Leah more control and more flexibility.

Zians said Sarah Leah is learning to manage her diabetes. For example, she can now visit friends on Shabbat and knows to tell an adult when she feels her blood sugar is low. Before she was never able to leave her parents on Shabbat, as they would be unable to reach her by phone.

"It's so dramatic when you're a little kid to have diabetes. Even if you don't want to eat, you still have to eat at certain times," Zians said. "Without diabetes you can eat anything you want, you never have to check your blood sugar or be poked with anything. With diabetes you always have to watch what you eat.

"But she's a toughie. She greets every day with a big happy smile. She's amazing."

And with experience and the help of teachers and staff at Hamilton Hebrew Academy, Zians said life with diabetes has become easier for Sarah Leah and her family.

Zians wants to reassure families who have just received a diagnosis.

"It's going to be routine. When she was diagnosed and people would tell me it's going to be simple, I would get mad, because I never could imagine that would be possible. But it does happen," she said.

"There is a major learning curve. You have to learn about care and testing, but life does become normal. It's always going to be different, but it does get better."

Fred Penner will perform at Sir John A. McDonald Secondary School in Hamilton, Sunday, April 10 at 1 p.m. and 4 p.m. Tickets are $18 for adults and $15 for children.

For tickets and information, visit www.ticketmaster.com, or call Zians at (905) 308-7647 to reserve free tickets for children with diabetes for the concert and private story session.

Abbas criticizes Israel, U.S. over settlement policy

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas criticized Israel's position on settlements Sunday, and indirectly pointed a finger at the United States.

He was incensed at repeated U.S. support for Israel's retaining its main settlement blocs in the West Bank in a peace deal. The Palestinians claim all of the West Bank.

Abbas did not name the United States, but his target was clear. "Any talk of settlements that is not a discussion of stopping them is unacceptable," he said. "I'm talking about the discussions of annexing settlement blocs. This is unacceptable because it affects final status issues."

Condoleezza Rice

Earlier Sunday, Israel's ambassador to the United States, Danny Ayalon, responding to a controversy surrounding American policy on the Middle East, said President George W. Bush unequivocally supports Israel's stance that major West Bank settlement blocs are to be part of the Jewish state under a future peace treaty.

On Friday, U.S. Ambassador to Israel Daniel Kurtzer strongly denied a Yediot Achronot report quoting him as having said that, contrary to Israeli statements, no understanding had been reached between Israel and the Bush administration over the future status of the settlement blocs.

In remarks broadcast on Army Radio Sunday, Kurtzer said he had been "badly misquoted" by the newspaper.

Asked if Bush was determined in his support of Israel's stance that Ariel, Ma'aleh Adumim and other large settlement blocs would remain within Israel's final-status borders, Ayalon replied, "Certainly. Unequivocally. On the basis of contacts with all administration officials, this is certainly the position, and I stand behind it."

Last weekend, the American administration reiterated Bush's promises to Sharon at their meeting in April 2004, which centred on the recognition that the settlement blocs would remain in Israel's hands in a future final status agreement with the Palestinians.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking to Israel Radio, said, "We do not appreciate people trying to create confusion where there is no confusion.

"I understand this is a big issue in Israel, but no one should say there's no agreement between our two governments. That's wrong. There is. It was reached on April 14 last year and it's clear.

"While we will not prejudice the outcome of final status negotiations, the changes on the ground, the 'existing major Israeli population centres' will have to be taken in account in any final status negotiations," she said.

Rice made it clear that the term "Israeli population centres" refers directly to the large settlement blocs.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Saturday that the American agreement on the settlement blocs stands firm.

Sharon and Bush will discuss the continued construction in the settlement blocs in the West Bank at a meeting to take place in two weeks at Bush's ranch in Texas. The Israelis are expecting Bush to clarify the American position on this.

Israel wants the president's promise to correspond to the facts on the ground, even before the final status settlement, so that there is an understanding that it can continue building in Ma'aleh Adumim, Ariel, Gush Etzion and the area around Jerusalem.

Mahmoud Abbas

Hamas leader Mahmoud a-Zahar told the Palestinian daily Al-Quds Sunday that continued Israeli construction in the settlement of Ma'aleh Adumim, east of Jerusalem, was a breach of a truce with Palestinian opposition groups, a truce that Israel considers an internal Palestinian matter.

A-Zahar refrained from threatening to resume violent acts against Israel over settlement expansion. Violent attacks, he said, would be resumed only if thousands of Jews visited Jerusalem's Temple Mount, holy to both Muslims and Jews.

In related developments, on Sunday, the Knesset rejected, by a vote of 72 to 39, a bill requiring a referendum on the government's disengagement plan from Gaza and four communities in the northern part of the West Bank.

One more budget hurdle

Israel's 2005 budget has advanced to the make-or-break full Knesset ratification vote. The Knesset finance committee approved the $61 billion (US) package by a 10-9 vote after a marathon debate last week. The Knesset was scheduled to vote on the budget March 29, but Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's majority in the Knesset is not assured. If the budget is not passed by month's end, the government could fall, a development the opponents of the Gaza withdrawal plan would welcome.

Crooning against conflict

Israeli and Palestinian musicians produced a bilingual song of peace. In My Heart, performed by Israeli folk singer David Broza and Palestinian singer Wisam Murad was to be broadcast simultaneously on Israeli Army Radio and Voice of Palestine Radio on Sunday. Commentators credited the initiative to the improved diplomatic mood in the area.

Language ruled threatening

Attorney General Menachem Mazuz ruled that a sticker reading "Rabin is waiting for Arik – the death penalty for traitors" constitutes incitement. The sticker refers to late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who was shot dead at a 1995 peace rally by extreme rightist Yigal Amir, and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, whose safety has been a cause for concern since the announcement of his plan to evacuate Gaza and parts of the northern West Bank. Jerusalem police have been instructed to open a case on the distributors of the stickers, which were first handed out at protest rally a month ago.

Bronfman buys Ikea Israel

Matthew Bronfman signed an agreement to buy the controlling share – 75 per cent – of Ikea Israel for $33 million (US). The deal was to be submitted to the courts for approval, which was expected this week. Earlier this year, Bronfman signed an agreement to buy the state's controlling interest in the Israel Discount Bank.

Shin Bet goes online

Israel's Shin Bet security service has launched a website. The domestic intelligence agency went online last week at www.shabak.gov.il. The Hebrew-only site contains information on the Shin Bet, as well as application forms for would-be agents interested in countering Palestinian terror or foreign spies, or in joining one of Israel's diplomatic bodyguard units.

Israeli terror victims visit Ireland as Irish fans flock to Israel for game

By JON IHLE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

DUBLIN— When they heard that Ireland would be playing Israel in a qualifying match for soccer's World Cup, thousands of Irish soccer-lovers rushed to book their Easter holidays in Tel Aviv.

Ireland is one of Europe's wettest countries, so the thought of supporting the "boys in green" in a land of warmth and sunshine was too good for many residents to pass up.

The Irish enthusiasm for sun and soccer also turned out to be a bit of good luck for a group of Israeli terror victims.

When Dublin's small Jewish community heard that return tickets on the fans' charter flights were very inexpensive, they organized to bring 20 Israelis to Ireland to celebrate Purim. The Israelis are involved with the Chabad Terror Victims Project.

Rabbi Zalman Lent, Dublin's Chabad rabbi, said he received a call from the managing director of Regent Tours, an English-language Israeli tour operator.

The man "said he was sending an empty plane from Tel Aviv and he offered us a very good price as a mitzvah," said Rabbi Lent, who works with visitors and young people. "We just had to raise the money and find host families."

The goal of the visit was twofold: Dublin's Jews hoped to give at least a small number of Israeli terror victims a short break in a peaceful environment, and they wanted to demonstrate support for Israel and its people.

It was a rare public gesture of solidarity with the Jewish state in an overwhelmingly Christian country, where Israel is often viewed with hostility and suspicion.

Indeed, in February, a Green Party representative to Ireland's parliament called for Irish players and fans to boycott the match to protest Israel's policies towards the Palestinians. Ireland's coach, Brian Kerr, rejected the idea.

The Israelis arrived in Ireland on March 23, the day before Purim, just before the Irish fans flew to Tel Aviv.

The next day, after a visit to the famous Guinness brewery at St. James's Gate in Dublin, the group toured the Wicklow Mountains and an ancient Christian monastic settlement at Glendalough.

There they were treated to the full range of Irish weather.

"There was 10 minutes of sun, then 10 minutes of rain, hail, sleet and snow," one visitor put it.

On March 24 the Israelis celebrated Purim with Dublin's Jewish community, which has been in slow decline for decades but turned out in great numbers and festive costumes to welcome the visitors.

"A lot of these people have no clue that there is a Jewish community here in Dublin," Rabbi Lent said. "Many were shocked that people here care enough to make an effort. It was very moving for them. When you meet victims of terror, you realize they are very traumatized people."

Though the father of Chaim Herzog, Israel's sixth president, was from Ireland, there are only about 1,000 Jews left in Dublin, and the community's means are limited. Despite their energy and enthusiasm, they could sponsor only a small number of visitors from Israel.

"We are in touch with about 2,000 families," said Rabbi Menachem Kuttner, director of activities for the Chabad Terror Victims Project. "We could have taken 1,000 to Ireland."

Instead, he continued, "I contacted those I knew would benefit most from a break."

That group included Avigail Levy, whose 17-year-old daughter Rachel was killed by a 17-year-old female Palestinian suicide bomber at a Jerusalem supermarket.

Levy wears a necklace with a silver heart bearing Rachel's image. In the three years since her daughter was buried, she has gone to the grave every day. Her trip to Ireland was the first break in that routine.

Idan Levy – who is not related to Avigail or Rachel – was another member of the Israeli group. He sustained burns over half his body when a suicide bomber from the United Kingdom attacked Mike's Place, a Tel Aviv bar, two years ago.

Levy was 18 years old at the time. Since then, he has had to wear prosthetic skin over his torso and arms.

Terror victims' stories generally reach Ireland only in abstract news reports, so meeting the Israelis was moving experience for Dublin's Jews.

"There have been quite a few emotional moments over the last few days," Itai Pront of Dublin said.

A Shabbat reading by Dvil Kinarty, a 10-year-old who was hit by three bullets two years ago when the car he was travelling in was attacked on its way from Jerusalem to the West Bank settlement of Ma'aleh Ephraim, brought the congregation to tears.

"This is my first time outside Israel, if you don't count the Yom Kippur War," said Ya'akov Kinarty, Dvil's father. "For me it wasn't easy to decide to go, but I understood this as sort of a mission.

"It has given us a very warm feeling to meet them, and also to meet with these other Israelis. People in such agony need people to listen to them, especially other victims," he continued.

"I hope coming here gave people a rest, but also gave those living here a feeling for our lives. As Jews, they're a part of the story too."

Ironically, the visitors and their hosts were not able to watch the Ireland-Israel match live on TV Saturday afternoon. The two-hour time difference between the countries meant the game was played while it was still Shabbat in Ireland.

As citizens of this great country, we take great pride in our country and the opportunities for religious freedom it has afforded us.

We are therefore deeply pained by the necessity to take a public stance against the government's proposal to sanction same-sex marriage.

Judaism affirms the integrity and sanctity of marriage, which has been the bedrock of civilization and traditional morality for thousands of years.

We hereby state, clearly and without qualification, that the Torah sanctions only the union of a man and woman in matrimony.

Jews who value the divine Torah and its ideals, carefully transmitted over the ages, know that nothing is more important than to be willing to stand apart from society's shifting mores.

As much as the world around us may evolve or devolve, we are heirs to a timeless religious and moral tradition.

Gadhafi attacks Palestinians and Israelis at Arab League summit

By YOAV STERN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Tunisia, Algeria and Sudan were appointed by the Arab League at its Algerian summit last week to a committee to monitor the Arab peace initiative during the coming year. Algeria hosted this year's summit, Tunisia hosted the last one and Sudan has been chosen to host next year's.

The initiative calls for the full normalization of ties with Israel in exchange for an Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 borders, the establishment of a Palestinian state and a resolution of the Palestinian refugee issue, including the "right of return."

The proposal to form the committee sparked some rather undiplomatic exchanges at the summit.

Syrian President Bashar Assad suggested that Syria, Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority be on the committee. "After all, it is our land," he said. But Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said that would not be logical. "They will be stronger defending Arab interests without Syria and Lebanon," he said.

Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi turned to the Palestinian delegation and said, "Don't be angry brother Abu Mazen [Palestinian Authority leader], but I think the Palestinians and Israelis are stupid." He said that Israelis were wrong to try to hold on to the West Bank in the face of Palestinian attacks and Palestinians were wrong not to have set up their own state after 1948, and reiterated his call for a single state solution, "Israstine," for Israelis and Palestinians.

The Palestinian Authority on Thursday demanded an apology from Gadhafi for saying Palestinians were "idiots" in seeking their own state alongside Israel. "[We] have asked President Gadhafi to apologize to the Palestinian people for words... that offended the feelings of all Palestinians, Arabs and Muslims," Tayeb Abdel Rahim, secretary general of the Fatah Central Committee, said in a statement. "These remarks should not have been made by an Arab president at a summit conference and also contradicted the summit's resolutions."

At the summit, Gadhafi also said that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon must be working for the Palestinians, "because he does things that get dozens and hundreds of Israelis killed" by Palestinians.

Gadhafi also said Israelis were idiots because they declared a state but never showed any real interest in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Asked about the "idiot" reference, foreign ministry spokesperson Mark Regev said: "It takes one to know one."

At the summit, Gadhafi shocked the Arab leaders by saying, "Terror is identified with Islam." He dismissed the argument that poverty is at the root of violence by Islamists, and put the blame on "oppression, injustice, arrogance, insults, contempt and the humiliation of this [Arab] nation."

A communiqué read at the final session of the summit in Algiers by Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa said that peace was the Arabs' "strategic option" to settle the Arab-Israeli conflict. "[We] affirm in this context the Arab peace initiative approved by the Arab summit in Beirut in 2002," the communiqué said. The Beirut initiative was originally proposed by Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah.

> 'Israel regretted that the summit had not proposed dialogue'

Regev said the reference to peace as a strategic option was positive but that Israel regretted that the summit had not proposed dialogue. "From our first reading... it would appear that not much is new. We are disappointed that nothing was done to put substance behind that statement [on strategic option]."

Moussa said, "We don't see any reason for a rush [to normal relations]. Israel is still building settlements and the [West Bank] barrier. They don't deserve anything... If they had taken any step, we would have taken a step."

Lebanese Foreign Minister Mahmoud Hammoud said, "We are not thinking of normalization, neither now nor in the future. There is the Arab peace initiative, which everyone is committed to. If it's implemented in its stages, then we will cross that bridge [normalization] when we come to it."

The summit was hardly a decisive moment in modern Arab history. It was essentially silent or rehashed old statements on some of the region's most burning issues.

There was no new initiative for peace with Israel and no real signs that they want to be engines for democratic reform. Instead of joining the international push to get Syria out of Lebanon, the summit closed with a statement backing Damascus against U.S. sanctions.

Summit participants acknowledged the disconnect between ordinary Arabs' desire for progress and some of their leaders' resistance to change. "When we look at what will be achieved during this summit versus the ambitions on the Arab street, we find that we are still very much at the beginning of the road," said Sudan's Foreign Minister Mustafa Osman Ismail.

The summit also called for an end to foreign occupation in Iraq – but said nothing about Iraq's calls for its Arab neighbours to do more to stop combatants from crossing their borders to join the fighting in that country.

Analysts said Arab leaders fear that if they shine the spotlight on others, their own problems may be exposed next. "We heard the words Palestine, Iraq, Sudan and even Lebanon... We heard the words reform, confronting extremism and combatting terrorism," wrote columnist Sahar Baasiri in the Lebanese daily An-Nahar. "But the words were more a description of the status quo and a list of [Arab] woes, old positions and aspirations."

'A compromised life is still a life'

a Jewish perspective: The most important point from a halachic standpoint is that a compromised life is still a life."

"In the Schiavo case, you're not dealing with a patient in extremis," he said, noting that until her feeding tube was removed, Schiavo was not dying.

In Halachah, there is a category for a person at the edge of death; the rules for such a person, called a goses, are complicated.

"There are times when certain medical intervention is halachically contraindicated," Rabbi Shafran said. "There may be times when it's OK not to shock a heart back into beating, not to administer certain drugs. You do not prolong the act of dying."

But Schiavo was not a goses, Rabbi Shafran said. Instead, before the tube was removed she "had the exact same halachic status as a baby or a demented person. Like a baby, she was helpless, could not feed herself and was not able to communicate in any meaningful way. But a life is a life."

Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb, executive vice-president of the Orthodox Union, the central arm of modern Orthodoxy, agreed that from a halachic perspective the Schiavo case is straightforward.

"It's not permitted to do anything actively that would stop the process of a person's staying alive," he said.

"In this case, that would be withdrawing a feeding tube, which is tantamount to starving a person to death."

Like Shafran, Rabbi Weinreb said the wishes of the patient or the family are not relevant.

"It might have a bearing on whether new measures are undertaken, but once a person is on a support system, removing it is not possible," Rabbi Weinreb said.

"Doing something to actively interfere with a person's ability to continue to live technically is murder," he said. "I can't imagine a scenario that would make removing the feeding tube permissible."

Rabbi David Feldman, who had an Orthodox ordination and defines himself as "traditional," is rabbi emeritus of the Conservadox Jewish Center of Teaneck, N.J.

"There's a dispute here between a husband and parents, but none of that makes any difference as far as Halachah is concerned," said Rabbi Feldman, the author of Birth Control and Abortion in Jewish Law and the dean of the Jewish Institute of Bioethics. "You can't hasten death yourself, with your own hands. If death comes, you can thank God because it's a relief, but you can't decide yourself that it has to be done."

The only time it would be acceptable to remove a medical device, Rabbi Feldman said, would be if "something worse would happen – if leaving it in would cause infection, or more pain.

"You can kill someone pursuing you, you can kill the soldier in the enemy army, maybe very cautiously you can kill if there is a death penalty, but you can't kill an innocent person because of illness," he said.

Rabbi Joel Roth is a member of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly's law committee. In 1990, when he was the committee's chair, the group studied end-stage medical care and accepted two opposing positions on artificial nutrition and hydration.

One, by Rabbi Elliot Dorff, "would permit withholding and withdrawing" the tube; the other, by Rabbi Avraham Reisner, would not.

The divide comes from how the tube that provides food and water is defined. If it is seen as a medical device, as Rabbi Dorff does, it may be removed, Rabbi Roth said. If it is seen as a feeding device, as Rabbi Reisner does, it may not be removed.

Rabbi Dorff puts a person dependent on a feeding tube "in the halachic category of 'treifah,' which, he argues, is a life that does not require our full protection – an animal that is treifah is one that has some kind of physical defect that will prohibit it from having a prolonged life. So he argues that a treifah is a life that does not require our full protection," Rabbi Roth said.

Rabbi Reisner, on the other hand, "treats these people as goses," Rabbi Roth said.

"And even in the end stage," he noted, "there is the value of 'chaya sha'ah,' the life of the hour." In other words, Roth said, even when there is very little life left, that life still matters.

The Conservative movement accepts both decisions, but Rabbi Roth, a professor of talmud and Jewish law at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, sides with Rabbi Reisner, and with Schiavo's parents.

"She should be kept on the feeding tube," he said last week. "She's not being medicated and she's breathing on her own."

Rabbi Mark Washofsky teaches rabbinics at the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati, and he sits on the movement's responsa committee.

The movement does not speak with one voice on the issue, Rabbi Washofsky said, but in 1994 it issued a responsa on the treatment of terminally ill patients.

Like the Conservative decisors, the Reform rabbis base their view of whether a feeding tube can be removed on their understanding of the tube's function.

"We cannot claim that Jewish tradition categorically prohibits the removal of food and water from dying patients," Rabbi Washofsky said. "But we consider food and water, no matter how they are delivered, the staff of life. So what we ultimately do is express deep reservations about their withdrawal, but in the end we say nonetheless that because we cannot declare that the cessation of artificial nutrition and hydration is categorically forbidden by Jewish moral thought, the patient and the family must ultimately let their consciences guide them."

Rabbi David Teutsch, director of the Center for Jewish Ethics at the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in Philadelphia, agrees that the question is how a feeding tube is defined.

"If it were a form of eating, a position held by a number of more traditional halachic authorities, then you're required to feed those who are hungry," Rabbi Teutsch said. "But if it's medicine – a position held by Conservative authorities like Rabbi Elliott Dorff, and by me as well – then you serve the interests of the patient, which may involve not providing medicine."

He believes that a feeding tube is a medical device, and so it can be removed, Rabbi Teutsch said.

"It's pretty clear that it's closer to regular intervention than to eating," he said.

Novelist recreates Spadina Avenue in the 1930s

The Secret Mitzvah of Lucio Burke* by Steven Hayward, Knopf.

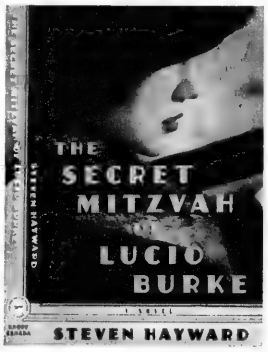
By NORMAN RAVVIN

In his eminently readable posthumous memoir, Typing: A Life in 26 Keys, Matt Cohen gave Spadina Avenue its due as Toronto's "cosmic spine." Recalling his introduction to the street in the mid-1960s, Cohen celebrates such bygone landmarks as the Crest Grill, Switzer's diner and the Spadina Avenue funeral chapel where he attended his grandfather's funeral. Typing attracted some lukewarm reviews, and few took note of the Jewish flavour of Cohen's downtown memories.

One young writer with a keen sense of the street's Jewish pedigree is Steven Hayward, whose new novel, The Secret Mitzvah of Lucio Burke, is among the best novels of Toronto's downtown. It is a comic novel, told largely from the point of view of children and adolescents, who operate, as often as not, out of earshot of their parents, a bit like the inhabitants of Charles Schulz's Peanuts comic strip. But true to their time – the early 1930s – Hayward's characters grow up fast in the shadow of the Depression, the rise of fascism in Europe, and the demanding, sometimes farcical strictures of a city undergoing the rise of what would be called, 40 years down the line, multiculturalism.

Hayward's unusual perspective comes about as he turns the immigrant novel on its head, shifting seamlessly from Jewish, to Italian, to Irish viewpoints, with a minor nod to Toronto's Chinese community. He is a writer with a great ear for dialogue, and a willingness to turn immigrant Englishisms to comic purpose. When one young son of Italian newcomers accuses his friend of falling under the sway of "the communism", the character being tagged a Commie is as anxious to correct his compatriot's use of the definite article as he is concerned about political name-calling.

The narrative arc of The Secret Mitzvah of Lucio Burke has a serious goal. The novel does not focus at great length on anti-Semitism, but its final chapters convey the impact, in 1933, of youth groups sporting swastikas as they march through Jewish neighbourhoods. It is this provocation that led to the notorious Christie Pits riot. Karen Tulchinsky's recent novel, The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky, also uses the riot in its narrative climax. And Tulchinsky's book, like Hayward's, is an immigrant novel of 1930s Toronto. But she is not as successful at integrating the riot into her broader narrative. One of Hayward's key decisions is to make baseball a main theme – often one of comic relief – so he builds a natural link between his characters and the Christie Pits mayhem, which erupted at a baseball game.



Hayward has the ease and charm of an old-fashioned storyteller. But his fiction also has a cinematic quality. The immigrant neighbourhoods around Spadina and College Street come sharply into focus. Of the Italians nearby on Clinton, he writes: "Nearly all the boarders in the Clinton houses are male, unskilled labourers from the south of Italy who have come to Canada to work laying bricks or spreading tar on roads or digging ditches."

Of Spadina, which was the Jewish Main, he sketches the "semi-legal, non-unionized sweatshops," where working girls endure "the numbingly monotonous sound, the crushing sameness of posture and task" associated with box-making and garment manufacture. He even manages to convey the peculiar effect of a transplanted brutality like Italian fascism on Canadian ground. As would-be black shirts march down College Street, people "come out to look, but they weren't afraid."

In these fine details Hayward merges his comic urge with the serious challenge of remembering a time and place in all its particularity and texture. Here, he joins Matt Cohen, and a few of the other great remembers of Spadina's past. Among these is Isaac Bashevis Singer, who wrote of Spadina when he passed through Toronto in order to recross the American border and claim full residency in the United States.

"I was told that Spadina Avenue was the center of Yiddishism in Toronto," Singer writes in his memoir Love and Exile, "and there we went."

In Singer's view, what the Avenue has to offer is a second-rate imitation of the Jewish streets he'd abandoned in Warsaw. Still, he recognized the Avenue's possibilities: "I could have become a teacher, a writer for a local periodical, or at least a proof-reader." He imagines himself disappearing into the hullabaloo of the "Canadian version of the Warsaw Writers' Club."

Hayward's accomplishment is the recovery of an era and place with humour and empathy, and, like Singer, a minimum of sentimentality. The Secret Mitzvah of Lucio Burke is a fine, funny novel, which focuses on a lost time when Spadina, as Matt Cohen would have it, was at "the centre of the universe."

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is Lola by Night. He is co-editor of The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader and is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Classical music 'not a stuffy old pastime'

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Violinist Joshua Bell counts Toronto Symphony Orchestra music director Peter Oundjian – a violinist himself – as a good friend.

The two have played chamber music together, but Bell has yet to perform with Oundjian since he became maestro of the TSO. This will change on April 6 and 7 at 8 p.m., when they perform as part of the inaugural New Creations Festival at Roy Thomson Hall.

Bell, 37, a Bloomington, Ind., native now living in New York City has played with the TSO on numerous occasions, usually performing standard pieces, or what he calls "warhorses" such as Tchaikovsky or Mendelssohn.

"This time I'm bringing a new piece that was written for me by Behzad Ranjbaran, a Persian composer that I went to school with at Indiana University. He just took it upon himself to write me this concerto," Bell says.

"He wrote it about 10 years ago and I finally got around finding the time to learn it, playing it and performing it two years ago – but, I only performed it once, in England. Toronto will be the Canadian premiere. It is a wonderful melodic and exciting virtuosic piece. Some people get scared when they hear modern pieces, but this one is very much audience friendly. It is a lot of fun to play."

Bell will be the guest artist on the last two days of the New Creations Festival – Oundjian's brainchild, which began March 30 with guest violinist Pinchas Zukerman. Each evening's festivities include a concert dedicated to new musical works and a post-show party.

Keeping to the theme of new works, the TSO has enlisted the Ontario College of Art and Design to create cutting-edge art to be displayed in the concert hall's lobby during thé festival.

Bell has played violin since age four. He inherited his talent from his musical parents, who both make their living in the field of psychology. His Jewish mother is a pianist, while his father, a violinist and singer,was a choirboy and then a priest in the Episcopalian church – which he left to marry Bell's mother.

"I have a cultural connection to Judaism and I'm very close to the Jewish side of my family, some of which lives in Toronto. My uncle, Irving Zeitlin is retired, but was a professor at the University of Toronto."

The single violinist, who People Magazine called one of the "50 Most Beautiful People in the World," feels that as long as the integrity of the music is kept intact, modern marketing is necessary to spread the word that listening to classical music is not a stuffy old pastime.

Bell performs 120 concerts a year. He has just released a CD Romance of the Violin on Sony Classical. His next release will be the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with the Berlin Philharmonic. Next year, his plans include recording a followup CD to Romance of the Violin.

Many will remember Bell's music soundtrack in the critically acclaimed film The Red Violin, in which he also worked as a body double for a character called Pope, who was a violin virtuoso. For fun, he did a bit part lasting three seconds on screen, but although he does have movie star looks, he says he has no aspirations to act.

This spring, you can hear him once again in the movie Ladies in Lavender, starring British actress Judy Dench and Maggie Smith.

More information about Bell is available on his website at www.joshuabell.com.

Bell promises to make himself available after both his Toronto concerts to sign his CDs. For tickets to New Creations Festival, call the Roy Thomson Hall box office at 416-593-4828, or visit www.newcreationsfestival.com. Tickets are $27 to $105, while post-show party passes cost $10 more.

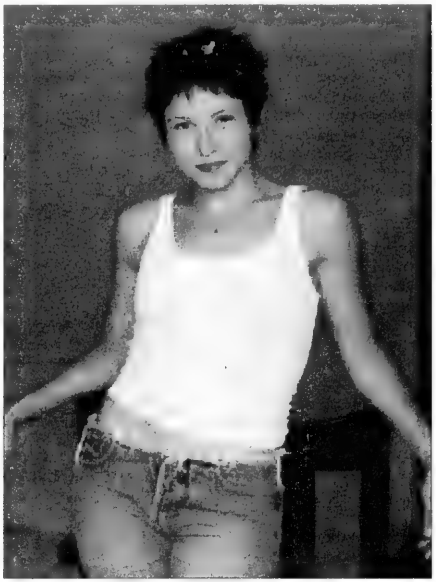
Podemski featured in play about intimacy and pornography

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Tamara Podemski burst into laughter when she started reading the script for The Dirty/Beautiful, and from that moment on she relished the opportunity to perform a risqué role on stage.



Tamara Podemski
[Tim Leyes photo]

Her character, Lisa, is the girl next door on the outside. But after years of boredom in the bedroom with husband Mike, the sexually charged woman resolves to spice things up.

It's a unique role for this Toronto actress, singer and songwriter who has toiled in the performance arts business since she was nine.

"I started my career as a child actor and it's been really difficult for people to see me as a woman," says the 27-year-old, who has an aboriginal mother and Jewish father.

"It was really great to be able to play a woman who has real women problems."

Written by Stephen Massicotte and directed by Jim Millan, the play is billed as a black comedy that explores, among other things, the fine line between beauty and bawdy.

The other feature characters, Tim and Trish, run into humorous, though significant relationship issues over Tim's employment at a porn shop.

The show runs from March 30 to April 17 at Buddies in Bad Times Theatre in Toronto.

Throughout the months of rehearsals, Podemski says she found herself drawing on real-life experiences in order to bring the character to life.

"The play is more of a philosophical debate about pornography, intimacy and relationships and [because] those are pretty deep issues, you have to tap into your own life experience and share that with the cast," she says.

"It's almost been like therapy, every day."

What was particularly empowering for Podemski was posing for the play's poster, which showcases the attractive performer in her undergarments.

"I've been involved in provocative work before, but never in anything where I've been so exposed, physically and emotionally," she reflects.

"I'm so proud of myself that I was able to do it."

Podemski emphasizes the play is not gratuitous and that audiences will walk away with some serious issues to ponder.

"I think it's a really important message to challenge our ideas of intimacy, honesty and vulnerability," she says.

"It will either encourage [audiences] to talk or it will remind them why they don't talk and make them face their own issues, not just with their partners, but with themselves."

In addition to gearing up for the big show, Podemski is recording her third music album, to be released in the summer or fall.

Unlike the first two albums, which were written in Ojibway, the upcoming album is in English and Podemski will release it under her own record label, Mukwa Music.

"The first two albums were done by record labels that brought me in as a hired gun. Even though I wrote the songs, I was really satisfying someone else's quota," she laments.

"Whereas this time… I just did it by myself."

Podemski describes the assortment of songs on the album as pop rock and says the lyrics are deeply personal. "It's an album of such hope, faith, reason and purpose for living," she says.

"These are the songs I wrote to help get me through my life… It's a really empowering album and extremely passionate."

In February, she gave fans a glimpse of what to expect by launching a preview music video entitled Meegwetch on Bravo Television.

"What actually comes out is a short, artistic film, rather than a typical music video," she says.

While her professional plate sounds as if it's full, the scholar in Podemski is still very much alive, and as time permits, she takes classes at the University of Toronto in pursuit of a degree in Hebrew language and literature and aboriginal studies.

"I have three credits to go," she says. "I'm thinking that when I finish, I'll continue taking courses because there are so many cool things to learn. But I will stand there one day with that degree in my hand."

For tickets, contact the Buddies in Bad Time box office at 416-975-8555.

Shopping Channel host records a jazz CD

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

Jazz singer Rosanne Agasee puts a new twist on the saying, "She knows how to sell a song!"

As a full-time host on the Shopping Channel, Agasee more often finds herself selling fitness equipment and jewelry. But having recently completed her first full-length jazz CD, she's now marketing a completely different product – her voice.

And like many good salespeople, Agasee has already found that a little luck and good timing can make all the difference.

"I went into the studio to record a three-song demo," she says. She intended to send the demo CD around to clubs so that she could be invited to perform on a regular basis. But then, "one of the major recording labels was in the studio three weeks after and liked what they heard. We met, and while they didn't offer me a recording deal, they were very encouraging. They encouraged me to record a full-length CD."

Agasee began working with producer Doug Riley, who has produced albums for Ray Charles and Anne Murray. He brought in the other musicians she needed to record the 12-track CD.

"They're all so immensely talented," Agasee says. "I was so lucky to work with them. There I was in the studio with these people – I felt like a little pisher!"

The album is a collection of jazz standards, such as Gershwin's Summertime and I've Got A Crush On You, as well as some less traditional jazz songs by Steely Dan and Sting. Agasee's voice has a deep, smoky quality, which is highlighted particularly on the slower, relaxed numbers.

Exploring jazz music was a natural choice for Agasee.

"That's what I feel I can sing. That's what I've always felt I could sing," she says. "I grew up in a household where my parents listened to Al Jolson and Frank Sinatra. My mother sings – she has a beautiful voice. That's had a huge impact on me."

Performing in front of a live audience doesn't faze Agasee. She does live TV everyday. Having worked at the Shopping Channel since early 1999, and having volunteered as a host for Rogers Cable before that, Agasee says she's very comfortable in front of the camera. But singing on stage is a different kind of performance.

"I really like that outlet. I find it very creative," she says. "I feel really great when I'm on stage."

However, since she began recording the CD, she hasn't had many opportunities to hit the nightclub scene. She sang in the recent jazz festival at Toronto's Orbit Room, and is now preparing for her CD launch party in early spring. Agasee says she's prepared to launch her CD independently if she doesn't have a record label.

"Response for advance copies of the CD has been wonderful," she says.

Eye on Arts

NOVEL BY BEN LAPPIN, FORMER CONGRESS OFFICIAL, PUBLISHED POSTHUMOUSLY

Ben Lappin, a former Toronto-based director of the central region of the Canadian Jewish Congress, left behind an unfinished novel when he died in Israel in 2001. The book, The Honorary Survivor, was recently published by the King's College Press of London, England.

Although he did not quite complete the manuscript, he left a detailed prospectus for its conclusion, which has been included as a final chapter. "In publishing the book, my family and I are realizing part of the wonderful inheritance that he has left us," said his son, Shalom Lappin.

The novel, which reflects many of Lappin's own experiences, moves between Poland, where he was born and lived as a small child; Canada, where he grew up; and Israel, where he spent his last 30 years.

The author's widow, Addah Lappin of Netanya, penned an elegant preface in which she briefly recounted his career. As a Congress official, he was instrumental in bringing 1,250 Jewish war orphans to Canada, some of whose stories appear in the novel. Among his formative experiences was a stint at the Yiddishe Zhurnal.

"Ben undertook this novel in his latter years," Addah wrote. "He had published stories, professional articles and books throughout his long career, but had never undertaken the daunting task of a novel. The characters are, of course, fictional, but also based on people he knew and on himself."

The Honorary Survivor is available online from the King's College Press of London.

Shopping Channel host markets her own voice on new jazz CD

However, she's not giving up her day job just yet. Agasee described working for the Shopping Channel as a "wonderful job."

"I'm not all that comfortable with selling," she admits. "But on air you have the opportunity to do things other than selling – like presenting and entertaining."

Agasee hosts live on air, and while the nature of the work is unpredictable, she says she likes the challenge.

"We mess up a lot and it's funny. People are always calling in and you don't know what they'll say!" she says.

Agasee grew up in Toronto, attending Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue with her parents. The single mother of two children – nine and six years old – describes herself as "very comfortable in my skin as a Jew." She's done volunteer work for Out of the Cold, and often hosts Shabbat dinners for her friends.

While she says she'd like to be more involved in the community, her spare time is currently being taken up with promoting her CD. Asked where she'd like to see her music take her, she responds with a laugh, "To Carnegie Hall!"

"There's no point trying to get this thing out there and to think small," she continues. "This is a gorgeous selection of music and I'd love to have it everywhere."

Then, reflecting on her musical journey so far, she says, "Everything came at its own time for me. Timing wise, luck wise, it's all been working. I hope it continues. I hope this wasn't my only chance."

Irreverent musician blends klezmer, punk and Judaism

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Watching Vancouver's Geoff Berner violently pull apart his accordion while screaming about liquor and Judaism won't win this self-described "klezmerpunk" any bar mitzvah gigs – but they wouldn't want him, this isn't your grandparents' music.

Besides not hearing klezmer punk at a bar mitzvah, you won't hear it at a wedding and definitely not at a synagogue function. The only place to hear this peculiar genre mash-up is in Canada's bars, coming from Geoff Berner's mouth.

Berner's unique marriage of klezmer's melodies with punk rock's emotion originated 13 years ago after a friend gave him an accordion. Little did Berner know that he was about to embark on a cultural and religious journey that would culminate with booze-fuelled songs about being Jewish.

Vancouver's Geoff Berner

Throughout his youth, Berner's Judaism was negligible, but once he discovered klezmer his dormant religion came roaring back.

"In my late 20s as the music came back to me, some of the ideas and the ethics and the ways of thinking came back to me," he says. "I really liked them and they're part of me. Now I've decided that I'm an 'ultra reform' Jew."

A religious awakening spurred on by music isn't anything new. What is novel is Berner's fusion of klezmer and punk. While that combination might sound strange on paper, it only takes one listen of his latest disc, Whisky Rabbi, to realize that this blend makes perfect sense. How did this traditional Jewish genre and an anarchist guitar-driven form of rock come together? Berner says he was just reclaiming his roots.

"People who were more rootsy or alt country were people who were reclaiming their heritage. By taking country music and marrying it with their punk-rock esthetic, they made it into something good again. It seemed like something I ought to be doing with music from my heritage."

Since his parents didn't play any klezmer in their home, Berner says his first introduction to the genre came in synagogue.

"The sacred melodies in synagogue have a lot in common with klezmer. The modes are the same," he says.

While Saturdays in shul taught Berner klezmer's melodic roots, it was a trip to Romania with an accomplished klezmer musician that showed him that punk rock's intensity naturally fit with this brand of Jewish music.

Last summer, Berner met up with his mentor, multi-instrumentalist Bob Cohen from the New York klezmer group Di Naye Kapelye, in Romania. The two travelled around the country, listening to all sorts of klezmer and learning about the genre's history.

While Berner leaned a lot about klezmer, one thing that struck him were the differences between Jewish, Gypsy and Romanian forms of music.

"[The Jewish way] has more emphasis on melody and simplifying the melody," he says. "The whole region had this feel for music that was like punk rock. It's emotional expression over technical perfection."

And that's how punk and klezmer can work. Berner found that the proficient Romanian musicians he saw would let their precision slide into the punk rock trait of imperfection.

"Even though these were amazing players, there was not a lot of finesse going on when they got into it. The singing is the same. When you get into it, you don't worry so much about pitch, you worry about getting it across."

After returning to British Columbia, Berner felt confident that rocking out on the accordion was the way to go.

"[The trip] reinforced my prejudices about how the music should be played," he says. "I always thought the music should be played with guts and dirt. I heard these [klezmer] recordings that were played perfectly by jazz-school guys, with perfect pitch and perfect tone. I always listened to that kind of stuff and thought 'this is garbage. I don't feel a thing.' It made me more confident about that."

On Whisky Rabbi, Berner's second full-length disc, the 33-year-old is far from perfect. His punk-rock yell and indie rock vocals wouldn't gel with your baba's music — this isn't A Yiddishe Mama he's singing — but it complements the "guts and dirt" of his klez-punk melodies and easily gets his vivid stories across.

Two of Berner's favourite topics to sing about are booze and Jews. Historically, punk has discussed some controversial topics and Berner follows suit with his take on everything from the Holocaust to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"This record is partly about drawing connections between Jews and other landless or kicked-around people like the Palestinians and Gypsies," he says. "We have a lot in common in terms of experiences as people. We've all been told we'd be written out of history."

In the song The Violins – Al Kamanjaat, Berner sings lyrics written by Muslim poet Mahmoud Darwich, which recall a time when Jews and Muslims were simultaneously kicked out of Spain.

"We were both expelled by fundamentalists," says Berner. "We have this shared story of being oppressed together, so that's what I'm trying to talk about."

Obsessively writing about alcohol – from the title (and title track) of his latest CD to lines like "if I had my way I'd stay drunk all day" – is just another way of connecting with his heritage.

"Booze and folk music go together. You can't have a party without booze," he says.

"I feel that [alcohol] has been extremely de-emphasized [in Jewish music], that it would make the music less legitimate if we allowed alcohol to be involved. There are all sorts of traditional songs about how the whisky made the parents get along and made them able to sign the marriage contract. And on the wedding night they didn't know what to do until they had a bottle of whisky."

Klezmer, punk, liquor and Judaism– this bizarre combination has gotten hipster kids and open-minded adults flocking to Berner's shows, but the rest of the music industry has had a hard time taking him seriously.

"I have been resigned to the fact that a lot of festivals will say you've got to be joking. About one in 10 say we get it, the rest of them say, 'we can't put that in front of people.'"

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the CIC, said that at an especially difficult time, when Israelis "are immersed in a gut-wrenching internal process" related to disengaging from Gaza, it is "difficult to understand why Canada would feel it useful to comment on a plan that dates back to [former Israeli prime minister] Yitzhak Rabin's administration and which has not received cabinet approval."

Ma'aleh Adumim, Fogel continued, "is a thriving community within the national capital region and surely there has to be some recognition of the demands to respond to the pressures of natural growth.

"Given the traumatic sacrifices being undertaken voluntarily by Israel, one would think that Canada would focus its interventions on seeking reciprocity from the Palestinian Authority to maintain positive momentum, or at a minimum, to expressing support for Israel [for] taking some courageous and difficult decisions to advance peace."

BASKETBALL TOURNEY: Earlier this month, the boys and girls middle school basketball teams from the Conservative Movement-affiliated Schechter schools in Toronto (United Synagogue Day School), Chicago, Detroit and Pittsburgh met in Cleveland to compete in the First Annual Great Lakes Schechter Showdown. Along with athletic activities, more than 100 athletes, student managers, coaches and chaperones convened for a Friday evening service and dinner, followed by a student-run service the next morning. In the tournament, the USDS all-star team beat the host team from Cleveland by 18 points. Seen are, top row from left, Michael Yakubowicz, Ron Goldkind, Jake Berzen, David Herman, Mendy Weisbrod, Daniel Axelrod, Daniel Draper, Brandon Saltzman and Brian Saltzman; middle row, Alex Bogach, Russell Budd, Josh Gladstone, Eliot Fenwick, Ethan Cohen and Josh Stern; and front row, Josh Kohn, Max Saltzman and Daniel Viner.

Great athletes featured in Jewish Sports Legends

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

There is a glaring misconception that Jews do not excel in sports. Phrases such as "My son the doctor" or "My son the lawyer," generally ascribed to boastful Jewish mothers who've achieved their life's ambition, reinforce that hoary myth.

But the fact of the matter is that Jews have figured prominently in sports over the past century.

Think of Louis Rubenstein, the Canadian figure skater; Lipman Pike, the first professional baseball player in the United States; Mark Spitz, probably the greatest swimmer of all time; Benny Leonard, one of the finest boxers ever to step into a ring; or Agnes Keleti, the Hungarian gymnast who won 11 medals at the Olympics.

If this is a subject that interests you, look no further than the third edition of Jewish Sports Legends, which, though published in 2000, is still in print. The author, Joseph Siegman, is a former Maccabiah Games athlete and the founder of the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Netanya, Israel.

This encyclopedic and lavishly illustrated volume, which is published by Brassey's and distributed by the Jewish Publication Society in Philadelphia, contains hundreds of brief biographies.

It covers a dizzying array of sports, from basketball, fencing and football to gymnastics, hockey and track and field. And in the back of the book, you'll find a complete list of Jewish Olympic medalists since 1896.

Flipping through its large-format pages, I was amazed by the success Jews have achieved in sports, and conversely, puzzled by the persistent fable that denies or downplays Jewish accomplishments in this field.

Under auto racing, a pastime usually not associated with Jews, I found Jody Scheckter's biography. In case you didn't know, the South African-born race driver, who retired at 30, won the Formula One World Championship in 1979.

Turning to baseball, I read the bios of Harry "The Horse" Danning, the all star catcher who played for the New York Giants; Henry "Hank" Greenberg, one of baseball's greatest right-handed hitters; Sanford "Sandy" Koufax, the first pitcher to hurl four no-hit games; and Pike, baseball's first pro in 1866.

In basketball, there was Arnold "Red" Auerbach, the head coach of the Boston Celtics; Adolph "Dolph" Schayes, the National Basketball Association star; Alexander Gomelsky, the father of basketball in the Soviet Union; Nat Holman, the youngest college coach in the United States; and Abe Saperstein the founder, owner and coach of the legendary Harlem Globetrotters.

Under the category of boxing, names such as Samuel Berger, the first Olympic heavyweight champion; Daniel Mendoza, the first Jewish prize-fighter to become a champion; and Maxie "Slapsie Maxie" Rosenbloom, a world light-heavyweight champ, came up.

Fencing – a sports in which Jews have been outstanding – featured, among others, Albert Axelrod of the United States and Sandor Gombos of Hungary.

Figure skaters meriting attention included Gennadi Karponosov – the gold medalist at the 1978 World Championships – and, of course, Canada's Rubenstein, the Montrealer who blazed to a gold medal in the first World Figure Skating Championships.

In American football, Benny Friedman of the University of Michigan was one of its first great passers, Sid Gilman was the first head coach to win divisional titles in both the NFL and AFL, and Sid Luckman quarterbacked the Chicago Bears to four NFL championships.

Reaching gymnastics, I read about the exploits of Alfred Flatow, who won three gold medals for Germany at the first modern Olympic Games in Athens, and Keleti, who ranks third among women athletes for most Olympic medals.

Horse racing yielded Hirsch Jacobs, one of its stellar trainers and breeders, and Walter Miller, perhaps the greatest jockey of the early 20th century.

Hockey had only two entries – Nikolay Epshtein, the Soviet coach who developed a crop of excellent players, and Cecil Hart, a direct descendant of Canada's first known Jewish settler and the manager of the Montreal Canadiens for eight full seasons.

There was also a chapter on the media. Among the figures in it were Jesse Abramson, the track and field journalist; sportscasters Mel Allen and Howard Cosell; Red Fisher, the Montreal sportswriter/editor; and Nat Fleischer, the founder of The Ring magazine.

In swimming, William Bachrach's name looms large. He coached U.S. teams that captured 23 gold medals in two Olympics. Siegman also includes Spitz, an American who won a record seven gold medals at the 1972 Games, and Eva Szekely, a Hungarian who set 10 world and five Olympic records.

Table tennis today is dominated by China. But in the 1950s, Angelica Adelstein-Rozeanu of Romania was virtually unbeatable, and from 1936 onward, Richard Bergmann of Austria and Britain held several world titles.

Tennis gave us Angela Buxton, a Briton who won the Wimbeldon doubles championship with Athlea Gibson; Julie Heldman, an American who made the top 10 rankings four times; Umberto Louis de Morpurgo, an Italian ranked number 1 in his country; and Richard Savitt, an American who won the Wimbeldon and Australian singles championships.

Jews have been quite prominent in track and field, the premiere event in the summer Olympics.

Harold Maurice Abrahams of Britain, whose story was told in the film Chariots of Fire, was the gold medalist in the 100-metre dash at the 1924 Paris Games. Gerald Ashworth picked up gold as the United States placed first in the 4x100 relay race. In an unprecedented feat, sprinter Irena Kirszenstein-Szewinska of Poland captured medals in four consecutive Olympics. Fanny "Bobbie" Rosenfeld of Canada, a renowned sprinter, was a gold and silver medalist in the 1928 Games, and was elected to the Canadian Sports Hall of Fame.

Wrestling produced a succession of Jewish champions, from Boris Michail Gurevitch of the Soviet Union to Fred Oberlander of Canada.

Another book worth reading is Hank Greenberg: Hall-of-Fame Slugger (The Jewish Publication Society) by veteran sports scribe Ira Berkow. It's eminently readable and pays tribute to a legend.

All God's creatures

March 15 was designated the International Day of Protest Against the Canadian Seal Hunt. Rallies were organized in 41 cities around the world. I attended a rally in Toronto organized by the World Society for Protection of Animals (WSPA). With protesters from across the Greater Toronto Area, we challenged the Canadian government's legislation allowing the seal hunt and informed them that a strong majority oppose this cruel, horrific and unnecessary action.

The Canadian seal hunt is the largest single mass slaughter of a mammalian wildlife species in the world. More than one million harp seals are condemned to be cruelly slaughtered over a three-year period. This figure does not include the hundreds of thousands of seals wounded that never recover.

The seals are slaughtered mainly for their fur. There is a small market for seal oil and almost no market for the meat, so carcasses are left to rot on the ice. Seal penises are sold in Asian markets as an aphrodisiac.

Whether they bleed to death from the stabbing of the hakapiks (large ice picks), are struck with wooden clubs, or are shot – the seals suffer an agonizing and terrifying death. The screaming baby pups are heartlessly killed while their mothers watch.

The seal hunt has been ongoing for years. Three decades ago, a small group of concerned citizens joined together to stop the massive and brutal commercial hunt of "whitecoat" harp seals on the east coast of Canada. It was then a new breed of animal advocacy organization, the International Fund for Animal Welfare (IFAW), was born. Two million contributors worldwide now support it.

I am proud my mother volunteered for IFAW in those early years. She told me, "I read about the plight of the seals and felt I had to do something. In university, I got students to sign a petition banning the hunt and secured pages of signatures which I sent to [IFAW founder] Brian Davies." When I was 15, my mother handed me a thank-you card with a picture of a baby seal that Davies sent her. With this, she also passed on the desire to stand up for what I believe in.

As an activist, I learned there is strength in numbers and that we have the ability to change policy and various forms of cruelty to animals. Thanks to IFAW's vigilance and supporters, it is now illegal to hunt "whitecoat" seal pups for commercial purposes off Canada's east coast. However, the Canadian government continues to heavily subsidize the hunt of harp and hooded seals off the Atlantic Coast.

Another organization currently helping the seals is the Humane Society of the United States (HSUS). On the society's website, www.protectseals.org, it is stated: "The slaughter will begin in late March. By the end of this year's hunt, more than 300,000 baby seals will have been brutally killed, many as young as 12 days old."

Seal hunting is an off-season activity conducted by fishers. They earn a small fraction of their incomes from sealing and the rest from commercial fisheries. The connection between the commercial fishing industry and the seal hunt in Canada gives consumers worldwide the power to end this cruel and brutal slaughter." A U.S. boycott on Canadian seafood products has been launched by the HSUS.

If you want to send the fishers and the government a strong and clear message and help curtail this brutal expression of cruelty to animals, stop eating Canadian seafood. You can also protest by e-mailing Prime Minister Paul Martin at pm@pm.gc.ca and/or contacting the organizations mentioned in this column.

I believe, together, we can end the seal hunt. Just as my mother did, I will pass on my passion and animal rights literature to my children and continue the mesorah (Jewish tradition) of helping all God's creations through the value of tikkun olam (healing the world).

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

Max Tishler (1906-1989) was described by President Ronald Reagan as a "giant on the chemical scene these past 50 years."

He was born in Boston – the fifth of six children. His father was a shoemaker who abandoned the family when Tishler was five years old. The youngster helped support the family by delivering bread for a bakery, selling newspapers, and doing other odd jobs.

He got a job as assistant to a pharmacist, working at the soda fountain, dishing out ice cream when he wasn't packing and delivering drugs.

Some of his deliveries were to victims of the influenza epidemic of 1918, and that experience convinced the lad that he should go into health care.

His marks in high school were outstanding – good enough to earn him a full scholarship, and in 1928, he graduated from Tufts College with a bachelor of science, magna cum laude, in chemistry. He went directly to Harvard, earning his MA in 1933 and his PhD in organic chemistry in 1934.

Max Tishler

With few jobs available during the depression years, Tishler was hired by Merck, then a small company in New Jersey.

In his first assignment, Tishler developed an economical, large-scale production process that greatly increased the yield of riboflavin and permitted, for the first time, its use to enrich white bread. Later, he led a team that succeeded in synthesizing cortisone on a large scale.

Ultimately, the chemist worked out processes for synthesizing ascorbic acid, riboflavin, cortisone, miamin, pyridoxin, pantothenic acid, nicotinamide, methionine, threonine and tryptophan.

In 1987, Reagan, presenting Tishler with the National Medal of Science, stated: "The importance of Dr. Tishler's specific contributions to the nation's health can be scarcely be exaggerated."

Excerpted from The Jewish Contribution to the Modern World.

It would be better if we all grew up

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Growing up is hard. Only recently, upon the death of former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, did I fully comprehend that men do indeed die with hatred and evil intent in their hearts. Not all people have the ability to do tshuvah – repentance. I learned from his demise that repairing the world, so that decency lies in the hearts and souls of all humankind, will not happen in my lifetime, as "good people" are needed to convert bad guys into virtuous spirits and proliferate peace and accord worldwide. This will take a few generations.

URBAN WRITER

I, therefore, no longer await the coming of the Messiah in my days – a concept I translate as meaning a universal prevalence of righteousness – but rather work for its arrival for the generations to come. I believe our job now is to teach each other to develop the gift of seeing the potential of humanity to achieve greatness, and we must bravely sing a song of peace and truth: to grow up.

Growing up can be sad. Not so long ago, I believed the Jewish world would eventually come together in harmony as one people. I thought that, regardless of our philosophical and religious differences, the concept of Ve'ahavta – loving thy neighbour – would instil enough confidence in rabbis to enable them to sit together at the table of Jewish unity. Yet, the more I ensconce myself in community, the more I see this is not the case, here or in other Jewish communities around the world.

Jews of one denomination do not generally wish other Jews "Shabbat shalom" as they pass one another on their way to shul. Most Conservative and Reform Jews are unaware of some of the beauty within the Orthodox world stemming from an organic system of day-to-day kindness and the recent celebration of the completion of Shas (all talmudic tractates) by thousands of Jews worldwide. And how many Orthodox Jews know about the powerful commitment to Judaism through Torah learning and activism in synagogues such as the Conservative Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, which holds Torah classes for its membership and an Out of the Cold program for the homeless.

Is it impossible for Jews of different denominations to respect each other, at least as members of the same glorious people? Why do our dissimilarities produce such distrust? Are we that insecure in our own beliefs? In this way, are we not the same as other religions? Protestants versus Catholics. Shiites versus Sunnis. Orthodox versus Conservative/Reform. What is the difference? This schism is most troubling because it could mean when peace with the Arab world arrives, bitter internal strife could erupt as it did in Israel thousands of years ago, and we will then be our own enemies.

The process of growing up ends when we have concluded our days on this earth. Octogenarians experience revelations that were unclear to them decades earlier. Growing up is a continual wrestling match with the dynamics of life, flipping them upside down and over and over, attempting to determine if the paradigms we live by are still sound or require a shift in our thinking and actions.

One thing is for certain, however. When we see a friend or a family member "grow up," a warmish sensation drapes our soul, and at least for a moment, the storm outside becomes less ominous and more of a playground where we can slosh through puddles of pride and lift our heads to the sky, smiling and laughing while raindrops of hope splash against our eyes and nose.

Wouldn't it be grand if we all "grew up" sooner rather than later? Say, "Good Shabbos," when you pass your brother or sister – in effect, plant a tree for those to come. Let the Toronto Jewish community be a light unto other Jews worldwide.

avrum@veahavta.org. Wish the homeless "a good day."

When he touched the stones

The scene was unforgettable. Standing alone, clad in his elegant, ivory papal vestments, stooped by the Parkinson's disease insidiously ravaging his physical vitality, leaning heavily on the cane in his right hand, Pope John Paul II extended his trembling left hand to touch the heavy, hewn stones of the Western Wall, the last standing remnant of the ancient Temple in Jerusalem, the Jewish people's most cherished, tangible link to our past and present sovereign existence.

The significance of the Pope's touching the stones of the Wall was epochal, intended to be so by the ailing, aging leader of the Roman Catholic world. It was an image he wanted the cameras and the scribes of our electronically interconnected world to capture for all time to come: Catholicism reaching out to Judaism, the Holy See reaching out to the State of Israel. The Pope well understood and wanted the world to understand that the blessing at the Wall and his reverential touching of the stones was also a blessing of the return of the Jewish people to history and a touching of the Jewish state. His visit to Israel five years ago last month was the culmination of a very public and symbolically unsubtle three-part process of reconciliation with the Jewish people that began in 1986 when he became the first pope ever to visit the Great Synagogue of Rome, where he sat alongside and embraced Rome's Chief Rabbi Elio Toaff, and continued seven years later in 1993 when he established diplomatic relations between the Holy See and the Jewish state.

The News in Brief

CANADA

MP Delivers Petitions

OTTAWA — Tory MP Jason Kenney presented four petitions in the House of Commons last week urging the government to recall Canada's UNESCO ambassador because of previous anti-Israel and anti-Semitic comments. The petitions were signed by 175 residents of Quebec, Ontario and Alberta. In 1977, Yvon Charbonneau, a former Montreal Liberal MP, accused Montreal businessman Sam Steinberg of being an "economic terrorist." In April 2002, after a month in which Palestinian terrorists killed 79 Israelis, he gave a speech in the Commons equating Palestinian terrorism with the "terror campaign waged by Israel," and said Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was "turning Israel into a rogue state."

New League Leader

TORONTO — Winnipeg native Sheva Zucker is the new executive director of the League for Yiddish in New York, succeeding founder Mordkhe Schaechter. Raised in a Yiddish-speaking home, Zucker – who went to the I.L. Peretz Folk School, and has an MA in Yiddish language and literature from Columbia University and a PhD in comparative literature from the City University of New York – taught Yiddish at Duke University.

WORLD

Pressure Israel: PM

PUTRAJAYA, Malaysia — The world should launch a campaign against Israel similar to the one against South African apartheid in order to force the emergence of a Palestinian state, Malaysian Prime Minister Ahmad Badawi told a three-day "Peace in Palestine" forum here last week. But Badawi didn't call for a boycott of Israeli goods in his talk to the 300 activists and academics. The meeting was organized by the People's Alliance for Peace Malaysia, a coalition of 1,100 civil society and religious groups, and political parties. Five Israeli peace activists attended, even though Israel and Malaysia, a Muslim nation, don't have formal ties.

Museum Reopens

INDIANAPOLIS — The CANDLES (Children of Auschwitz Nazi Deadly Lab Experiments Survivors) Holocaust museum in Terre Haute, Ind., which was destroyed by arson in 2003, was set to reopen last Sunday. The 4,500-square-foot museum – which was housed in a strip mall on a busy highway – is run by Eva Kor, a survivor of experiments conducted on twins by Dr. Josef Mengele at Auschwitz. In November 2003, someone broke into the facility, set fire to it and wrote "Remember Timmy McVeigh" on an exterior wall, referring to the Oklahoma City bomber who killed 168 people and was executed in a Terre Haute prison.

AJC Buys Stock

NEW YORK — The American Jewish Congress has purchased shares in Caterpillar, a firm under attack because the Israeli army uses its bulldozers to destroy Palestinian terrorists' homes. The AJC said it bought the stock as part of its initiative to fight calls for divestment from companies doing business with Israel.

Jews Too Influential?

BERLIN — Some 16 per cent of Berliners believe Jews have too much influence, a new poll says. The survey of 2,000 local residents, released by the Free University of Berlin and the FORSA polling institute, also found 10 per cent of Berliners would consider voting for an extreme right-wing party, and about six per cent have a right-wing extremist worldview. Some 16 per cent agreed with the statement that "some lives are valuable and others worthless." Also, 12 per cent agreed Germany needs a strong leader who would rule with a strong hand, and 15 per cent said Nazism had its good points.

Pastry Shop Bombed

PARIS — Two homemade bombs were thrown at a Jewish-owned pastry shop in a Paris suburb in an attack that caused little damage. The National Bureau of Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism called last week's attack "deliberately anti-Semitic" because it was carried out in a Jewish neighbourhood several yards from the synagogue of Sarcelles. Sarcelles has seen frequent Jewish-Muslim tension, particularly since the Palestinian intifadah began in 2000.

Operation Pesach

TEANECK, N.J. — For the 21st straight year, the Union for Traditional Judaism will run a toll-free hotline with rabbis and lay leaders answering questions about Passover observance. The UTJ, a non-denominational education and outreach group, is running the service, dubbed Operation Pesach, April 18 to 22. To ask a question, call 1-888-628-9241.

Revoke Chess Champ's Citizenship: SWC

JERUSALEM — The Simon Wiesenthal Center wants Iceland to reverse its decision to grant citizenship to Bobby Fischer, the ex-chess champion who spouts anti-Semitic and anti-U.S. rhetoric.

Bobby Fischer's new passport

After being freed from prison in Japan for passport violation charges, Fischer, who is fighting extradition to his native United States, arrived in Reykjavik, Iceland's capital, on March 25. Iceland granted him citizenship in recognition of the historic chess games against Russian Boris Spassky that he played there in 1972.

Fischer's mother was Jewish but his anti-Semitism is legendary. "The U.S. is evil," Fischer, 62, said at a news conference, where he accused the "Jew-controlled U.S. government" of ruining his life.

The Wiesenthal Center's Israel director, Efraim Zuroff, asked Iceland to reconsider its decision, saying Fischer had already run afoul of the country's laws against incitement based on hate speech.

Islamic school probed over anti-Israel story

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The principal of Ottawa's Islamic Abraar School is "a superb lady… a gem" who is "deeply committed to educating kids in an atmosphere of friendship and co-operation," says a prominent rabbi who toured the embattled facility last week.

In a show of interfaith solidarity, Rabbi Reuven Bulka joined Gamal Solaiman, the imam at Ottawa's main mosque, and Anglican Canon Jim Stevenson in an informal tour of the private elementary school, which is being investigated following the suspension of two teachers who helped a student with a violently anti-Israel story.

Two supervisory officers from Ontario's Education Ministry started their probe at the school March 30. The inspection was ordered by Education Minister Gerard Kennedy following widespread media coverage and a letter to Kennedy from Canadian Jewish Congress that called for an investigation.

CJC called the incident "beyond belief."

Officials at the Education Ministry said they don't know how long the probe will last, only that it will focus on whether the incident was isolated or part of a wider problem at the school.

Kennedy called the incident "deeply disturbing," but expressed hope the inquiry will find that it was isolated.

Rabbi Bulka, the spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas and chair of the CJC's religious and inter-religious affairs committee, expressed the same sentiment.

He told The CJN he's "as confident as one could be" that the incident is "a blip that does not reflect what the school stands for."

Following last Wednesday's tour, Rabbi Bulka had nothing but praise for the school's principal, Aisha Sherazi, who immediately launched an internal inquiry and suspended the two teachers, one of whom praised the student's writing project and another who contributed to its artwork.

"She wants this investigation. She has no problem with it. She's as uncomfortable as we are," he said.

Sherazi was not returning reporters' calls last week.

Rabbi Bulka said it was important for the school's 260 students, ranging from kindergarten to Grade 8, "to see representatives of different religions walking in together."

In what is perhaps the first such incident in Canada, the two unnamed teachers were suspended following a front-page Ottawa Citizen report that brought to light their involvement in the student's project.

One teacher was apparently involved in the illustration of the student's eight-page story on killing and martyrdom. The cover page was a drawing of a burning Star of David beside a machine-gun and Palestinian flag atop Jerusalem's Dome of the Rock.

The handwritten Arabic text in the sketch read, "With the call of 'God is the Greatest,' the flag of Zionism will fall and will be destroyed."

The other teacher reportedly praised the boy's story of revenge for the assassination by Israeli forces a year ago of Sheik Ahmed Yassin, a co-founder of Hamas.

"Without thinking, Ahmed took his M-16 machine-gun and threw the bombs, and he showered the Jews; this resulted in the killing of the soldiers," the boy wrote in one passage.

"God bless you, your efforts are good," the teacher replied on the title page.

No action has been taken against the student.

Local and national Islamic groups condemned the incident.

"Canadian Muslims categorically reject the glorification of violence or the promotion of hate against any ethnic community," read a statement from the Council on American-Islamic Relations Canada.

"There must be a thorough investigation and concrete steps must be taken to ensure that a similar situation is never repeated."

The council added, however, that "while the contents of the story are unacceptable, it must be kept in mind that the piece in question is the fictional work of a young Canadian boy of Palestinian origin whose extended family is living under a brutal Israeli occupation. The writing of the story by this child must be understood in that context."

Building a Jewish library

From the editor's desk

Nisan, the first month in the Jewish lunar calendar, begins in two days. Like all of the months, it is momentous, only more so.

In that lovely spring evening in the middle of the month, when the moon reaches its fullest shining diameter, Jews throughout the world will gather, as we have throughout the last 3,500 years, to retell and try to relive the story of the Exodus.

Nisan is an extra momentous month because it is the month of our freedom. It is the month of the beginning of the fashioning of our national identity. Seven weeks later, at the foot of the thunderous Mount Sinai, that identity would be fully formed.

It is an appropriate time of the year for us to attempt to replicate as individuals, what our forebears achieved collectively as a people, namely, a sense of belonging to a specially destined, precious peoplehood.

But knowing who we are is only the entry point into that many-faceted, metaphysical geometry we call peoplehood. For it is sustained by a scaffolding that requires our knowing what we are and why.

Jewish identity without Jewish literacy, that is, familiarity with the ways of Judaism, is a prescription for collective extinction. But Jewish literacy without Jewish identity is a prescription for reclusiveness and separation.

It is somewhere near the balance point between the two where a certain Jewish future can be achieved.

The month of Nisan is a fitting time of year to begin our own personal quests for that point of balance when identity, forged from freedom, can meet literacy forged at Sinai.

But how to begin that quest?

The ways are as varied as the persons and the personalities seeking them.

But two components, it seems to me, are indispensible: a teacher and books.

Aseh lecha rav, our sages urged. "Find a teacher," someone who instructs, but who inspires as well.

Next, read books. Spend time with the masters.

Moshe Ibn Ezra, the 11th-century Spanish philosopher/sage, epitomized the age-old Jewish attitude toward books when he wrote: "Make your books your companions; let your cases and shelves be your pleasure grounds and orchards. Bask in their paradise, gather their fruit, pluck their roses, take their spices. If your soul be satiate and weary, change from garden to garden, from furrow to furrow, from prospect to prospect. Then will your desire be renewed, and your soul be filled with delight."

Since the first books were written and then printed, books have been both our refuge from and our gateway into the stirring tides of a changing world. Such is our affection for books that we have always been taught if a drop of ink falls at the same time on our book and on our coat, we should clean the book first and then the garment.

With a teacher's advice and guidance, we can perhaps even assemble a library of the essential, core books that, over time, might grow and fill with other books.

There are undoubtedly many more but, in my view, four categories of books are the minimum: Jewish thought, beginning with Tanach and Talmud; language, including some guide to Hebrew; and history and literature, classic and modern.

It is as a result of this special regard and high priority we attach to books that readers will have noticed The CJN dedicates a great deal of weekly space to books, reviews and authors.

In that vein, I offer the following mini-review of Dearest Auntie Fori: The Story of the Jewish People (Harper Collins). It is not essential to the beginner's Jewish library, but it is a worthwhile acquisition.

Prolific historian and biographer Sir Martin Gilbert has added a gem to the jewelry box of popular history.

Dearest Auntie Fori: The Story of the Jewish People is an easy-to-read, survey history of the Jewish people. It is written for the novice, someone who has the barest familiarity, if at all, with the detail-laden millennia of Jewish history.

The Auntie Fori of the title is a long-time friend of Sir Martin's – Mrs. B.K. (Fori) Nehru of New Delhi – who surprises the British scholar on her 90th birthday by revealing to him that she happens to be Jewish.

But she knows nothing of her heritage or of her people's past and wants to learn. She implores Sir Martin to teach her.

Rather than recommend a few articles or popular history books to her, the energetic scribe and caring friend decides to teach her himself.

He does so in the form of 141 letters to her. Each letter is a different lesson. The first 90 letters tell the story of the Jewish people beginning with the first pages of the bible and ending with contemporary Jewish life. The last third of the book's letters explain, in rudimentary form, the various concepts and tenets of Jewish faith and observance.

For anyone seeking an introduction to Jewish history and Judaism, this is a excellent book. Combined with the comprehensive bibliography, it is an exhilarating introduction to the miraculous tale of the Jewish people. — MBD

Likud radicals seek gov't based on 'Jewish values'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Moshe Feiglin and Shmuel Sackett, the co-founders of a radical renegade faction in the ruling Likud party, think the future belongs to them.

Last week, in a joint appearance at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, they confidently predicted that their Manhigut Yehudit (Jewish Leadership) group will eventually win control of Likud, take over Israel and convert it into a "Jewish state."

Moshe Feiglin

"Manhigut wants to bring Israel back to the people," said Feiglin, who believes Israel should be governed solely by "Jewish values and concepts" and should not merely be "a state of the Jews."

He added, "We represent the natural position of Jews. We are going to win."

Sackett, who introduced Feiglin as a future prime minister, accused Israeli leaders of governing from a leftist ideological perspective since 1948.

Every prime minister, from David Ben-Gurion to Ariel Sharon, has tried to turn Israel into a nation like all others, he added.

"That's fine if you're running France, Mexico and Canada," said Sackett, who made aliyah from the United States in 1990. "But Israel is the Holy Land."

Arguing that Israel has a special obligation to uphold authentic Jewish values, Sackett said it has been heading in "the wrong direction" far too long.

Feiglin suggested that while Manhigut Yehudit is against the planned unilateral pullout from the Gaza Strip and four settlements in the West Bank, its main focus is ensuring that Israel retains its Jewish identity.

He made a distinction between Israelis and Jews, saying that Sharon represents only Israelis.

Founded nearly five years ago by ideologues from the national religious camp, Manhigut Yehudit wants to bring about a revolution in Israel.

Speaking to a sparse audience, Sackett and Feiglin explained that the first step in this process is to gain control of the Likud's central committee, whose 2,800 members select the party's roster of candidates for the Knesset.

Manhigut Yehudit already has the largest bloc in the central committee, with 135 delegates, they said.

Its goal is to win 400 seats.

"We're inside Likud and that's what's making Sharon crazy," said Sackett.

Two months ago, however, Manhigut Yehudit failed to win representation in the secretariat, Likud's most important body.

One of its candidates, Shaul Nir, was a member of the Jewish Underground in the 1980s. He was sentenced to life imprisonment for the murder of three Arab students at the Islamic College in Hebron. Nir was pardoned and released in 1993 after serving seven years.

In a tacit acknowledgement of Manhigut Yehudit's setback in the race for Likud's secretariat, Feiglin conceded that it may take a decade to complete a hostile takeover of Likud, currently Israel's largest political party in terms of Knesset seats.

Shmuel Sackett

But he voiced confidence that Manhigut Yehudit will ultimately prevail and that Israel will have "a Jewish leadership."

Sackett predicted that the current Israeli government will soon collapse, forcing Likud to hold internal elections, and Feiglin will then challenge Sharon for the party leadership, he said.

Feiglin and Sackett, who were here on the day the Knesset approved Sharon's 2005 budget – thereby clearing the way for Israel's withdrawal from Gaza – made only a few passing comments about the planned pullout.

A resident of the West Bank settlement of Karnei Shomron, Feiglin said, "We should do everything to stop the disengagement plan." He said Sharon feared a national referendum on the issue.

Sackett, who lives in the same settlement, claimed that the majority of the members in Likud's central committee oppose the withdrawal.

In addition, he warned that if the Israeli army vacates the Palestinian town of Qalqilya, terrorism will spill over into neighbouring Kfar Saba.

During the mid-1990s, Feiglin and Sackett expressed their revulsion at the Oslo peace process by forming the Zo Artzeinu movement.

After blocking major roads in Israel in a campaign of non-violence, they were arrested and charged with sedition. "We blocked the entire country," Sackett boasted. He and Feiglin were given prison sentences of 12 months and 16 months, respectively.

Earlier this year, Manhigut Yehudit called on soldiers to refuse orders to evacuate settlers in Gaza.

In introducing the featured speakers, Rabbi Moshe Stern, spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah, said he agreed with their analysis of Israel's failings as a Jewish state.

"Is Israel truly a Jewish homeland?" he asked rhetorically. "Often, you get the feeling that Israel is just another land where Jews live."

Radical Islam the problem, moderates the solution, says Pipes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In contrast to Daniel Pipes' lecture at York University two years ago – which was marked by heavy security and vocal protests by pro-Palestinian students – the American historian's visit to the University of Toronto last week was relatively uneventful.

Pipes was in town to inaugurate the first Canadian student chapter of the Middle East Forum, an offshoot of Pipes' Philadelphia-based think tank of the same name. The U of T group – which has counterparts at Yale University, Brandeis University and the University of Pennsylvania – was started by second-year student Rebecca Waserman, who interned for the think tank last summer.

Before tackling the subject of his talk, "Radical Islam and the War on Terror," Pipes accused 111 faculty members and graduate students of "shoddy scholarship" for what he said were erroneous comments in a letter protesting his appearance on the campus. The letter, titled "Hate has no place on this campus," had been printed in the Varsity, U of T's campus paper, and was also distributed to audience members at the lecture.

Speaking at the University's St. Michael's College, Pipes said the letter is indicative of "exactly the kind of problems for which Campus Watch was founded," referring to his controversial website that monitors and critiques specific professors and universities on their approach to Mideast studies.

Daniel Pipes

In his introduction to Pipes' talk, U of T professor of religion Kenneth Green described him as a "controversial man because he speaks difficult truths, but a man who we have to listen to."

Making terrorism go away is not an achievable goal, Pipes said. Rather, he argued in favour of strengthening moderate Islam and defeating radical Islam.

The latter is supported by "a small but very active percentage of the Muslim population," he said. He estimated the number at 10 to 15 per cent.

Radical Islam, which he likened to fascism and communism, is the problem, he said. "Moderate Islam is the solution."

There are more anti-Islamist Muslims in Toronto than in any other city, Pipes said, citing author Irshad Manji as an example.

"Anti-Islamist Muslims need support, money, audiences, endorsement and protection from the ravages of Islamist threat."

He cautioned against viewing the current situation as having always been the case. Radical Islam may have roots in medieval times, but it is based on "modern ideas that date back to the 1920s."

Since he began his career in 1969, Pipes has "watched something which was politically very minor turn into something huge. It would be a great mistake to take it and assign it permanence."

He said he is confident the civilized world will win the war against terror, although he is not confident it will happen with minimal loss of life.

A man of great courage

The historical importance of that process was aptly expressed by Rabbi Reuven Bulka, the spiritual leader of Machzikei Hadas Congregation in Ottawa and the chair of the religious and inter-religious affairs committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress, who told The CJN, "For the Pope to have established diplomatic relations with Israel was a moment of nuclear proportions."

Theological differences remain between Catholicism and Judaism; political differences persist between the Vatican and Israel. But John Paul II, the Polish Pope, repeatedly condemned anti-Semitism as a sin against God. During his visit to Israel five years ago, he said at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem: "In this place of solemn remembrance, I fervently pray that our sorrow for the tragedy which the Jewish people suffered in the 20th century, will lead to a new relationship between Christians and Jews. Let us build a new future…"

Karol Wojtyla, Pope John Paul II, who died last Saturday at the age of 84, was a man of great courage and surmounting personal conviction. Forged in the twin totalitarian infernos of Nazism and communism, the mettle of his deeply spiritual nature and the hard steel of his moral compass steered his life on a pastor's journey that led to the bishopric of Rome. It was a journey, it is no exaggeration to say, that affected the course of modern history and profoundly touched the countless millions of lives who stood in its uplifting path.

That the journey of his life passed through Jerusalem, we pray, will be a blessing for all days to come and for all mankind in the building of a new, better, peaceful future.

Associated's budget

We acknowledge, with thanks, Barry Levine's reference to Associated Hebrew Schools as one of the few Jewish Day Schools to publicly share any financial information ("We need to restructure the Jewish school system," CJN, March 24). However, we wish to correct his statement with respect to the proportion of expenditures allocated to the classroom.

He wrote, "According to its 2003-04 budget, 36 per cent of Associated's expenses are for general administration, supervisory staff, support staff and facilities – money that is not being spent directly in the classroom." Surely he would agree that salaries, payroll burden and related benefits of classroom teachers, as well as remedial teachers, special-talents teachers, teaching assistants, principals and vice-principals, and costs to maintain libraries, computer labs, etc., while not necessarily all being housed in the classroom, vitally contribute and are inextricably linked to the education of the student.

A more meaningful comparison is to segregate costs related to education, maintenance and administration. When this comparison is drawn, the reader will glean from the same financial information that costs directly related to education constitute 81 per cent of the total budget; administration, 9.5 per cent and maintenance, 9.5 per cent, a distribution similar to most other day schools in Toronto.

Ariel Sharon's safety

As an American olah who closely monitors the political scene in Israel, I write concerning Paul Michaels' March 3 column, "A fair and accurate depiction of the pullout dispute."

I understand it is not an independent analysis of Israeli happenings, but rather a review of a CBC program in which Adrienne Arsenault reported on "a vociferous minority of settlers desperate to stop the disengagement." Nonetheless, I am deeply unsettled. Both the uncritical tone of Michaels' review and the very title of the column convey to your readers the very clear impression that now we have the facts: there is some minority of the settlers out to kill Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. Michaels even quotes Arsenault's reference to people who favour methods that are "dark and dangerous, threats aimed at killing not just the plan but the people behind it."

But such talk is not an objective description of one group of settlers. It is, instead, a reflection of the vilification of these settlers that has been taking place: the attempt to marginalize and demonize them.

Some angry letters have been written, but the individuals in Israel responsible for maintaining the safety of our leaders have concluded that there is no threat implicit. First the Shabak – Israel's general security services – stated unequivocally that that there has been no increase in the number of threats on Sharon's life. There are always some threats, but the pullout dispute has not increased the number. On Feb. 27, in an interview with Army Radio, Knesset security officer Yitzchak Shadar said, "There are no threats on the Knesset or Knesset Members by the right wing."

Government anti-racism plan hypocritical

I do not understand how the Canadian Jewish Congress can praise the federal government ("CJC praises federal anti-racism plan," CJN, March 31) for its protection of minority rights without even mentioning that the federal government continues to openly flout its established international law obligation to remedy explicit ongoing discrimination against Jews and other non-Catholic religious minorities in education funding in Ontario.

The federal government's ongoing failure to honour its binding treaty commitments to remedy such discrimination, by the means at its disposal (e.g. by tax credits or direct funding), if the provincial government fails to do so, is a human rights scandal that the Jewish community across Canada should be speaking out against at every opportunity. The government's hypocrisy should be noted every time it claims to be a champion of human rights.

Anti-racism, eh?

The article "Ottawa announces $56 million anti-racism plan," (CJN, March 24) talks enthusiastically about Ottawa's announced $56-million anti-racism plan. In the same issue, the article, "Police will not lay charges against Elmasry," states that Halton Regional Police will not lay hate charges against Canadian Islamic Congress president Mohamed Elmasry, who said, on television, that Israeli civilians are legitimate targets of suicide attacks. If the present hate laws are not enforced, what good is $56 million put into a vague plan of action that in reality has no bite?

'Blessed are you in Israel': Barak

Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak gave the following speech at Yad Vashem during the visit of Pope John Paul II on March 23, 2000.

Your Holiness, Pope John Paul II, allow me to open with a few words in our language, the language of Abraham, Moses and the Covenant, which has again become the native language of the land of Israel.

In the name of the Jewish people, in the name of the State of Israel and in the name of all the citizens of Israel – Christians, Muslims, Druze and Jews – I welcome you with a greeting of friendship, brotherhood and peace, in Jerusalem, the capital of Israel, the eternal city and the city of peace.

In the 2000-year cycle of history, we return here to the original starting point, bearing the burden of remembrance – its wealth and pain, its light and shadows, its songs and elegies. You have not come to heal the wounds of the past, but the path that has brought you here leads to new horizons. This moment will be remembered forever as a magical moment of truth and a victory for justice and hope.

Your Holiness, we meet today in this sanctuary of memory for the Jewish people and for all humanity. "Yad Vashem" – literally, "a place and a name" – for the six million of brothers and sisters, for the 1.5-million children, victims of the barbarian evil of Nazism.

When the darkness of Nazism descended and my people were led from all over Christian Europe to the crematoria and the gas chambers, it seemed that no longer could one place any hope in God or man. That in the words of the prophet Joel, "The sun and the moon darkened and the stars withdrew their luster." And the silence was not only from the heavens. During that time, here in the land of Israel, the poet Natan Alterman wrote these searing, tormented words: "As the children cried underneath the gallows, the wrath of the world we did not hear."

Your Holiness, from the depths of that "long night of the Shoah," as you called it, we saw the flickers of light, shining like beacons against the utter blackness around them. They were the righteous gentiles, mostly children of your faith, who secretly risked their lives to save the lives of others. Their names are inscribed on the wall around us here at Yad Vashem; they are forever inscribed on the tablets of our hearts.

You, Your Holiness, were a young witness to the tragedy. And as you wrote to your Jewish childhood friend, you felt, in some sense, as if you yourself experienced the fate of Polish Jewry. When my grandparents, Elka and Shmuel Godin, mounted the death trains at Umschlagplatz near their home in Warsaw, headed toward their fate at Treblinka – the fate of three million Jews from your homeland – you were there, and you remembered.

You have done more than anyone else to bring about the historic change in the attitude of the Church toward the Jewish people, initiated by the good Pope John XXIII, and to dress the gaping wounds that festered over many bitter centuries.

And I can say, Your Holiness, that your coming here today, to the Tent of Remembrance at Yad Vashem, is a climax of this historic journey of healing.

Here, right now, time itself has come to a standstill, this very moment holds within it 2000 years of history. And their weight is almost too much to bear.

Shortly before setting out on your pilgrimage here, you raised the flag of fraternity to full mast, setting into Church liturgy a request for forgiveness, for wrongs committed by members of your faith against others, especially against the Jewish people.

We appreciate this noble act most profoundly.

Naturally, it is impossible to overcome all the pains of the past overnight.

Your Holiness has frequently commented on problems regarding past relations between Christianity and the Jews. It is our wish to continue productive dialogue on this issue to work together to eliminate the scourge of racism and anti-Semitism.

Your Holiness, mine is a nation that remembers. However onerous the burden of memory, we may not avoid it, because without memory there can be neither culture nor conscience.

The establishment of the State of Israel against all odds and the ingathering of the exiles not only has restored to the Jewish people their honour and mastery over its fate; it is the definitive, permanent answer to Auschwitz. We have returned home, and since then no Jew will ever remain helpless or be stripped of the last shred of human dignity. Here, at the cradle of our civilization, we have rebuilt our home, so that it may thrive in peace and security. Defending our state has claimed a very heavy toll.

We are now resolved to find paths to historical reconciliation. We are in the midst of an enormous effort to secure comprehensive peace with our Palestinian neighbours, with Syria and Lebanon and with the entire Arab world.

Your Holiness, we have noted with appreciation your words about the unique bond of the Jewish people to Jerusalem, that I quote you, "Jews love Jerusalem with a passion, from the days of David who chose it as a capital, and from the days of Solomon who built the Temple there. Therefore they turn to it in their prayers every day, and point to it as a symbol of their nation."

I would like to reiterate our absolute commitment to protect all rights and properties of the Catholic Church, as well as those of the Christian and Muslim institutions; to continue to ensure full freedom of worship to members of all faiths equally; and to keep united Jerusalem open and free, as never before, to all who love her. I know that you pray, as we do, for his unity and peace of Jerusalem: "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem – peace be within thy walls and prosperity within thy palaces, for my brethren and companions' sake, I will now say, peace be within thee." (Psalms 122)

Your Holiness, you have come on a mission of brotherhood, of remembrance and of peace.

And we say to you: blessed are you in Israel.

'A new relationship between Christians and Jews': John Paul II

Pope John Paul II gave the following speech at Yad Vashem on March 23, 2000.

The words of the ancient Psalm rise from our hearts: "'I have become like a broken vessel. I hear the whispering of many – terror on every side – as they scheme together against me, as they plot to take my life. But I trust in you, O Lord: I say, 'You are my God.'" (Psalms 31:13-15) In this place of memories, the mind and heart and soul feel an extreme need for silence.

Silence in which to remember. Silence in which to try to make some sense of the memories which come flooding back. Silence because there are no words strong enough to deplore the terrible tragedy of the Shoah.

My own personal memories are of all that happened when the Nazis occupied Poland during the war. I remember my Jewish friends and neighbours, some of whom perished, while others survived. I have come to Yad Vashem to pay homage to the millions of Jewish people who, stripped of everything, especially of human dignity, were murdered in the Holocaust. More than half a century has passed, but the memories remain.

Here, as at Auschwitz and many other places in Europe, we are overcome by the echo of the heart-rending laments of so many. Men, women and children cry out to us from the depths of the horror that they knew. How can we fail to heed their cry? No one can forget or ignore what happened. No one can diminish its scale.

We wish to remember. But we wish to remember for a purpose, namely to ensure that never again will evil prevail, as it did for the millions of innocent victims of Nazism.

How could man have such utter contempt for man? Because he had reached the point of contempt for God. Only a godless ideology could plan and carry out the extermination of a whole people.

The honour given to the "just Gentiles" by the State of Israel at Yad Vashem for having acted heroically to save Jews, sometimes to the point of giving their own lives, is a recognition that not even in the darkest hour is every light extinguished. That is why the Psalms and the entire Bible, though well aware of the human capacity for evil, also proclaims that evil will not have the last word.

Out of the depths of pain and sorrow, the believer's heart cries out: "I trust in you, O Lord: I say, 'You are my God.'" (Psalms 31:14) Jews and Christians share an immense spiritual patrimony, flowing from God's self-revelation. Our religious teachings and our spiritual experience demand that we overcome evil with good. We remember, but not with any desire for vengeance or as an incentive to hatred. For us, to remember is to pray for peace and justice, and to commit ourselves to their cause. Only a world at peace, with justice for all, can avoid repeating the mistakes and terrible crimes of the past.

As bishop of Rome and successor of the Apostle Peter, I assure the Jewish people that the Catholic Church, motivated by the Gospel law of truth and love, and by no political considerations, is deeply saddened by the hatred, acts of persecution and displays of anti-Semitism directed against the Jews by Christians at any time and in any place.

The church rejects racism in any form as a denial of the image of the Creator inherent in every human being.

In this place of solemn remembrance, I fervently pray that our sorrow for the tragedy which the Jewish people suffered in the 20th century will lead to a new relationship between Christians and Jews. Let us build a new future in which there will be no more anti-Jewish feeling among Christians or anti-Christian feeling among Jews, but rather the mutual respect required of those who adore the one Creator and Lord, and look to Abraham as our common father in faith.

The world must heed the warning that comes to us from the victims of the Holocaust, and from the testimony of the survivors. Here at Yad Vashem the memory lives on, and burns itself onto our souls. It makes us cry out: "I hear the whispering of many – terror on every side – but I trust in you, O Lord: I say, 'You are my God.'" (Psalms 31:13-15)

Opinions

Hirsh Goodman's grand quest

It is one thing to read history, quite another to personally experience events that, through the prism of hindsight, actually make history. In his recently published book, Let Me Create a Paradise, God Said to Himself: A Journey of Conscience from Johannesburg to Jerusalem (Harper Collins, 2005), Hirsh Goodman adroitly pursues the latter path, weaving into his animated memoir an informed and fascinating appraisal of the past 40 years of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Born in South Africa in 1946, Goodman made aliyah in 1965. In his career as a journalist, he worked for many years at the Jerusalem Post and later became the founding editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Report. He is now a senior research associate at the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University.

As the subtitle of his book infers, Goodman engages his readers in an extraordinary journey – from the country of his youth to the chosen land that he has called home for all of his adult life. Amid the many anecdotes that both spice up his narrative and provide unique perspectives on the temperaments and attributes of some of Israel's most influential political and military leaders, there is also a more sombre and often prescient tone to his observations and analysis. At the end of it all, while we are left to wonder whether the writer is satisfied that he has indeed created his paradise, there seems little doubt that in seeking it, he has enriched his life beyond measure.

I have often heard it said that while you might take the South African out of South Africa, you can never quite take South Africa out of the South African. Not surprisingly, therefore, I found in Goodman's writing style a familiar ring that unmistakably flagged his origins and the source of his formative education. But more than this, his memories of his early years in Johannesburg speak to a connectedness, even a nostalgia, that is both touching and unexpected.

His descriptions of his childhood experiences, framed as they were within the broader social milieu in which he lived, are insightful and, at times amusing to the point of embarrassment. And that he should even still remember the colourful colloquialisms of the South African streets and schoolyards of the 1960s is in itself remarkable. In a more serious vein, it's clear that Goodman's journey of conscience may never have begun were it not for a unique confluence of circumstances that both pushed him from the land of his birth and pulled him toward the land of Israel.

Let Me Create a Paradise is an easy read that stirs the emotions and nourishes the soul. It combines the story of modern Israel with one man's personal quest for a life of meaning and fulfilment.

The view from Samuel's Tomb

Long familiarity with local religious traditions leads me to the inevitable conclusion that the three kindred faiths of Judaism, Christianity and Islam often have much more in common than they are willing to acknowledge. At times, there is even a serendipitous confusion and intermingling of their beliefs and practices.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

This was again brought home to me a couple of weeks back when I decided to pay a visit to a favourite spot of mine, the prophet Samuel's Tomb. Jerusalem that day was on one of its thankfully ever-more-rare terror alerts, and after creeping along through the snarled traffic as police helicopters droned overhead, I got past the last checkpoint and across municipal lines into that fuzzy, twilight zone that's not quite in the State of Israel proper, and yet not quite in the West Bank either.

Ascending the steeply winding road, I parked and negotiated on foot the final uphill ascent to the monumental tomb building. Though but spitting distance from the seething controversies of Jerusalem, the site had an otherworldly atmosphere of tranquil and peaceful detachment.

Even during the worst of the recent conflict, Samuel's Tomb was considered by many to be far enough away from the classic flashpoints of religious and national tension to be relatively safe. Unlike the inner city Arab bazaar and neighbourhoods, which we Jews so willingly and consciously abandoned, demonstrating with our feet our tacit acceptance of the principle of division of our so-called "undivided eternal capital," Nabi Samwil (using its more familiar Arabic name) continued to attract a steady, if meagre, trickle of Jewish pilgrims and tourists throughout.

What I personally like most about the site is exactly what I like most about King David's traditional tomb on Mt. Zion: namely, how the three faiths, for long centuries rubbing shoulders with one another, have gotten their beliefs and practices intertwined. In my opinion, there is a glimmer of real hope for future intercommunal relations in the fact that these two famous "Jewish" holy sites, and not only these two, probably owe more to Christian and/or Muslim traditions for their existence than to an originally Jewish one.

For it was early Christians who first identified the tombs of Samuel and David. It was to the Crusaders, centuries later, that we owe the monumental church buildings that stand on both, to the Muslims that we owe their conversion into mosques, and to ourselves that we Jews were, and still are, ready to accept them as authentic.

On this unusually warm spring day, I seated myself in the shade of the stately building. From a discreet vantage point, I followed the movements of several Bratzlever Chassidim, for whom the hill of Nabi Samwil has long been a special favourite. They drifted about, as is their wont, in solitary meditation among the trees. Then, hearing voices, I turned to see an approaching group of German nuns, their neat, grey-blue habits presenting an attractive visual counterpoint to the contemplative Chassidim in their long black cloaks. Stopping a few short paces off, the nuns pulled out their German language Bibles and began reading from Scripture. My ears picked up the occasional "Samuel" among the otherwise incomprehensible phrases.

Suddenly, the sinuous, seductive call of the muezzin was added to the mix. It burst forth over our heads from atop the minaret that juts skyward from the roof of the medieval church building, which houses the tomb of the Jewish prophet. It was noon, and the muezzin was summoning the Muslim faithful to prayer. Neither the nuns nor the Chassidim were in the least perturbed, and their meditations, devotions and recitations continued uninterrupted.

And as the ranks of Palestinian Arab women and men filing past along the path toward the mosque swelled to a virtual tide – and we had become an assembly of Jews, Christians and Muslims standing side-by-side on one hill, paying our respects to the revered prophet of the one God of us all – I gazed with a certain wistfulness and longing into the distance, toward that other hill and city, that City of God on the Mountain of God, over which helicopters droned and where sirens wailed mournfully for what would be the very last time, hopefully.

Three decades ago, there was little to distinguish Arab societies from most other Third World countries, including those in Asia. They were all poor and undemocratic. With the exception of postwar Japan, which was redesigned by the American occupation, these countries were ruled by military elites, monarchies, or corrupt oligarchies. Their citizens lived in abject poverty, with no hope for economic advancement or political freedom.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Since then, while most of Asia, including China, became more open and developed, the Arab world stayed stuck in the same place. From North Africa to Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Syria, and Iraq, rulers clung to power, sometimes replacing each other in violent games of musical chairs. In exchange for assured oil deliveries, Western democracies supported the status quo. The result was a pressure cooker that fed Islamic extremism, including the terror attacks of 9/11.

But after the threat from Al Qaeda became clear, the Bush administration understood the need to push Arab leaders, kicking and screaming, toward reform. And despite claims by critics that Islamic culture is immune to democracy and equality, this process has begun. In post-Saddam Iraq, Lebanon, Egypt and the post-Arafat Palestinian Authority, there has been some movement.

But these steps remain tentative, with real change far from assured. In Lebanon, mass demonstrations against Syrian control after the assassination of former prime minister Rafik Hariri were matched by Hezbollah's marches, in which participants carried portraits of Syrian dictator Bashar Assad and his father. Syrian troops departed as part of a public relations campaign, but terror bombings showed that such attacks retain the power to intimidate the country's Christian community. Syria and Lebanon have a long way to go.

In Iraq, the recent elections were a major public demonstration of support for freedom, but while Kurds and Shiites voted, Sunnis stayed away. The Sunni population provides the backbone of the insurgency, which continues to kill dozens of Iraqis every week, in the hope of exhausting the Americans, Shiites and Kurds. Meanwhile, religious and secular Shiite leaders are battling each other for control of the new government. In other words, while power has changed hands following the removal of Saddam Hussein, support for democratic principles is still very thin.

Among Palestinians, the end of former PA president Yasser Arafat's tyranny has opened up Palestinian politics, but the old rules of the game have not changed significantly. As in the case of Iraq and Lebanon, the Palestinian elections reflected group identities in a struggle for power.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas used the resources at the PLO's disposal to manipulate and control the elections. The young guard (as opposed to the old Tunis group linked to Arafat) and Hamas supporters were excluded, and they remain a strong opposition outside the political process. Hamas members have kept their weapons, not only for future terror attacks against Israel, but also for use against Abbas and the PLO leadership. And there is still no evidence of a serious and open public debate in Palestinian society that would signal a readiness to accept the legitimacy of Israel.

Finally, in Egypt, President Hosni Mubarak is preparing for a fifth term, while grooming his son Gamal for a Syrian-type "republican succession." But Mubarak, who represents the ruling elite that took power in 1952, is aware of growing pressure for change. He announced a constitutional amendment to allow for additional candidates to contest the election – not exactly democracy, but a move in that direction.

These are all positive developments, but they are far from definitive changes. The old ruling elites have yet to give up exclusive control over political and economic activities, and are manoeuvring to hang on until the democratic storm passes.

But if the pressure continues, there is a reasonable chance the Arab countries will follow in Asia's path, bringing greater freedom and prosperity, as well as an end to the manipulation of violence. Despite the obstacles, this is a dream worth pursuing.

The Kirshner File

Newman basks in the glow of a lively memoir

Peter Newman, one of Canada's most distinguished journalists, has written his memoirs after a fruitful life of 75 years. By any measure, Here Be Dragons: Telling Tales of People, Passion and Power (McClelland & Stewart), a tome of 733 pages, is lively, witty and almost always interesting.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Newman, who arrived here as a Czech immigrant during World War II, when shockingly few Jewish refugees were allowed into this country, uses this book as a platform for a grand summing up. He recalls his privileged youth in Breclav, his herculean efforts to assimilate into the Canadian mainstream, his stellar career as the editor of The Toronto Star and Maclean's magazine, his authorship of 22 books – with total sales of two million – his connections with Canadian tycoons and federal politicians and his marriages and love affairs. When you add it all up, Here Be Dragons is a melange of serious narrative and juicy gossip.

Although he was born in Vienna, Newman spent his formative years on his parents' palatial estate in Moravia, the pampered son of a sugar beet magnate who was only nominally Jewish. As he puts it, "Our Judaism was more an ethnic identity than a sustaining faith."

Newman's father was convinced that two related forces, the Czech army and the goodwill of Czechoslovakia's western allies, would keep Adolf Hitler at bay. But he was wrong, of course. When the German army crossed into Sudetenland, Newman's father, Oscar Karel Neumann, rushed down to the Canadian embassy in Prague and applied for a visa. Luckily for him, a Canadian Pacific Railway land agent he met there threw him a lifeline. The official composed a letter on his behalf stating that he was a farmer and a Catholic. At a time when Canada did not welcome European Jewish refugees, this recommendation was a lifesaver. In exchange, Oscar Karel promised to buy a farm from the CPR, using money he had deposited in Britain.

There was just one catch: the Neumanns had to convert to Christianity. They were converted in a Catholic church. But Newman never regarded his baptism seriously, saying it was "the religious equivalent of a Las Vegas wedding." The Neumanns fled Czechoslovakia, leaving behind grandparents who were sure they could weather the coming storm. They perished in Theresienstadt.

To reach the safety of Canada, the Neumanns made their way to Britain via Italy and France. On a beach in Biarritz, just north of the Pyrenees mountains, they were strafed by a German Junker. Having reached Canada in 1940, they bought a 15-acre farm in Freeman, an hour south of Toronto. And as Newman remembers, they felt "the sting of anti-Semitism" in Freeman. Oscar Karel, eager to prepare his son for success in their new homeland, sent him to Upper Canada College in Toronto. Newman managed to lose his Czech accent in six weeks, but felt like an outsider at UCC. Still, Newman was determined to make good. "So I now decided to become a WASP [White Anglo Saxon Protestant] and join the majority. It was a wise decision. Nearly all my successes would take place within WASP institutions."

Newman's desperation to fit in is a recurrent theme in Here Be Dragons. "I would like to report that I dug in and resisted the WASP dominance and proudly proclaimed my individuality, my ethnic background and my Semitic roots," he writes a few pages later. "But I did not." Longing to belong, he opted out of his Jewishness, though he never denied it. In a reference to his brush with death in Biarritz, he observes: "My only experience of the richness of my religious and ethnic heritage was the time it had nearly got me killed." One can be critical of Newman's quest for acceptance in the gentile world, but at least he is honest about his cravings.

At the University of Toronto, he signed on as a contributor to the student newspaper, the Varsity, but apparently never wrote a single story. His first published work, in fact, was a prize-winning poem that appeared in the Varsity. Newman's first paying job in journalism was at the Financial Post, where he summarized annual reports of Canadian companies. Shortly after being named production editor, he joined Maclean's as its first business editor.

Newman's first book, Flame of Power, was a compendium of Canadian businessmen. Feeling constrained by the limitations of newspaper and magazine journalism, he "discovered the pleasures" of book writing.

His next assignment, as Ottawa bureau chief for Maclean's, enabled him to consolidate his position as an up-and-coming reporter. But being a loner, he stuck out at the Ottawa press gallery. Quoting a colleague, Newman observes that its average member was "Conservative in his soul, Liberal in print and NDP at the bar."

Newman regards Renegade in Power: The Diefenbaker Years as his breakthrough book. The political journalism of his day had been dry and verbose. But in Renegade in Power, Newman claims, he wrote like a novelist, a "a storyteller bound by facts." John Diefenbaker, however, hated the book and denigrated Newman, snidely referring to him as Noyman. "Evidently, Noyman was some kind of Prairie code for Jewish," Newman writes. Pierre Sevigny, Diefenbaker's associate minister of defence, was even more scathing, contending that Newman intended "to make a fast buck, which is a typical Jewish trick."

Newman's account of his years at The Toronto Star, Canada's biggest daily, rivets a reader as well. After Newman proved himself as the Star's Ottawa columnist, publisher Beland Honderich invited him to be editor-in-chief. But Newman was disappointed to learn that he would be in charge of only the editorial and op-ed pages. The day-to-day news would be the responsibility of managing editor Martin Goodman. "The division of editorial power would haunt my tenure," Newman notes glumly.

Peter Newman when he was Maclean's editor

His only caller on his first day at the paper was the Israeli ambassador to Canada, who congratulated Newman on becoming the Star's first Jewish editor. In this capacity, Newman visited Israel, where he met defence minister Moshe Dayan, who reminded him of Canada's prime minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau. Newman describes Trudeau as an "emotional cripple" and says he and Dayan "shared an impatience with routine encounters, desperate boredom with protocol and unconcern for the feelings and the moods of others."

Yad Vashem touched a deep chord in Newman. "I realized why being Jewish was so important – why otherwise would six million people have been killed for it?" Later, after touring Theresienstadt, he waxes lyrical: "What I remember most clearly is that no birds sang in the trees… In the summer there are no butterflies."

Newman's account of his "double life" in the Canadian navy is frankly boring. But his reminiscences about his editorship of Maclean's is brisk. Admitting that his "management style" was an issue, he says that he was attacked for being either too dictatorial or too lax. "We argued a lot. It was not a place of sweetness and light." The real point is that Newman – a cultural nationalist – was a terrific editor who revived a moribund magazine and converted it into a relevant weekly.

Newman can be catty. For example, his portrait of Barbara Amiel, a former Maclean's writer and now wife of beleaguered businessman Conrad Black, seethes with sexual tension.

Justly famous for his books about Canada's business elite, starting with The Canadian Establishment, Newman was mesmerized by power. But the notion of Jewish power seems to fascinate him. Canadian Jewish tycoons wielded tremendous collective influence, but individually, their "wounded eyes and fragile egos" reflected "profound vulnerability." When he finished Bronfman Dynasty: The Rothschilds of the New World, the Bronfmans, through surrogate Leo Kolber, asked to read the manuscript. When Newman declined, Kolber turned downright nasty, unleashing a diatribe that no family newspaper can publish.

The recipient of a National Newspaper Award in feature writing, Newman devotes a chapter to the craft of journalism, and it is quite instructive. He likes writers who combine "a cold eye with a warm heart." He himself worked tirelessly to develop a style that fused "the best of creative writing with the hard-headed habits of journalism." But he acknowledges that he was not everybody's favourite. "My style of creative non-fiction was literary choreography, often savaged by the same critics who secretly enjoyed it." In short, Newman believes, "good writing captures character, while bad writing bleaches it out."

Newman, who has had four wives, the latest of whom is the love of his life, is satisfied that he has achieved virtually all his goals. "Yet the succession of failed relationships – professional, personal, romantic – left my heart weary," he admits. But Newman need not worry. He can bask in the glow of this bracing book, one of the finest memoirs of recent years.

Camp subsidies warm summer for kids left in the cold

Making a Jewish connection for disadvantaged youth

By ROCHELLE KAHN
Jewish Family & Child Service

With registration well underway for many camps this summer, Jewish Family & Child Service is not forgetting about children whose families cannot afford to provide them with a camping experience. When you're a Jewish kid living below the poverty line, summer camp is not only beyond reach, it's beyond imagination. That's why the Jewish Family and Child Service camp subsidy program is essential.

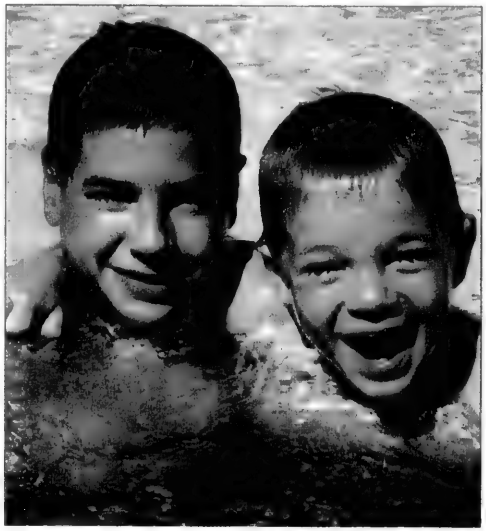
Donations to JF&CS, along with funds from the UJA Federation annual campaign, provided subsidies for more than 230 Toronto-area children and youth to attend Jewish day and overnight camps last year.

"It's a time when children connect with their Jewish identity in a powerful and lasting way," said Eric Kirsh, JF&CS Supervisor, Supplementary Financial Assistance. "They're surrounded by their peers, building a strong sense of community in a unique and somewhat independent setting."

"Camp is a great equalizer," Kirsh continued, "giving kids a positive Jewish environment within which they can connect culturally with others their own age and identity. For disadvantaged youth who may be marginalized and removed from active Jewish life, it's an effective way to help retain them as part of our community and bolster their sense of Jewish continuity."

One creative way to support these young people is by donating the necessities subsidized children need to fully participate in the camp experience. "There is a great and growing need to outfit our kids, especially first-timers, with the basics like sleeping bags, duffle bags, toiletries and sundry items like flashlights and water bottles", said Karen Paikin, JF&CS Manager of Communications. "We have had donors design wonderful simcha baskets (centerpieces at B'nai Mitzvah celebrations) filled with camp supplies for our kids' use. Recently a Toronto shul initiated a drive to fully furnish five kids with everything they need to attend camp on the same footing with any other child. It's a very tachlis (practical) way of getting involved with JF&CS and making a child's summer dream come to life."

Some 3000 Jewish children in the Greater Toronto Area live in poverty, but JF&CS cannot, at this time, accommodate all children in need. "Without the JF&CS camp subsidy program, said Executive Director Ron Levin, "these kids would miss out on a critical component of their self-development and Jewish growth."



JF&CS camp subsidies help make a child's summer dream come to life

Jewish Family & Child Service has saved a place for you

Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) dates back to 1868 when it was founded as a benevolent aid society. Operating out of four locations in the GTA today, it is a vibrant, responsive, multi-functional agency providing both family counseling and community programs. As an accredited Children's Aid Society, JF&CS has a mandated responsibility for all Jewish children in the GTA under the age of 16, who are in need of care, protection and a permanent home.

JF&CS offers something for every age, social and economic background. Many programs and services are provided in Hebrew and Russian, reflecting the changing profile of our Jewish community. No one is denied assistance because of an inability to pay. Supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the United Way and the Ontario government, JF&CS is committed to serving the complex needs of Toronto's diverse and growing Jewish population. JF&CS responds to changing times and the evolving needs of our community through innovative and creative programs and services.

Special JF&CS highlights include:

- The Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre – a day treatment program for adolescents with emotional and/or behavioural problems;
- Foster Care, including the Henry G. Goodman Home for developmentally handicapped children;
- Jewish Hospice, providing compassionate home-centred care to meet the needs of terminally ill Jewish patients and their families;
- Multi-lingual Access Program, offering volunteers for clients with linguistic and cultural barriers, to assist their access to community services;
- Chaplaincy Services to visit more than 1,200 residents living in 113 health care facilities and penal institutions in Toronto and the surrounding area;
- Just a Second Shop, allowing community members to purchase new and gently used clothing with dignity.

Jewish Family and Child Service makes a place for everyone and there's a place for you too. There are so many ways you can help JF&CS serve the most vulnerable members of our community.

To find out more about how you can make a difference, please call Jewish Family and Child Service at 416-638-7800 or visit www.jfandcs.com.

Here to Help breaks the cycle of abuse

Program offers healing for children and moms

Toronto's Jewish Family and Child Service is continually breaking down long-held myths about life in the Jewish community, as it reaches out to serve its members. Common misconceptions abound from within and without, about how Toronto Jewry is – or isn't – touched by social and economic realities like poverty, divorce, substance abuse, homelessness and violence against women.

Here to Help, a powerful initiative of the JF&CS Woman Abuse Program, is overturning a different kind of stereotype in a very positive way. As Program Coordinator Alyson Pancer explained, "there's a common myth that children raised with domestic violence are destined to become either abusers or victims in their own adult lives, but, with early intervention," Pancer continued, "these kids can learn that there are healthier ways to handle relationships and stop the intergenerational cycle of abuse."

Since its 2001 inception, Here to Help has provided assistance to more than 170 women and their children. The 12-week psycho-educational program offers healing after abuse to children and mothers and "enables moms to reclaim their position as parents," noted Debby Feldman, Supervisor of the JF&CS Woman Abuse Program. "Parenting is different in an abusive situation. For mothers, Here to Help presents an opportunity to empower themselves as parents. For children, there's an opportunity to talk about what may have been hidden in their families, to discuss and label the abuse, and to find alternative ways to solve problems. They learn about safety and how to reach out for help if they need to."

Jewish Family and Child Service is the lead agency for the provincially funded Here to Help, a partnership of six agencies, all providing service to women and families who experience abuse. "JF&CS was chosen to lead Here to Help because prior to this initiative, we had already been successfully providing a similar program for children and mothers exposed to abuse," Pancer said.

Geared to children aged 4 to 16, Here to Help is free and open to all kids and their moms. "We are proud to deliver a service," Feldman noted, "that values all of the unique ethnic, racial and cultural communities in our city. Women and children are united in their exploration of shared issues. The groups help to dispel the myth that woman abuse happens more often in one particular culture than another. We know that is not the case and Here to Help is here to help everyone."

The children themselves are the best reflection of just how effective the program is. In the words of one young participant, "The most important thing I learned in group was that it's not my fault and you can always tell someone what happened. I can talk about my family and my feelings with people who understand and I don't have to be afraid."

Please contact Alyson Pancer at 416-638-7800, extension 208, for more information about Here to Help.

JF&CS reaches out to extend a Happy Pesach to all

Enabling client families to celebrate with dignity

By ROCHELLE KAHN
Jewish Family & Child Service

On Passover evening, we traditionally usher in the seder with the invitation "all who are hungry, let them come and eat; all who are needy, let them come and celebrate Passover with us." Thanks to Toronto's Annual Food Drive, organized by the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) and assisted by UJA Federation and community volunteers, more than 650 JF&CS client families will be able to celebrate Passover with dignity.

In addition, Jewish Family and Child Service provides special financial assistance to its clients at Passover, empowering them to have a hand in holiday shopping and personalize their celebration and observance. "Jews who have to scrape to get by each month, often choosing between rent and food, cannot possibly afford celebrating a holiday like Passover. Food costs are astronomical," observed Eric Kirsh of JF&CS who directs the Supplementary Financial Assistance program.

This situation extends beyond a missed opportunity to have Seder or keep Pesach. As Kirsh explained, "Passover foods represent more than the laws of the holiday; they symbolize belonging. Enabling fellow Jews to celebrate Passover, even if they aren't religious, connects them with community and strengthens their Jewish identity. It eases their isolation."

"Even former clients, who are no longer served by our year-round Financial Assistance Program," said Kirsh, "can apply for Passover support. The reality is, while their situation may have improved, these people are still living below the poverty line and Passover remains a significant issue. The need doesn't just disappear and neither do we."

Ron Levin, Executive Director of Jewish Family and Child Service, underlined the extent of Jewish poverty, reporting that an estimated 20,000 Toronto Jews here live below the poverty line. The problem is most evident in the city's traditional Jewish hub – Bathurst Street between Finch and Steeles. "Twenty-five 25 per cent of this neighbourhood's Jews are impoverished. As Metro's Jewish population returns to its roots downtown and expands north to Vaughan, the crisis inevitably follows. Today's profile of Jews in poverty is indiscriminant and diverse – in a heartbeat, it could be you or me."

You can give a Toronto family a Chag Kasher v'sameach, by calling 416-638-7800 to make a donation to JF&CS and supporting the Annual Passover Food Drive, 416- 633- 5100, www.ncjwc-ts.org.

Making a New Country feel like a New Home

Workshop breaks through immigrant isolation

The face of Jewish Toronto continues to change and mature, in part due to ongoing immigration in recent years. For many newcomers to Canada, however, the promise of a fresh start in a new country is diminished by a sense of isolation and difficulty coping with the overwhelming transition. Language differences can be a barrier; culture and customs may feel strange. It's not always easy to make a new country feel like a new home.

But Jewish Family and Child Service is enabling recent immigrants to do just that through its New Country, New Home program launched last year. Run by two of the agency's social workers – one a Russian immigrant herself – this unique six-session workshop has already helped over 100 women adjust more comfortably to life in Toronto.

Debby Feldman, JF&CS Supervisor of Group Programs, described the rationale behind New Country, New Home. "We discovered a gap in the services offered to new immigrants," she said. "It became obvious we needed to find a way to help them break through their seclusion and find a comfortable place to talk about the challenges of transition, all the subtle differences in moving to a new country. Our workshop does that, addressing issues like education, support systems, and the complex realities of the working world."

Sharing new challenges and old memories at New Country, New Home program.

An essential ingredient in New Country, New Home's success is its respect for members' country of origin. "We reinforce the value of what they have brought with them, identifying their individual skills, knowledge and abilities and transferring those into their new environment and social system," Feldman noted. "The program is run in English, but accommodates Russian, Hebrew and Spanish-speaking clients who have only a working knowledge of English."

According to Tanya Korobchevski and Annette Kurtz, the two social workers facilitating New Country, New Home, the program fosters self-esteem and a more positive outlook on life.

"My client was let go from a full-time job and became depressed. She came to us for help and started in New Country, New Home," said Korobchevski. Afterward, she wrote to us, saying: 'From the moment I joined the group, I was made to feel there is nothing wrong about my situation or me, that people can lose their jobs and have temporary difficulties in finding one. The JF&CS workshop, New Country, New Home, helped me to believe in myself and in the possibility of finding a good job again. The same day I attended the workshop, I had a phone call for an interview that happened to be in two hours after the workshop. I received an offer from the employer because I felt so confident and positive'."

The next New Country, New Home workshop will begin in late spring. For details, call Tanya Korobchevski, 416-638-7800, extension 204.

Rabbi Weiss brings new meaning to "Serve and Protect"

Rabbi Ronald Weiss, Director of Chaplaincy Services for JF&CS, has been appointed Jewish Chaplain to the Toronto Police Service. This distinction further reinforces Jewish Family and Child Service's position as the official address and first point of contact for police and government matters, pertaining to Jewish spiritual concerns. For 45 years, JF&CS Chaplaincy Services has worked to meet the challenging needs of Jews in Ontario health care facilities and correctional institutes.

Family's scotch a bris tradition

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

On Jan. 30, 1946, Sheldon Parker's grandfather, Shmuel Pearl, opened a 26½-oz. bottle of Old Parr scotch whiskey for a "l'chaim" at Parker's brit milah. He marked the date and the occasion on a piece of paper to be taped to the bottle, and signed it along with his wife, Rivka.

Last week Parker opened the same bottle at the brit milah of his first grandson, Jesse Walton.

In the intervening 59 years, the bottle has been covered with notes, now yellowing, that commemorate the family occasions on which it has been consumed – Parker's bar mitzvah and and that of his son Jay, to name a couple.

The old and new bottles of scotch.

"This was a tradition for the first-born grandchild," Parker told The CJN. He believes it originated in his grandfather's hometown of Logov, Poland.

Parker remembers his grandfather, with whom he had a close relationship, as a "very gentle, traditional, religious soul." Pearl, who worked in the furniture business in Toronto, immigrated in the early 1930s, and worked here for almost nine years before returning to Poland with plans to establish a business there. Rivka, who had remained in Europe, convinced him that it was urgent to leave.

Parker said he finds it very touching to "be able to pass a tradition down from my grandfather's generation to the next. It's all about continuity and recognizing the value of what's come before."

Two surviving uncles, the last of his grandfather's generation, their wives, and Parker's mother were on hand to share in the family ritual. The scotch was in "perfect" condition and still drinkable, according to Parker.

Thirteen family members also raised a glass from a new bottle of Scotch, purchased specially for the occasion and marked with a fresh, computer-printed label.

"It's a great thing to be able to reach back in time and touch something that's been symbolic to somebody 60 years ago [who was] the elder of the family."

Parker said he gained much from his grandfather, who died in 1983 at age 92. The main things, he said, were his love for family and his love of Judaism, embodied in a sense of "Yiddishkeit as something to be enjoyed."

The Markham, Ont., lawyer has taken that lesson to heart. A past president and current board member of Adath Israel Congregation and a past vice-president of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Ontario region, he put himself through university teaching Hebrew school at Holy Blossom Temple, Adath Israel Congregation and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. A graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and Midrasha L'Morim (to train as a Jewish studies teacher), he also is a former director of youth activities at Adath Israel and Beth Sholom Synagogue and a former assistant director of Camp Massad.

Parker's daughter, Stacey Walton, a teacher at the Toronto Heschel School, said she and her husband Jeff are excited at the prospect of continuing the tradition her great-grandfather started at her father's brit milah. "I think it's beautiful."

Former Congress president succumbs to cancer

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

In many ways, Milton Harris embodied the prototypical Canadian success story.

A child of the Depression, he shook off his humble beginnings and parlayed his father's bankrupt scrap metal business into a multi-million dollar, publicly traded steel company. A champion of the underdog, he fought against the injustice that limited the prospects of his fellow Jews and he championed the rights of other groups, including Japanese Canadians, Aboriginal Peoples and the poor.

A devoted family man, he rarely missed an evening meal or a weekend with his kids, despite a hectic schedule.

The president of Canadian Jewish Congress and later of its war crimes committee, he fought hard to bring to justice Nazi war criminals who had made Canada their home.

Known to colleagues as a modern-day Renaissance man, Harris succumbed to cancer last week after a brief illness. He was 77.

Harris spent the formative years of his life in London, Ont., before moving with his family to Toronto in 1969. He was heavily influenced by his maternal grandparents, Morris and Rachel Soskin, whose values of caring for the less privileged members of the community he later embodied.

From an early age, he showed an interest in politics and helping the little guy, recalled his wife of 58 years, Ethel. He joined Young Judaea at age eight and eventually rose to become its national president. When he was 11, he wrote to then British prime minister Neville Chamberlain, congratulating him for his success at Munich in gaining "peace for our time," she recounted.

He and Ethel met while attending the University of Toronto, and one of their first dates was at a fundraising show performed by Wayne and Shuster to raise money for the Haganah, Israel's pre-state self-defence force.

A devoted Zionist, as a young man he became leader of the London Jewish community and fought to remove barriers that restricted Jews from joining exclusive clubs, although "he wasn't a club person," Ethel recalled. "He was a very informal kind of person who just looked at people as they were."

Milton Harris

Irving Abella, a history professor and like Harris, a former president of Canadian Jewish Congress, recalled that in the 1960s, Harris urged his well-to-do colleagues to boycott private clubs that excluded Jews. The boycott worked and the clubs opened their doors to Jews, Abella said.

As president of Congress in the mid-1980s, Harris was instrumental in the political fight to convince the federal government to take action against Nazi war criminals, Abella said.

Under Harris, Congress supported the Deschenes Commission investigation into Canada's role in harbouring war criminals and it supported criminal prosecutions of these fugitives from justice.

During his administration, Harris moved Congress in new directions and made the organization a national player on a number of important issues. Congress called on the federal government to make redress to Japanese Canadians for their mistreatment during World War II. He forged relationships with native Canadians, taking "the Jewish community places it had never been before," Abella said.

"Milton was never afraid to take a position even if no one else took it... Better than anyone else, he was a leader," he added.

Abella described Harris as his "mentor" when he took the reins of Congress, and he continued Harris' efforts to broaden the Congress agenda to include a range of issues that could not be considered solely Jewish in nature.

Abella recalled Harris as a man of great intellect, strength and generosity. "Milton loved to argue. He loved discussion. He loved debate."

Through the strength of his intellect, he created a consensus and gained support for his positions. As someone who grew up in a small Jewish community, he recognized the need to expand input into Congress from smaller communities, Abella said.

He also held strong views on the Middle East peace process, urging Israel to be conciliatory to the Palestinians. Following his term in office as the head of Congress, he joined the Peace Now movement, Abella said.

Tony Woolfson, Harris' son-in-law, said Harris always opposed settlements in Palestinian territories and was an early proponent of a two-state solution to the Middle East conflict.

While politically adroit and a longtime Liberal, he turned down a request from Pierre Elliott Trudeau in 1968 to run for the Liberal party. "He knew it would destroy his family life," Woolfson said.

Instead, he spent a lot of time with his family and was a down to earth fellow. "He was approachable and totally unpretentious," Woolfson said.

Ethel said her husband's proudest honour was being named to the Order of Canada.

Still, he remained informal, and for years was known for his trademark turtleneck sweaters.

Beth Emeth celebrates its 50-year jubilee

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Since they were married almost 50 years ago, Margo and Norman Grosbein have had a home away from their Bathurst Manor home.

The Grosbeins, who joined the fledgling Bathurst Manor Jewish Association when they were engaged to be married, have celebrated their son's bar mitzvah, his wedding, and a baby naming for their granddaughter, and they are planning to celebrate their 50th anniversary at what is now known as Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

They are also taking an active part in the synagogue's golden jubilee celebrations, a year full of events geared to members of every age.

Margo, who became the first female president of the synagogue in 1997 and has worked for 20 years in its Gan Yeladim, the synagogue's nursery school, says the couple has watched with pride as the congregation has grown from a small group of Bathurst Manor residents– many of them Holocaust survivors and young couples – to the third largest Conservative congregation in Canada, with about 1,400 member families.

"People came to Beth Emeth and stayed," she says.

Jerry Shefsky attended his first general meeting in 1958, "and before I knew it I was elected president with a mandate to 'build us a shul.'

"With help from our members, we were able to build a $700,000 building – it was completed in 1959 – with $325,000. To name just a few, Manny Grosbein did the electrical work, Harry Baum did the plumbing, Harry Lerman provided us with the sand and gravel, and David Raitblat, who was not even a member, donated the steel."

Liturgical music by Hazan Zvee Arent, one of the world's famous cantors

One of his first acts as president, he says, was to raise the motion to have the synagogue changed from Orthodox to Conservative, "because the people moving into the area were not Orthodox. At the time of the vote, there were 27 paying members, and the vote was passed 15 to 12.

"We named our congregation Beth Emeth, and the 12 [dissenting] members left to form Beth Jacob. One act created two synagogues in Bathurst Manor," says Shefsky, who has celebrated bar mitzvahs for his four sons, and a baby naming for his granddaughter, at Beth Emeth.

It was also in 1958 that Rabbi Joseph Kelman became the congregation's first permanent rabbi, remaining until his retirement in 1996. Among his many accomplishments, he founded Kadima, a Hebrew school for developmentally challenged Jewish children.

In 1971, he established the Kadima Centre to fulfil the recreational, social and cultural needs of developmentally and physically challenged young adults.

The success of the Kadima program, says Rabbi Kelman, was responsible for him developing the Reena Foundation.

"I was called Joseph the dreamer. I dreamed of offering a Jewish education to all people through a variety of programs. Some of what we did inspired programs throughout Canada and the Jewish world," he says.

He also oversaw the merger, in 1963, of Beth Emeth and Bais Yehuda Synagogue, a downtown congregation of about 177 members that was suffering from declining membership. In 1975, the shul absorbed another downtown congregation, the Hebrew Men of England.

In 1973, Cantor Louis Danto, a world-class tenor, joined the congregation, and remained for 25 years.

Current synagogue president Pearl Grunland, who joined the shul in 1982, says Beth Emeth is a congregation for the generations.

"It is a very special place. In any given service, we can see different generations of the same family sitting together.

"We're proud that Rabbi Kelman and Cantor Danto have remained active in our shul community. It is true that people come and never leave," says Grunland, whose daughter will be married at the synagogue at the end of the year.

At a recent Purim party, which was "overflowing" with about 500 people, Grunland says she was gratified to see so many young members. "We all want the synagogue to be carried toward the future so there will be a home for our children."

She credits the shul's current senior rabbi, Howard Morrison, who was hired in 2000, and Cantor Aaron Bensoussan, at the synagogue since 1999, for attracting younger members. "Their dynamism is definitely a draw."

When he was first introduced to the synagogue five years ago, Rabbi Morrison says, "I immediately saw something special and sacred. I saw a synagogue that embraces all Jews, from those who attend daily services to those that come less frequently.

Israel must be ready to discuss Jerusalem: scholar

By ADI NEUBERGER
Special to The CJN

The status of Jerusalem is one of the most contentious obstacles to Mideast peace, and while even discussing it remains unthinkable to many, Israel must prepare itself to deal with the issue, say scholars from the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies (JIIS).

After an extended period of violence and with a new atmosphere of hope following the death of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, it's time to consider such hotly contested topics as "peaceful disengagement" and the future of holy sites, including the Western Wall and the Al-Aqsa Mosque, Ora Ahimeir, the executive director of the Jerusalem-based think-tank, said recently at Beth Sholom Synagogue.

"We are still very far away from putting Jerusalem on the table, but we must be ready when that day comes," warned Ahimeir, who, along with JIIS president Yaacov Bar Siman-Tov and researcher Yitzhak Reiter, were in Toronto to provide an update on the topic.

The panel's local stop was part of a North American tour sponsored by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and the Jerusalem Foundation.

"It's our duty to be prepared, to think about the next steps very seriously and to come up with plausible solutions to the problems," said Ahimeir, adding "there is no time to lose" with Jerusalem's population heading for a 40-60 per cent Palestinian-Jewish split by 2112.

Reiter said Israel must develop a strategy for dealing with the "Islamicization of Jerusalem," which he described as a trend in which Muslims have been attaching greater importance to Jerusalem and its holy sites by creating questionable historical and religious linkages to the city.

Using examples from such sources as Muslim websites and fatwas, Reiter discussed how Jerusalem and the Temple Mount are viewed in the Muslim world.

He described what he called a "comprehensive anti-Semitic campaign against Jerusalem and the Jews being carried out at the highest political levels."

Among Reiter's conclusions is that over the last 4½ years, Jerusalem and the Al-Aqsa Mosque have been elevated in sacredness to unprecedented levels, making the Muslim holy site on the Temple Mount almost more important than Mecca.

Reiter also raised concern about evidence that Muslims are rewriting the history of Jerusalem to emphasize Muslim links to the city.

"The effect of Islamicizing the history of Jerusalem is to deny the Jewish affiliation with holy sites such as the Western Wall, while claiming that places such as the Temple Mount are Jewish inventions," Reiter said, calling the findings both "terrifying and discouraging."

Reiter also highlighted Muslim claims that Israeli archeological digs are intentionally damaging the mosque to the point where it will ultimately be destroyed, as well as claims that Jews have unleashed an infestation of mice underneath the mosque and that Jerusalem is a captive city that is inaccessible to non-Jews.

"Exposing these myths and distortions and confronting Arab leaders with them is our most important task," said Reiter, who proposes forming a group of scholars to respond to the anti-Jewish campaign.

Adding to the enormous challenge, he said, is that these dangerous messages are rampant even in more moderate Arab countries such as Egypt and Jordan, which already have peace agreements with Israel.

Turning to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to unilaterally disengage from Gaza, Bar Siman-Tov, one of Israel's foremost experts on conflict management and the Arab-Israeli conflict, described it as "one of the country's riskiest policies to date."

Calling the controversial plan a "dramatic change" from Israel's earlier foreign and security policies, Bar Siman-Tov, who has held close discussions with Israel's current leaders about the emotionally charged issue, said he believes its peaceful implementation is the only hope for reaching an agreement between Israeli and Palestinians.

Public opinion polls show 65 per cent of Israelis support Sharon's disengagement plan, and Bar Siman-Tov said that "Israeli society remains deeply divided because the policy, unlike previous Israeli withdrawals, so far, comes with nothing tangible in exchange."

The problem, he said, "is that it is being done with no guarantees for peace."

Shul marks 50th anniversary

"I also saw a congregation that is an important centre of Jewish life where older members stay and young families continue to join. Our members are anchored throughout the city. We are a magnet congregation."

Bernice Levine, Beth Emeth's executive director for 31 years – she is retiring in December – says she has seen a lot of things change since she started. "The membership has grown, technology has taken over, we've changed a number of rules and policies, and we've seen many people, unfortunately, die, but the special thing is that Beth Emeth has remained the same. What was Beth Emeth still is Beth Emeth."

The jubilee year began with a cabaret in November, and will continue with a gala dinner and dance on April 14. A Shabbat luncheon on April 16 will honour founding members, and Bernice Levine will be honoured on her upcoming retirement.

On Nov. 17, Ward 10 councillor and deputy mayor Mike Feldman, a past Beth Emeth president, will be awarded the Yakir Hakahal Award at the Jubilee Yakir Hakahal dinner.

New Israel Fund focuses on democratic values

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Since its inception in 1979, the New Israel Fund (NIF) and its staff have always faced criticism.

"Our story is not easy to understand because we're not putting up buildings or giving clothes to the poor," says outgoing executive director of New Israel Fund, Canada, Minda Davis.

Jay Brodbar

"What we are doing is teaching people [in Israel] how to be independent, how to come together as a community and how to access their rights as full citizens of the country, whether they're Ethiopian, Russian or Arab."

In its promotional material, the NIF describes itself as an organization that "works to strengthen Israel's democracy and promote freedom, justice and equality for all Israel's citizens." It goes on to say that the fund represents a philanthropic partnership of Israelis, North Americans and Europeans "dedicated to defining the cutting edge of social change."

Even though many of their initial programs have now become mainstream, their projects tend to face criticism at the outset. The most recent attack comes from the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs which accuses the organization of supporting radical non-governmental organizations (NGOs).

In its March 10 newsletter, NGO Monitor, The Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs claims that "although many of the NGOs that are still receiving money from the New Israel Fund have admirable goals related to civil and human rights on paper, the record demonstrates that [four grantees] continue to use the rhetoric of demonization to propagate an extremist anti-Israel agenda."

The grantees mentioned are Adalah, the Arab Center for Alternative Planning, the Association of Forty and HaMoked: Center for the Defense of the Individual.

Jay Brodbar, the new director of the NIF, Canada, said that "in a democracy, we cannot control the pronouncements of organizations, including those we may disagree with.

"However, while the nature of free speech in a democracy must be respected, the New Israel Fund has been clear in its vision of and commitment to Israel as a Jewish and democratic state."

Brodbar believes the way to build a strong Israel is to focus on its internal institutions. The Israeli Declaration of Independence, which sits on Brodbar's desk, assures all inhabitants of "equality and social and political rights… irrespective of religion, race or sex."

"I use those principles to guide me," Brodbar said, adding that Israel is a country ruled by law, and NIF supports free speech laws, whether they are used to protect the settlers' rights to present their views, or Israeli Arab groups' right to put forward their perspectives.

"Of course, incitement to violence and incitement to illegally overturn the decisions of a real government – those go beyond the pale," Brodbar said.

"As Israel matures as a democracy, it faces the same challenges as Canada in terms of balancing the competing rights of its various sub-groups, and in so doing, it is crucial to hold the government accountable for its actions towards all of its citizens," said Brodbar, who taught at Western Michigan and Brandeis universities and worked at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for several years before becoming executive director of the NIF.

"These are all core Canadian values and exist in any maturing democracy, and there aren't that many in the world," Brodbar said.

Davis said it came as a bit of a surprise to her that many people in the community felt that "if you questioned Israel's actions in any way, you were accused of betrayal and being disloyal."

"How can you say that?" Davis used to wonder. "No country is perfect and I don't understand why we would accept any less in terms of values, than we would accept here.

"Israel is a wonderful country," she added. "But if you don't recognize its problems, how can you fix them?"

If we don't work towards improving the lives of the marginalized communities, they will never feel that they have anything to lose by opposing the State of Israel, she said.

Born in Belleville, Ont., Davis said growing up Jewish in small town Ontario forced her to recognize the importance of respecting each other.

As a minority, "we always felt that we had to be true to very good values, because people were always watching to see if we made any mistakes."

Those memories led Davis to the NIF. "Their work really resonated with me," she said, and in 1997, she left her job as the first female vice-president for Canada Life to become executive director of the New Israel Fund, Canada.

During its 25 year history, the NIF was one of the first organizations to found rape crisis centres and homes for abused women. Now, Davis said, these programs are supported by mainstream organizations.

Through Shatil, which means seedling, the NIF encourages the development of social change organizations in Israel. That way, Israelis are involved with the problems in their own communities.

The organization's other projects include working toward religious pluralism, promoting civil and human rights, and pursuing social and economic justice. It supports counselling centres for haredi women and improving the environment in urban neighbourhoods.

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is May 6th, 2005.

Offensive material at shul steps over the line

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

Guest Voice

Over the last few weeks, the level of rhetoric in the Jewish community has been heating up, both in Israel and here in Canada. Jews who feel that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has "sold out" and abandoned Zionist principles by contemplating a withdrawal from Gaza are saying so openly. Jews on the other side of the political spectrum are raising angry voices against those who suggest (or seem to suggest) that the rule of law in the State of Israel is not as important as holding on to territory. Here on the pages of The Canadian Jewish News some strong words have been exchanged between Jews on the right and Jews on the left, but those exchanges have generally stayed within the boundaries of the tolerable.

But beyond the well-edited boundaries of this paper, the rhetoric has reached levels that are truly deplorable. In synagogue on a recent Shabbat, I was shocked as I read a local publication titled Israel News – which is distributed in most Toronto-area Orthodox synagogues, and a few non-Orthodox synagogues as well – that reproduced a speech given by a respected local lay person. In the speech, the speaker makes the very strange claim that if Orthodox Jews simply read the Bible the way evangelical Christians do – without any commentaries, without anything other than the text – they would see more clearly what has to be done.

I reproduce below the precise lesson from the biblical text suggested by that author. (I have changed no spelling and no punctuation from the article's printed version.)

"Avraham was told that there were ten nations occupying the land of Canaan. Seven of those ten nations did not abide by the seven laws of Noach, the seven laws of human decency, including Thou Shalt Not Murder. In Parshat VaEtchanan, Perek Zayin, Pasuk Alef and Bet, the Torah addresses how the Bnai Yisrael should deal with those nations occupying their land, Eretz Yisrael: Ki Yeviacha Hashem Elochecha el Haaretz Asher Ata Ba Shama L'Rishta When Hashem brings you to the Land that you will inherit... Unetenam Hashem Elochecha lephanecha V'Hekeetam Hashem will deliver before you the nations occupying the land and you shall smite them Hacharem Dacharem Otum You must wipe them out Lo Tichrot lahem brit Do not sign a peace treaty with them V'Lo Tenachem And above all do not give them any recognition. No Oslo accords. No Camp David handshake. No Road Map. Hacharem Dacharem Otum as long as they are not prepared to abide by the very basic code of decency, Thou Shalt Not Murder. Right there in our text. Right there, in our Torah."

The writer is suggesting that Deuteronomy 7:1-2 teaches us that the appropriate way of dealing with some undefined "them" today (Does the writer mean all Palestinians? All Muslims? All Arabs? Only some of them?) is not to make deals with "them" but to wipe "them" out, since they are all murderers.

The application of this verse from Deuteronomy to Israel's current political problems is vexing. Why not rather apply Deuteronomy 20:10, "When you approach a town to attack it, you shall offer it terms of peace"? Jewish exegetes have disagreed about the scope of that law, but some of the greatest Bible scholars and legal experts – for example Moses Maimonides and Moses ben Nachman (Ramban) – have written that that law applies to every imaginable Jewish conflict, even when dealing with the evil Canaanites. (See my Rashbam on Deuteronomy: An Annotated Translation, pp. 120-121, footnote 54.)

Yet it is as an Orthodox rabbi, not as a Bible scholar, that I am most distressed when hateful, racist ideas such as this – identifying the members of some national group as all being murderers – are circulated widely in synagogues throughout my city. The author is not only suggesting that murderers with blood on their hands should be wiped out, but that some group –"they" – are all murderers and should be annihilated. Sadly, this is not the first time that I have heard words like this in our community.

It's true that it is unlikely that a group of Thornhill Jews will read Deuteronomy 7, as explicated in Israel News, and arise en masse to go and wipe "them" out. And it's also true that some of our enemies produce more hateful literature about Jews and Israelis, and do so more frequently. But what Judaism requires of us is not simply that we be better than our enemies.

Local educators have a responsibility to deal with local problems. If our community has been infected with hatred of this nature, if our synagogues disseminate offensive literature, we have much to correct and much to teach.

Jewish Life

Peace of mind without inner conflict

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH

Sometime ago, an interesting random e-mail seized my attention. It read: F.A.M.I.L.Y (Father And Mother I Love You). I do not know the source of this mnemonic; however, the message was concise and clear.

The family is the very fabric of society and any hope of nurturing children to become healthy, functional adults must come from it, with the prescribed moral ingredients described in our Torah.

In the book of Genesis (2:24), it says: "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother and cleave to his wife, and they shall become one flesh."

The family begins when a man and a woman unite to set up a home. Without this unity, we have the first threat to the family concept. In order to be in harmony with the marriage objective, it is a necessary mitzvah for a man to ensure that his wife has priority.

This does not imply neglect of his parents or ascribe less importance to them. Rather, there should be no competition or rivalry between the love of his parents and the love of his wife. When a man does not understand this, he introduces into his married life serious grounds for conflict that will lead to dissension and eventual destruction of the family bond.

What is the source of this conflict? In the verse following the mitzvah to cleave to one's wife, in Genesis (2:25), it says: "They were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not ashamed." The Torah informs us that the union of man and his wife was not a source of shame.

Yet we find a seeming puzzling reoccurrence of this verse with a different message later in Genesis (3:7-8): "Then the eyes of both of them were opened, and they knew that they were naked! Then they sewed fig leaves together and made themselves aprons. And they heard the voice of God withdrawing itself in the garden at the breeze of the day. Then the man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God amongst the trees of the garden."

In the earlier verse, the remark is made that man and his wife were naked but not ashamed, whereas in the latter verse, after having eaten from the forbidden tree, their eyes were opened and they knew they were naked. Is there a difference between being and knowing?

Yes, there is. Before eating of the forbidden tree, Adam and his wife, Eve, were living the fruit of this harmony because they were in alignment with God's will. With their ability to exercise their free will, they became conscious of their act of disobedience, to the extent that they hid themselves in the garden.

This conscious knowledge can be summarized in one word – shame. The word for shame in the Torah is boshash, to feel disappointed in one's self for having fallen short of a moral objective. By looking inward, we can know where we have been mistaken. The goal of good therapy is to regain control of our mistaken views and habits, which is achieved by taking responsibility to correct any misalignment of appropriate moral conduct.

What causes the family to break apart with the resulting consequences – broken children and unfulfilled lives – are inner conflicts. At the helm of these conflicts are the moral choices we make.

Morality is not the possession of mankind – it is a gift of God, a map to direct us to clear pathways where conflicts are immediately resolved before they grow into accepted lifestyles, like a cancer out of control that seeks to destroy us and those we love.

Rabbi David Cadoch is a talmid of HaGaon HaRav Leib Baron shlit'a of Montreal and a member of the Rabbinical Council of Canada and Rabbinical Council of America.

On this night, we're all children

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

As in many other houses, the nightly book reading ritual with our children as they have grown up is sacred time. To be honest, I must confess that these sessions, which ostensibly satisfy my children's desire to "hear a story," are as important to me as they are to them, and maybe just as nurturing. A good children's book not only provides optimism and security, it usually stresses something that adults often have little formal access to in their daily lives – teachings about morality and how to be a good person.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Consider the following four books, which I have read regularly to my children over the years. I consider them to be examples of the kind of exposure to the ethical realm that we all require on a consistent basis.

In Jacqueline Jules' The Hardest Word, a lovely Yom Kippur tale, a mythical creature named the Ziz makes a big mistake that he does not initially accept responsibility for. God sends the Ziz to find the hardest word, which turns out not to be "ridiculous" or "Mississippi," but simply the one that is the most difficult for all human beings to say – "sorry."

Or consider a beautiful story about preparing for and celebrating a Shabbat in Ethiopia, Maxine Rose Schur's Day of Delight. My children were profoundly struck by the simplicity, and yet goodness of, the life portrayed in this book, as well as by the values of hard work, interdependence and respect for the rhythms of the world that are embedded in its every page.

Some children's stories naturally advertise themselves as explicit attempts to educate in a thematic fashion. In Seven Animal Stories for Children, the authors weave together tales from Jewish tradition – from Noah to King David – each one demonstrating how animals can teach us about appropriate demeanour. Some of these themes include modesty, gratitude, friendship and honesty.

And in Leah Shollar's A Thread of Kindness, adapted from the midrash, the main emphasis is on the need for generosity and how tzedakah is one of the pillars of existence.

The list of such books for children is endless. Yet, while our kids are getting massive literary doses of ethical teachings, almost on a constant basis, are grownups receiving similar infusions? With the rush of modern life being so all-encompassing, who will "read to us," fill us with the reminders that we need about what is important in life and how we should be treating others?

The answer is as obvious as it is difficult. The Torah study that adults do – be it in Halachah, Biblical commentary, Talmudic learning or Jewish history – dare not confine itself exclusively to intellectual fancies or cold legalism without creating a forum for us to learn how to strive for a better world. Jewish texts must be mined for their ethical significance, and the rituals we carry out must speak to us in a deep way about our existential perch in a finite time span.

The Pesach seder is one such golden opportunity, and it also highlights the irony of emphasizing a night organized around children's curiosity while neglecting our own. Perhaps what the Sages truly intended was that on this night, at the very least, we are all focused on wonder, all open to learning, all unashamedly searching for our path in life. In other words, we are all children.

Objections to the Thirteen Principles

The Limits of Orthodox Theology: Maimonides' Thirteen Principles Reappraised* by Marc. B. Shapiro, Littman Library of Jewish Civilization.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Renowned as Judaism's most esteemed philosopher, Maimonides (1139-1204) is also honoured for his groundbreaking multi-volume work known as the Mishneh Torah. This stupendous feat of scholarship simplified and categorized the vast corpus of Jewish law. In concise and clear Hebrew, it spelled out Talmudic rulings without the complex and protracted debates of the sages.

In his commentary to the Mishnah, his first popular work, Maimonides formulated Thirteen Principles of faith. A Jew who did not believe in any of them, he wrote, would be considered a heretic with no share in the world to come.

The Thirteen Principles may be summarized as follows: (1) that God exists; (2) that God is one; (3) that God is incorporeal; (4) that God is ontologically prior to the world; (5) that God alone is a fit object of worship; (6) that prophecy occurs; (7) that the prophecy of Moses is superior to that of all other prophets; (8) that the Torah was revealed from heaven; (9) that the Torah will never be uprooted or altered; (10) that God knows the acts of human beings; (11) that God rewards the righteous and punishes the wicked; (12) that the Messiah will come; and (13) that the dead will be resurrected.

Their widespread acceptance is illustrated by the popularity of the Yigdal hymn and the Ani ma'amin catechism, both taken into the traditional prayer book.

Marc Shapiro, a professor of Judaic studies at the University of Scranton, Pennsylvania, and himself an Orthodox Jew, argues that the Thirteen Principles were disputed and even dismissed through the centuries by many Jewish spiritual giants. Moreover, he asserts, that Maimonides, in his more philosophical works, even rejected several them.

Chapter by chapter, the author methodically lists objections to each principle. Take, for example, the third principle, which teaches God's incorporeality – that God is without image and without form. It is contradicted by a simple reading of the Bible, in which Moses is warned not to look at God's "face," yet saw "the likeness of the Lord." Isaiah claims to have seen God with his own eyes and Micaiah is able to proclaim, "I saw the Lord sitting on his throne' (I Kings 22:19).

Consider the 11th principle regarding the existence of heavenly reward and punishment. Though this is taken to be a statement about direct intervention by God, Maimonides explicitly argued for a non-divine understanding of providence: God does not bestow goodness; humans cultivate it through their intellect. In light of these counter-references, either Maimonides himself was a heretic or his principles of what constitutes heresy are themselves the deviation.

Shapiro believes that Maimonides in his Guide for the Perplexed presented a distinction between "true beliefs" and "necessary beliefs." True beliefs are truths about God that yield intellectual perfection. Necessary ones are ideas that are taught for the sake of social order. It is in this latter category that Shapiro places the more contentious of the Thirteen Principles.

Islamic teachings threatened the faith of the Jews of Maimonides' era and so it was necessary to harden the beliefs of the masses rather than to confuse them with complex and sophisticated ideas. Isaac Abarbanel (1437-1508) long ago argued that the principles were designed exclusively for the masses.

This book has aroused hostility and anger in some Orthodox quarters. Attempts have been made to suppress it and to invoke Jewish tradition in opposition. The author suggests: "The main reason why the views I discuss are so unfamiliar is that Jewish theology is not taken seriously in contemporary Orthodoxy… conservative views are repeated and expounded upon, but the wide-ranging opinions of sages of past generations are rarely given a hearing."

Adult bar/bat mitzvahs – Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, I continue my look at adult bar and bat mitzvahs with some practical advice for the ceremony, a glimpse at an amazing program that enables homeless people to celebrate this special event, and a peek at adult bar mitzvahs, Hollywood-style.

In 2001, the Union for Reform Judaism created a comprehensive handbook titled, Adult B'nei Mitzvah – Affirming Our Identity. It addresses such issues as preparing for the ceremony, courses of study and how to record your journey. [http:// tinyurl.com/55dtj] You can download the entire 108-page document but will need the free Adobe Reader installed on your computer in order to read it.[www.adobe.com/products/acrobat/readstep2.html]

Are you about to celebrate the big day but don't know how to word the invitation? There's a website that gives you several suggestions. Here are two:

"With pride, joy and mostly with love, I invite you to worship with me as my beloved husband Michael Allan Rosenberg is called to the Torah as a bar mitzvah."

"As my father and grandfather before me, I will be called to the Torah as a bar mitzvah on Saturday, the ninth of September. Please join me and my family in ceremony and celebration." [http://tinyurl.com/55pv4]

Bert Steinberg held his celebration at the age of 75, so when he addressed his congregation he had a lifetime and experience and wisdom to draw from. You can read his entire bar mitzvah speech online. [http://tinyurl.com/7yq22] David Hays documented the year of preparation leading up to his bar mitzvah at the age of 66 in a book with a wonderful title, Today I Am a Boy. Nan Goldberg's review appeared in Forward. [http://tinyurl .com/ 3tbws]

Some of the most moving adult bar and bat mitzvah ceremonies have taken place thanks to the efforts of Project O.R.E., a program that aids New York's homeless Jews. E.B. Solomont writes about Michael who at age 28 recently became a bar mitzvah. "When I was a kid, I knew other children who were Jewish, so I felt – and I don't want to sound like I feel sorry for myself – that they had something that I didn't… This is a part that I wanted to at least have. If not, you are never a man at all." [http://tinyurl.com/6m4zk]

Not everyone having a bar mitzvah as an adult missed out on the ceremony as a child. I have come across several people who chose their 83rd birthday as the appropriate time to have a "second" bar mitzvah. Why 83? In Pirkei Avot, the Teachings of our Fathers (5:24), Judah ben Teima relates the significance of the various milestones in our lives. He suggests that at age 70 we have reached "fullness of years." [http://tinyurl.com/55a4f]

In other words, the age of 70 should be considered a full life and anything above that is a bonus. That's why, when he turned 70 + 13, David Schneider, a retired violinist with the San Francisco Symphony, decided it was time to face his congregation, read the Haftorah and deliver a speech. [http://tinyurl.com /4gzz3]

The bar mitzvah is not only a rite of passage; it is also a favourite Hollywood staple. A few years ago, actor Kirk Douglas appeared on the television program Touched by an Angel as a grandfather who had no use for religion. Eventually he embraced his Jewish heritage and wanted to be "bar mitzvah'd" along with his grandson. [http://tinyurl .com/5fgf2] ~~In a~~ case of life coinciding with art, Douglas celebrated his own second bar mitzvah when he turned 83 and reflected on his stroke and on a serious helicopter crash that he had survived but had taken lives of two other passengers. [http://tinyurl.com/62naz]

Perhaps the most famous TV bar mitzvah boy is none other than The Simpsons' Krusty the Klown. In the episode Today, I Am a Klown, Krusty is distraught to find out that he can't get a star on his town's Jewish Walk of Fame because he never had a bar mitzvah and (according to the show's writers) is not Jewish. Well, comedian Jackie Mason reprises his role as Krusty's father, Rabbi Hyman Krustofsky, some zaniness ensues… and things end well for Krusty, the bar mitzvah boy. [http://tinyurl.com/4be8y]

Mazal tov to bar and bat mitzvahs of all ages.

Women of Action targets cancer research

It reads like a Who's Who of Canadian women: Nova Scotia Lieut.-Gov. Myra Freeman; Supreme Court Justice Rosalie Abella; former Chatelaine editor Rona Maynard; past University of Toronto chancellor Rose Wolf, renowned oncology researchers Sheila Weitzman, Livina Lickley and Linda Penn; cookbood author Rose Reisman and the list goes on.

What do these women have in common? They have all been honoured in the past by the Toronto chapter of the Israel Cancer Research Fund's (ICRF) women of action committee.

This year, three more women will be added to the honour role at the women of action luncheon on April 14: molecular neurobiologist Dr. Freda Miller of the Hospital for Sick Children, real estate agent Elise Kalles and ICRF founding co-president Lynn Albert.

All three have had an impact on their professions and have worked tirelessly for the good of the community, and are truly women of action, say current women of action co-chairs, mother and daughter Eva Prizant and Sharon Vinderine.

Since its founding in 2000, the women of action committee has worked to raise awareness of the ICRF in Canada while raising funds to support cancer research in Israeli hospitals, universities and scientific institutions.

"Our goal at women of action is to recognize women who have made significant contributions to society, be it through academia, law, medicine, arts, business or philanthropy," says former committee chair Mindy Blustein. "Our annual luncheons are a testament to their achievements, and the ICRF Research Fellowships established in their names stand as legacies of their commitment to all of humanity."

The annual women of action luncheon is one of many activities that a dedicated group of volunteers organizes to raise money for ICRF and fulfil the committee's mandate of supporting important and progressive research by Israeli scientists.

ICRF was founded by renowned physicians and scientists 27 years ago. It is the largest source of private funding for cancer research in Israel funding over US $30 million in cancer research fellowships at every major hospital and university throughout Israel.

Breakthroughs in the treatment of cancer made possible through the organization include the development of Gleevec, used in the successful treatment of chronic myelogenous leukemia; Doxil, used in the treatment of breast and ovarian cancer; P53, a key tumour suppressor; RAD 51, which identifies the likelihood of breast cancer occurring in women who carry the BRCA 2 gene; and Velcade, listed in the Wall Street Journal as the top medical breakthrough of 2003 and used in the treatment of multiple myeloma.

For more information about ICRF or the women of action luncheon, call 416-487-5246 of e-mail woa@icrfonline.org.

Columbia report a 'whitewash:' critic

By CHANAN TIGAY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A faculty committee investigating charges that Columbia University professors bullied pro-Israel students has issued its findings – but the controversy appears far from over.

The report found just one incident where a faculty member "exceeded commonly accepted bounds" in responding to a pro-Israel student's question about whether Israel warns Palestinians before it takes certain military actions in the West Bank and Gaza.

The report also found no evidence of statements by faculty that "could reasonably be construed as anti-Semitic."

But pro-Israel students, including some who were interviewed by the committee and said their stories were ignored in its findings, criticized the report. They said that by focusing on only three instances of alleged intimidation – and particularly on accusations that had garnered the most media attention in recent months – the ad hoc committee had made plain its intentions.

"We're ashamed that Columbia would undertake such a blatant whitewash," said Ariel Beery, a co-founder of Columbians for Academic Freedom, a student group that has led efforts to publicize complaints about teachers in Columbia's Middle East and Asian languages and cultures department (MEALAC).

"They were more concerned with solving the problem that's posed to the university's image than addressing the injustices that were done to students," Beery said.

In late October, the David Project, a pro-Israel advocacy group, screened Columbia, Unbecoming, a documentary it made about student allegations of intimidation.

In December, university president Lee Bollinger announced the formation of the committee to investigate the film's allegations – such as the charge that assistant professor Joseph Massad asked a student who served in the Israeli army, "How many Palestinians have you killed?"

It was Massad who was reprimanded in the report for crossing the line of "accepted bounds" for giving a disparaging response to a questioner he considered too pro-Israel.

Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation league, said the report "protects the faculty, gives little credibility to the students, and comes up with no solutions at all to deal with the concerns about intimidation … its finding that there was no anti-Semitism is a red herring, since no one in responsibility has ever charged the university with engaging in anti-Semitism. The issue is and has always been the alleged intimidation of pro-Israel students by faculty members. That issue is inadequately addressed by the report."

Charles Jacobs, president of the David Project, blasted what he called "a biased report by a biased committee which ignored the facts to protect its own."

"We expected an unfair report from a committee composed of friends and colleagues – and even a thesis advisor – of the professors it was supposed to investigate," Jacobs said. "But the report is disgraceful, beyond our expectation."

The American Jewish Committee praised the report as "an important step forward" and executive director David Harris urged "interested parties, inside and outside Columbia, to see [it] as a point of departure, to look ahead, and to concentrate on the next positive steps to strengthen this leading academic institution."

The American Jewish Congress also praised the committee for "verifying some of the most serious student charges made against members of its Middle East Studies faculty," but it warned the university about allowing faculty members to push their political positions in the guise of academic freedom.

In a letter to the Columbia community, Bollinger said he will announce specific actions in response to the report in the next two weeks, adding the school has begun formulating its reaction.

"Some solutions are clear," he wrote. "We are developing new grievance procedures for students and faculty to help ensure that concerns are addressed in a clear, fair, and expeditious manner. We will also devise means to facilitate community-wide discussions of difficult and controversial issues of the day – the kinds of problems universities are meant to explore. Other plans will be laid out in time."

Awi Federgruen, a business professor and a member of the Columbia chapter of Scholars for Peace in the Middle East, said possible remedies that could be sought include a subsequent investigation by an outside committee, and discussions on how to ensure that "alternative narratives" on the Middle East are heard at the university. That was a reference to allegations the MEALAC program is pro-Arab, to the exclusion of other perspectives.

Citing 360 faculty members who have signed on to the scholars group's list serv, Judith Jacobson, a Columbia professor of clinical epidemiology, said there are "enough concerned Columbia faculty to do another internal review."

Several pro-Israel students met last week for about one hour with Bollinger; the university's chaplain, Jewelnel Davis; and the executive director of the school's Kraft Center for Jewish Life, Simon Klarfeld. Though the students wouldn't discuss specifics of the meeting, one called it "very encouraging."

Israel advocacy in Ottawa is in trouble

By ROBERT WALKER
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Those of us who are both university students and defenders of the Middle East's only liberal democracy face serious obstacles to our Israel advocacy.

While this is certainly true across Canada, it is particularly worrying in Ottawa, where a large number and proportion of Canada's current politicians have studied. The future political leaders of Canada may be the students sitting two seats away in political science class, the cafeteria or library, or they may be sitting at the Young Liberals or Young Conservatives booth in the University Centre.

Future political leaders of Canada are everywhere.

They may be future leaders, but they know very little about Israel, the world's only Jewish state. Even more worrying: what little they do know comes from antagonistic anti-Israel groups, and hence they understand very little about the intricacies of the world's most complex conflict.

In the past 12 months in Ottawa, we have experienced "Apartheid Wall" demonstrations, anti-Zionist Jewish speakers and other inflammatory guests invited by campus groups that question Israel's right to exist.

Moreover, the Jewish student population in Ottawa is very small.

The combined number of Jews at the University of Ottawa and Carleton University is only about one-fifth the size of York University's 4,500-strong Jewish student community.

Despite their small numbers, Jewish students in Ottawa have much to be proud of. They recently held the city's largest student Shabbat dinner in memory, as well as a massive Israeli fashion show earlier this month, and a political engagement conference last November that featured Prime Minister Paul Martin as keynote speaker.

The student executive of Hillel Ottawa, as well as its director, the only staff member employed here by Hillel, have contributed thousands of hours to Israel advocacy, and they have a great deal to show for it.

Through numerous events, they have allowed non-Jewish Canadians to understand that Jewish Canadian students defend Israel not because they are Jews, but because they are Canadians. These events have showed Christian, Muslim, Hindu and Buddhist Canadians why Israel is deserving of their support, and why respect and admiration for Israel is not – and should not be – confined to one religious group.

All pro-Israel students reading this, be they Jewish or not, must understand that the political leaders of tomorrow are studying alongside us today, and their ideologies and opinions will be influenced by their short time at university or college.

If pro-Israel advocates across Canada don't take a stronger stand in defence of Israel today, why should the future political leaders of Canada do the same tomorrow?

Robert Walker is a second-year journalism student at the University of Ottawa and director of media relations for JSA-Hillel Ottawa.

Netanyahu addresses Canadian students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Two-and-a-half years after a talk by Benjamin Netanyahu was cancelled at Concordia University due to violent protests by anti-Israel students, the former Israeli prime minister was back in Canada to speak to university students – sort of.

In a video hook-up co-sponsored by Betar Tagar, the Jewish Agency, Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Likud Canada, Netanyahu – in Jerusalem – addressed students from 10 Canadian campuses in eight locations across the country last week in a pre-recorded talk.

"Last time I was in Canada they tried to shut me up, but they gave me a platform [to speak to] millions of Canadians on the nightly news, so actually something good came of it," he said.

"If any people have a right to a piece of land, it is we in Israel," Netanyahu said, noting that "Arab propaganda is lying" when it says Jews have not had a longtime continual presence in Israel.

The problem, he said, is that Israel is judged guilty by "leftists and anti-Semites" for what it is, not for what it does. "As long as we are guilty of 'colonialism,'... therefore we are guilty no matter what." That issue has to be addressed, he said.

Netanyahu's chief of staff, Yechiel Leiter, answered students' questions afterward and urged them to make a commitment to visit Israel this year. Netanyahu, who had been scheduled to speak live, was not available because of budget discussions in the Knesset.

Local speakers included Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh, Israel's Consul General for Toronto and Western Canada, who spoke at the University of Toronto; and Conservative MP Stockwell Day, who spoke at the University of British Columbia.

Participating campuses also included Carleton University, McMaster University, the University of Manitoba, the University of Calgary and York University. Students from Concordia University and McGill University in Montreal gathered off campus at FEDERATION CJA's Cummings House.

An estimated 600 students took part in the event, and another 1,000 people saw it on the Internet, according to event organizer Itay Gadot, Betar Tagar's executive director.

Passover Food Ideas

Passover evokes some of the fondest memories

Editorial

Of all the holidays in the Jewish calendar, Passover evokes some of the fondest memories, especially of family and food.

We all remember the seders of our childhood, whether they were large and noisy or small and intimate, and most of us reminisce about what family members were known for which signature dishes. For weeks before the seder, we would look forward to seeing our grandparents, cousins or family friends, and to tasting foods we hadn't had in a year.

Even though our ancestors may have partaken of a simple meal of roast lamb, unleavened bread and bitter herbs, our seders usually evolve from an elaborate plan.

We figure out how many people can fit around the dining room table, how much food we need so that no one will go hungry, and what we can make for those guests with allergies or food restrictions, or who are just plain fussy.

In our upcoming Passover food pages, we've tried to include at least a couple of recipes for everyone – those who are on a weight loss program, those who are vegetarians, those who are just learning to cook and those who are looking for recipes to reflect their ethnic background.

We hope you find something to include in your own seder or for a mid-week meal when some friends drop in, or something that triggers a wonderful family memory.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy your Passover meals, and we wish you a chag kasher v'samayach.

Passover Food Ideas

South Beach and Passover is possible

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Since last Passover there has been a big reduction in the staff of The Canadian Jewish News.

After embarking on the South Beach Diet, created in the mid-1990s by Florida cardiologist Dr. Arthur Agatston, four staff members have lost a combined weight of almost 175 pounds. Three of them share their stories here.

"We've dropped the equivalent of an adult," says Ella Burakowski, assistant advertising manager and Ask Ella columnist, who, in the past year, has lost about 45 pounds on the diet.

She started South Beach out of desperation, she says. "I've been on [countless] diets. I would lose 20 pounds, and always gain them back.

"The diets were a lot of work. I would constantly be writing, measuring or counting; it got in the way of my lifestyle."

The turning point came when she saw singer Bette Midler on a television talk show. "She was on South Beach and she looked fantastic. She talked about how easy it was to follow.

"I decided to give it a shot. I bought the book, followed what it suggested, and within two weeks, I had lost 10 pounds."

Rather than being a low-carb diet, South Beach encourages people to choose the right carbs, such as whole grains and certain fruits and vegetables; the right fats, such as olive and canola oil; and lean sources of protein.

Phase 1 of the diet, the first two weeks, includes normal-size portions of lean meat, fish, eggs, reduced-fat cheese, nonfat yogurt, nuts and plenty of vegetables. It is meant to reduce cravings.

In Phase 2, the right carbs are introduced and weight should continue to drop until goal weight is reached, after which the maintenance phase is followed.

After the initial two-week period Burakowski continued to lose about one or two pounds a week. "It's a diet that is easy to incorporate into my lifestyle. I can eat at restaurants or at other people's homes. No one has to cook anything unusual for me."

During the winter holiday season, she gained a few pounds, she says, but she went right back to Phase 1 of the diet. "I didn't feel, like I used to, that once I was off I was off. It was easy to get right back on."

Sales representative Bev Bergman, who has now lost 26 pounds on South Beach, says she too, had struggled for years to lose weight and keep it off.

"I would eat too little, or else I would eat too much and feel guilty. I saw how effortless it was for Ella, and I decided to give it a try. During Phase 1, I went to New York for a wedding, and I found that it was possible to follow South Beach and not feel deprived."

Now, she says, her husband is on South Beach. "We go out for lunch or dinner and we can eat within the South Beach regime. When we drove to Florida, we took a whole wheat pizza and ate it in the car. It was delicious, and it sustained us. It has become a lifestyle."

The newest South Beacher is Michael Stavsky, part of CJN's production staff, who to date, has lost 45 pounds.

When he was on Phase 1, he attended his shul's kiddush, and instead of eating crackers and dip, he used herring to dip in the hummus. "It worked beautifully. The herring took the place of the Tam Tams."

This is his first weight-loss regime, he says, and he's found tremendous support in the office and at home. "My wife cooks good, healthy meals, and we share recipes at work. We talk about it all the time."

Burakowski says that in an attempt to get variety in her meals, she has adapted many mainstream recipes to fit her South Beach lifestyle.

"For example, I can substitute sugar substitute for sugar, whole wheat flour for white flour, brown rice for white rice and whole wheat pasta for regular pasta. It's not difficult at all."

With Passover coming, she has adapted a number of recipes that she is looking forward to testing.

HOLIDAY BRISKET POT ROAST

5 lb. brisket
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1 clove garlic, crushed
3 tbsp. oil or shortening
1 cup chopped onion
2 stalks celery with tops, sliced
½ cup thick tomato sauce
½ cup red wine
3 carrots, sliced
12 oz. fresh mushrooms, sliced

Rub meat with salt and pepper to taste. Rub with crushed garlic. Heat oil or shortening in Dutch oven or roasting pan. Sauté onions and celery in oil. When onions are translucent, push to side and brown meat on both sides for about 20 minutes. Meanwhile, preheat oven to 350.

Combine tomato sauce and wine in measuring cup and pour over meat. Add sliced carrots. Roast, covered, about 2 hours, basting occasionally with sauce.

Vegetables – filling and nutritious

When meat is almost tender and can be sliced, remove to cutting board and slice on an angle into thin slices, keeping shape of meat intact. Return to roasting pan. With large spoon, baste meat and vegetables, making sure that juice runs between each slice of meat and vegetables remain on top of roast. Add mushrooms.

Return to oven and roast for another half hour. Carefully remove roast from pan onto heated serving dish and spoon sauce and vegetables on top of meat slices. Serves 8 to 10.

SID'S MATZAH BALLS

2 eggs, lightly beaten
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 tbsp. chicken stock or water
1 tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. freshly ground black pepper pinch of ground nutmeg pinch of dried marjoram scant 1/2 cup whole wheat matzah meal
2 quarts salted water

In medium bowl, mix together eggs, oil, chicken stock or water, salt, pepper, nutmeg and marjoram. Add matzah meal and mix well. If necessary, add a little extra water or some matzah meal to make a batter that is not stiff or loose but holds together without movement when the bowl is shaken. Cover and refrigerate at least 1 hour.

Bring 2 quarts salted water to a rolling boil. Roll 8 to 10 matzah balls between dampened palms and drop into boiling water. Cook, covered, 40 minutes. With a slotted spoon, transfer matzah balls to hot soup with which they will be served. Makes 8 to 10.

VEGETARIAN CHOPPED LIVER

2 tbsp. unsalted margarine
1 cup sliced fresh mushrooms
1 cup chopped onions
3 hard-cooked eggs
1/4 lb. walnuts
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. freshly ground white pepper
lettuce leaves and tomato wedges for garnish

In a large skillet, melt margarine over low heat. Add mushrooms and onions and sauté until onions are golden. Pass mushrooms, onions, hard-cooked eggs and walnuts through a grinder, or chop very fine in a chopping bowl. Season with salt and pepper. Chill thoroughly. Serve on lettuce leaves and garnish with tomato wedges. Serves 6.

ELEGANT STUFFED PEPPERS

3 large sweet red peppers
1/2 lb. eggplant kosher salt, freshly ground black pepper
1 1/2 lb. zucchini
3 scallions, sliced
1/2 yellow pepper and 1/2 red pepper, diced
1/4 cup olive oil
4 tbsp. whole wheat matzah meal
1/4 cup red wine vinegar
1 garlic clove, chopped
1 egg, lightly beaten
1/2 lb. Passover low fat Swiss cheese, grated
1 tbsp. each fresh oregano, parsley and basil, minced whole leaves to garnish
1/3 cup grated Passover Parmesan cheese

Roast the peppers over a flame or under broiler until charred on all sides, about 20 minutes. Cool in a brown paper bag. Peel, remove seeds and ribs, cut peppers in half. Cube the eggplant and sprinkle with salt. Drain in a colander for 30 minutes. Rinse and dry. Slice zucchini in half lengthwise, cut crosswise into thin slices.

Preheat oven to 400.

Heat 2 tbsp. olive oil in a deep sauté pan on medium heat, add scallions and sauté 5 minutes. Add the eggplant cubes, sauté 5 more minutes. Add more oil as needed to sauté the zucchini and diced peppers, cover and cook 15 minutes. Spoon the vegetables into a bowl and stir in red wine vinegar, garlic and matzah meal. Gently mix in the egg and grated Swiss cheese and season to taste with salt, pepper and herbs.

Oil a baking pan to hold the peppers in a single layer. Brush the pepper halves with olive oil and divide the prepared mixture into the peppers. Bake 20 minutes. Sprinkle peppers with grated Parmesan cheese and bake 5 minutes more. Garnish with fresh basil leaves or parsley sprigs. Serve hot. A delicious main course. Serves 6.

Note: Prepare stuffed zucchini or yellow squash in the same manner. Halve squash lengthwise, scoop out shells to 1/2 inch. Salt and drain, then proceed as above. Use inside of squash for filling.

CARROT APPLE AND ALMOND KUGEL

2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 lb. carrots, scraped and grated
2 tart apples, peeled and grated
1 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. orange juice
3 cups whole wheat matzah farfel
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1/4 tsp. grated nutmeg
1 tsp. graded lemon zest
3/4 cup sliced almonds

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9x13-inch pan with 1 tablespoon vegetable oil. Grate carrots and apples in food processor for a total of about 5 cups. Combine with lemon and orange juices in a large bowl. Rinse matzah farfel in warm water, drain. Add farfel to carrot mixture with sugar, ginger, nutmeg, lemon zest, salt and 1 tbsp. vegetable oil. Taste and adjust flavour; batter should be moist. Spoon into prepared pan, scatter with almonds. Bake 30 to 40 minutes until crisp on top and mixture is set. Serve hot or at room temperature. Serves 10 as a side dish.

Spaghetti squash as an alternative to pasta

SPAGHETTI SQUASH "NOODLE" PUDDING

3 lb. spaghetti squash
2 onions, chopped
2 cloves garlic, crushed
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 medium zucchini, finely grated
2 medium carrots, finely grated
2 eggs plus 4 egg whites (or 4 eggs)
½ cup whole wheat matzah meal
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil (or 1 tsp. dried)
salt and pepper, to taste

Cut squash in half. Place cut-side down on a sprayed foil-lined pan. Bake at 350 about 45 minutes, until tender. (Alternately, pierce whole squash in several places with a fork. Microwave on high until tender, 15 to 18 minutes, turning it over at half time. Let stand 15 minutes. Cut in half and let cool.)

Preheat oven to 375. In a non-stick skillet, sauté onions and garlic in oil for 5 minutes. Add zucchini and carrots and cook on medium heat until tender-crisp, about 5 minutes longer, stirring often. If necessary, add a little water to prevent burning or sticking. Cool slightly.

Discard squash seeds. Use a fork to pull out strands of squash. In a large mixing bowl, combine squash with remaining ingredients and season to taste. Transfer mixture to a sprayed 2-quart rectangular or oval casserole. Bake at 375 for 50 to 60 minutes, until golden. Makes 10 to 12 servings. Reheats well.

This recipe can be baked in sprayed individual ramekins or muffin pans. Bake at 375 for 25 to 30 minutes, until golden. Delicious served as a dairy dish with no-fat yogurt. Cooked spaghetti squash is excellent served as an alternative to pasta during Passover. Top the strands of spaghetti squash with your favourite recipe of ratatouille or tomato sauce.

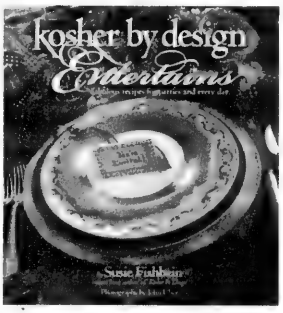
Delicious twists update the traditional Passover menu

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

In her latest cookbook Kosher by Design Entertains (Mesorah Publications, 336 pages), Susie Fishbein shares her simple secrets on how to be a successful, stress-free hostess. Fishbein is a firm believer that entertaining at home should be easy, satisfying and fun! Along with her delicious recipes, she offers helpful pointers and time-saving advice, as well as elegant table-setting ideas.



This is definitely not your typical kosher cookbook. You'll find more than 250 innovative, inspired recipes, including Tri-Coloured Matzah Balls, Mexican Gefilte Fish, Seared Duck Salad, Roasted Eggplant Soup, Balsamic Braised Brisket with Shallots and Potatoes, Hazelnut- and Honey-Crusted Veal Chop, and Triple Chocolate Explosion.

"It's not about old-fashioned brisket – it's about fresh ideas," Fishbein said. "I like to use the best ingredients available to make elegantly simple yet innovative food that wows the eye as well as the palate."

Sales of the book are soaring; an amazing 30,000 copies were sold in its first two weeks of publication. It won the Best of Show Award in the cookbook category at Kosher World Conference and Expo in Los Angeles in February.

Kosher By Design Entertains is jam-packed with magnificent photography that is so mouth-watering it may even inspire you to rush right into your kitchen and start cooking! There are fabulous photo spreads for nine party themes, each for a different occasion, including a baby shower (dessert buffet), engagement party (cocktail party), anniversary party (formal dinner) and housewarming (buffet). The creative and eye-catching presentations have been designed to inspire you to adapt the details to your own entertaining needs.

If you are looking for some delicious twists to update your traditional Passover menu, look no further. The Passover guide at the back of the book lists 70 recipes, along with substitutions and modifications, that are appropriate for Passover. She includes suggested menus for other Jewish holidays, a resource guide for unusual kosher ingredients and a buying guide for the cooking tools and housewares that are in the book's photographs.

In addition to being a successful cookbook author, Fishbein is a wife and the mother of three daughters and one son. She is an everyday cook who loves to share her passion for cooking and entertaining with friends and family. This passion led to the creation of her best-selling cookbook Kosher by Design (Mesorah), which has sold more than 70,000 copies to date. Fishbein travels widely, sharing recipes and techniques, and has appeared on TV, including on The Today Show.

Remarkably, Fishbein is mostly self-taught, although chefs from three famous restaurants, Italian, French and Asian, worked with her in her own kitchen to develop some of the recipes for Kosher by Design Entertains.

When I spoke with Fishbein recently, I asked her for some simple suggestions for an elegant, hassle-free seder menu.

"I don't like to have 17 dishes on the table," she said. "I prefer a lot less food and like to choose dishes that don't cause stress. I know there will be kids at a .seder and they love my green Shrek-style Spinach Matzah Balls. They can be made in advance, which is perfect."

I asked her what she would suggest as a main dish. Without hesitating, she said Rib Roast with Melted Tomatoes is outstanding. It tastes best when served fresh, so it would make an ideal main course for the second seder, Sunday evening. The Hasselback Potatoes also taste best fresh from the oven."

I asked about her Roasted Beet Salad. She said, "Not one person in my family likes beets. Not one person left a drop of this salad over when I served it and it was requested the very next night! You can easily make it in advance.

"This year, I'll be going to my mother's for Passover and she is a wonderful cook. I can hardly wait to eat her awesome jelly cookies that will definitely be in her freezer."

Without a doubt, Kosher by Design Entertains belongs in every Jewish kitchen. Enjoy…

SPINACH MATZAH BALLS

Due to the high water content of fresh spinach, these matzah balls may be a little harder to roll. If this occurs, add some extra matzah ball mix or matzah meal, one teaspoon at a time, until the batter can be rolled into balls. You want to use as little extra as possible so the matzah balls remain light and fluffy.

2 large eggs, plus 1 egg white
2 tbsp. olive oil
3 oz. fresh baby spinach leaves
1 cup matzah ball mix (usually both bags out of a box)
water or chicken stock

In a medium bowl, whisk the eggs and the oil. In the bowl of a food processor fitted with a metal blade, process the spinach until puréed. Squeeze the water out of the spinach. Add the spinach puree to the egg mixture. Whisk to incorporate.

Sprinkle in 1 cup (2 bags) of the matzah ball mix. Stir in with a fork, mixing as little as possible. Don't overwork it. Chill in freezer for 20 minutes. Meanwhile, bring a pot of water or chicken stock to a boil.

Wet your hands in a bowl of cold water. Using your hand and manipulating as little as possible, scoop out a ping-pong-ball size of the mixture. Form it into a ball with your fingertips using no real pressure. Turn the water down to a simmer. Drop the balls into the water. Cover the pot and simmer for 20 minutes.Yield: 6 large matzah balls.

DESSERT IDEAS: As seen in Kosher by Design Entertains by Susie Fishbein, Shaar Press

A salad you can make in advance

ROASTED BEET SALAD

The roasted beets become almost like beet chips. They are incredible. The procedure can be done with taro root or other root vegetables as well. One of the unique aspects of this recipe is not needing to peel the beets. Cutting the beets on newspaper keeps the red from dyeing your kitchen pink and gloves keep it off your hands. If you can't find golden beets, just double the amount of red beets.

2 medium/large red beets, scrubbed but not peeled
2 medium/large golden beets, scrubbed but not peeled olive oil kosher salt
salt and pepper to taste dried thyme
1 tbsp. honey
1 tbsp. Passover Dijon-style mustard
3 tbsp. orange juice
3 tbsp. olive oil
1 tbsp. balsamic or apple cider vinegar
2 ounces frisée lettuce
3 ounces red leaf lettuce
½ cup chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 450. Line 2 baking sheets with parchment paper. Slice off the top and bottom of each beet. Slice into rounds as thin as possible, ¼-inch thick or less. Drizzle each beet slice with olive oil, brushing it to coat evenly. Sprinkle with coarse salt and thyme. Place on prepared baking sheet. Roast 18 to 22 minutes, until the beets are soft and slightly shrunken. The smaller or thinner beets will need to come out of the oven earlier so they don't burn. Set aside. Keep the colours separate as they will bleed otherwise.

Prepare the dressing. Using an immersion blender or with a whisk, combine the honey, mustard, orange juice, olive oil and balsamic or apple cider vinegar. Blend or whisk until emulsified. Season with salt and pepper.

Place the frisée and red leaf lettuce leaves into a bowl and lightly dress, tossing to combine, reserving 6 teaspoons of the dressing.

Arrange the roasted beet slices, in alternating colours, in a single layer on each plate. Drizzle a scant teaspoon of the dressing over the beets. Place a tall mound of the greens in the centre of each plate, allowing the beets to peek out. Sprinkle each plate evenly with walnuts. Yield: 4 to 6 servings.

For a large crowd, multiply the ingredients accordingly. For a dairy version, add 3 oz. blue or gorgonzola cheese. In Step 4, crumble cheese over each mound of lettuce.

BRAISED RIB ROAST WITH MELTED TOMATOES

This recipe is elegant enough to be the centrepiece of a formal dinner.

1 (5 to 6) lbs. standing beef rib roast sea salt
freshly ground black pepper
4 tbsp. margarine (pareve)
2 onions, roughly chopped
4 cloves garlic, cut into chunks
2 beefsteak tomatoes, cut into large chunks
6 sprigs thyme, remove leaves, discard stems

Preheat oven to 450. Season the rib roast with salt and pepper. Melt the margarine in a large ovenproof pot or Dutch oven. Add the roast into the hot margarine, turning to sear evenly on all sides, about 3 to 4 minutes per side. Try not to manipulate the meat while it is searing. The meat will release itself when it is properly seared.

Add the onions, garlic and tomatoes to the pot. Add the thyme leaves. Sauté 3 to 4 minutes. Add water to come up halfway on the roast.

Place the pot, uncovered, into the oven for 1 hour and 30 minutes, until thermometer inserted in centre reads between 150 degrees and 160 degrees. Remove the roast from the oven and let stand for 10 minutes.

Serve with the tomatoes and onions from the pot. Yield: 6 servings.

HASSELBACK POTATOES

Jill Raff, the food stylist for Kosher by Design, shared this recipe concept with Fishbein. It is a great technique for dressing up a plain baked potato.

Here is a neat trick for cutting the potatoes so that you cut even slices but don't cut through to the bottom. Place the potato onto a wooden spoon. The sides of the spoon will keep you from cutting through. For bigger potatoes, such as Idahos, place a chopstick or wooden spoon along each of the two long sides. With one hand holding the potato and chopsticks or spoons in place, slice the potato width-wise. The knife should touch the chopsticks or handles of the spoons at every slice, leaving the slices attached at the bottom of the potato. This will serve as a guide to keep your slices even and keep from slicing through as well.

8 small Idaho baking potatoes or Yukon Gold potatoes
8 garlic cloves, sliced into thin slivers sea salt
coarse black pepper
olive oil

Preheat oven to 450. Using a sharp or electric knife starting at one end and going to the other, cut slits on top of each potato ⅛ of an inch apart, being careful not to cut all the way to the bottom of the potato; see method above. Place the potatoes on a baking sheet.

Place a garlic sliver into each slit. Sprinkle each potato with salt and pepper. Drizzle with olive oil.

Bake 1 hour, baste with the pan oil and then continue to bake for another 30 minutes, until potatoes are soft. Yield: 8 servings.

Passover Food Ideas

Meeting the challenge – Passover side dishes

By MARCY GOLDMAN
Special to The CJN

More than any other Jewish holiday, Passover is a "table holiday," with a feast of appetizing and symbolic foods to mark the occasion, bringing history and food together in the two seder meals that begin the holiday.

Main dishes at Passover (chicken, turkey, brisket) are rarely a problem, for most cooks have their own recipes, and the usual challenges of Passover hardly impact on these items. But other dishes, notably the sides dishes and the desserts, can be a challenge.

As wonderful as the main dishes are, savoury sides and small desserts round out the menu nicely, and more fully evoke the holiday and enrich the tableside memories, as well as pique the Passover palate.

These recipes cover a spectrum of light and colourful spring flavours, and they use familiar pantry ingredients. As a bonus, all are easy to make ahead and refrigerate or freeze. Use disposable foil bakeware for cooking and storage. Transfer the food to Passover serving platters to serve.

PASSOVER CAPONATA

This is the simplest, sunniest dish you can imagine. You layer on the ingredients – don't bother stirring – slow roast and dip in. It is reminiscent in method of a Sabbath cholent but wonderfully flavourful and upbeat.

1 large eggplant, washed, trimmed, partially peeled and diced into 1-in. cubes
1 small lemon, washed and thinly sliced
4 medium zucchini, washed, trimmed and sliced into ½-inch slices
½ cup pitted or pimento stuffed green olives
½ cup pitted black olives, sliced
½ bunch parsley, washed and finely minced
½ tsp. dry Italian spices
1 28-oz. can ground or diced tomatoes, preferably plum
salt, pepper, to taste
¼ cup kosher red wine
4 cloves of garlic, finely minced
2 tbsp. lemon juice
⅓ cup olive oil, virgin or light

Preheat oven to 350. Place all ingredients in a 4- or 5-quart Dutch oven, layering in order given. Cover and roast, 2-3 hours until vegetables are softened and cooked down, reducing oven temperature to 325 midway. Alternatively, you can start at 325 and cook it 3-4 hours without temperature adjustment.

Taste and adjust seasonings. Serve cold or at room temperature. Serves 8-10.

SWEET POTATO AND CARROT TZIMMES IN GINGER ALE CITRUS GLAZE

A glaze of ginger ale, as well as cranberry and orange juices sweeten this casserole, which can be assembled a day or two in advance. I prefer the addition of dried apricots and raisins, but dried prunes are traditional. Canned mandarin orange segments or cubed canned pineapple would also be a nice change.

6-8 small sweet potatoes, about 3 pounds, peeled and quartered or halved 2 large carrots, trimmed, scraped, and sliced in ¼-in. slices juice of one large orange
½ cup ginger ale
¼ cup cranberry juice (or apple juice)
½ cup brown sugar, packed firm, or ¼ cup honey
½ cup sliced, dried apricots or halved pitted prunes
¼ yellow raisins, optional
3 tbsp. vegetable oil or unsalted margarine
salt, pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 350. Have a 6-quart oven casserole nearby, such as a rectangular roaster. Prepare potatoes and carrots and place in roasting dish. Drizzle on the oil, scatter on the apricots (or prunes) and raisins, and dust with brown sugar, salt and pepper. Drizzle on the ginger ale, orange and cranberry juices. Cover and bake until potatoes are softened, about 1 to 1½ hours, removing cover for last 20 minutes of baking. Serves 8-10.

MATZAH, MUSHROOM AND ONION KUGEL

The trick here is to brown the matzah in the oven first for more flavour. Baking this in a deep 9- or 10-in. quiche dish makes for a more attractive presentation but any ovenproof casserole is fine.

Dishes you can make ahead

10 matzah sheets
1 cup water
1 cup lowfat, low salt, chicken, beef or vegetable stock
2 medium onions, diced
½ lb. fresh mushrooms, well washed and sliced
¼ cup vegetable oil
3 cloves of garlic, finely minced
2 tbsp. parsley, finely minced
1 small carrot, finely shredded
2 eggs
4 egg whites
1 tsp. salt, or more to taste
1 tsp. paprika
¼ tsp. pepper
1 tsp. garlic powder

Preheat oven to 375. Lightly grease a 9 x 13-in. casserole or roasting dish or a 9- or 10-in. 2½-in. deep quiche pan and set aside. Break up matzah sheets coarsely and place on a large baking sheet, or two, and bake, watching carefully, to brown the matzah – about 10-15 minutes. Remove from oven and cool until you can handle the matzah.

Place matzah in a large bowl and cover with chicken stock and water, as required, to soften matzah. Let stand to absorb liquid.

Meanwhile, in a large nonstick skillet, heat the oil a minute or two. Over low heat, saute the onions and mushrooms until softened but not brown and crisp, about 7-10 minutes. Stir in garlic, parsley and carrots and cook an additional 3-4 minutes over low heat just to barely soften, and blend with onion-mushroom mixture.

Add the sautéed vegetables to the matzah, along with the eggs, egg whites and seasonings and mix well. Spoon into prepared dish, packing well. Bake until set and slightly browned, about 45-60 minutes. Serves 8-10. This can be frozen and reheated.

SALAD IDEAS: As seen in Kosher by design Entertains by Susie Fishbein, Shaar Press.

NEW AGE PASSOVER CHAROSET

This delectable charoset, the symbolic "mortar" used to sandwich pieces of matzah together, is a new tradition that is always on my Passover table. It is a heady combination of apples, cranberries, raisins and cinnamon. There are no nuts in it, which makes it fine for those with nut allergies. The traditional charoset is simply grated apples, cinnamon, walnuts and a touch of wine. Not everyone is partial to it. This charoset is bright, sweet and tart and great as the seder plate charoset offering, but it does double duty as a Passover side dish to serve with roasted chicken, brisket, or turkey.

2 cups fresh or frozen cranberries
½ cup dried cherries
¼ cup dried cranberries
⅓ cup yellow raisins
2 cups coarsely chopped apples
¾ cup water
½ cup water or fresh orange juice
2 tbsp. sweet red wine, optional
½ tsp. cinnamon

Place all ingredients in a heavy-bottomed 4-quart saucepan. Cook over low to medium heat until cranberries and apples are softened and mixture is beginning to turn to compote, about 10-15 minutes.

Adjust tartness to taste with more orange juice and sugar if you wish. Cook until mixture is thick. Cool well. Makes about 1¾ cups. Keep refrigerated up to one week. Serve as a side with meats. Serves 8-10, depending on serving. As a side or condiment, serves 10-12.

SPINACH ZUCCHINI SOUFFLE

Something green is welcome on any spring menu – especially at Passover. This is good warm or hot. You can also serve it with poached salmon fillets.

2 packages fresh spinach, washed
2 medium zucchini, shredded and drained
1 small carrot, finely shredded
3 scallions, finely diced
2 eggs
4 egg whites
2 tbsp. oil
⅓ cup matzah meal
1 tsp. chicken broth powder
1 tsp. dried basil
½ tsp. dried oregano
2 tbsp. parsley, minced
1 small clove garlic, minced, or ½ tsp. garlic powder

Cook spinach, drain and chop. In a bowl, toss spinach with zucchini, carrot, scallions, eggs, egg whites, oil, matzah meal, chicken broth powder, basil, oregano, parsley and garlic. Pack into prepared mould. Bake till slightly puffy – 25-35 minutes. Serves 8-10.

Make it happen with the finest cuisine and impeccable service. We will cater to your every need at one of our synagogue locations or your special place

PASSOVER BRUSCHETTA APPETIZER

3 whole wheat matzahs
salt

Preheat oven to broil. Wet matzahs slightly on both sides under tap. Sprinkle with salt. Slip under broiler until sides begin to curl. Turn broiler off. Cut each matzah into 4 squares and top with bruschetta.

Bruschetta
3 tomatoes, finely chopped
1 green onion, finely sliced
2 tsp. olive oil
1/2 cup Parmesan cheese
1/2 tsp. dried basil
1 garlic clove, minced

Heat broiler. Combine ingredients and spoon over each matzah. Broil for 2-3 minutes until heated through. Serves 6 (2 squares each).

CREAM OF CARROT SOUP

3 tbsp. butter
1 tbsp. potato starch
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
2 1/2 cups milk
1/2 cup water
2 cups grated carrots
1 tsp. sugar
1/2 cup sour cream

Melt butter, blend in potato starch, salt and pepper. Cook until smooth and bubbly. Stir in milk and water. Add carrots and sugar. Simmer for 25 minutes, stirring occasionally. Blend in sour cream just before serving. Serves 4.

PESACH PASTA VEGETABLE MEDLEY

8 oz. Passover noodles, cooked according to directions.
4 cups vegetables of your choice, cut in small pieces (red pepper, zucchini, eggplant, onion, celery, carrots, mushrooms)
2 tbsp. oil
1 onion, finely chopped
1 clove garlic, minced
2 tomatoes, peeled and chopped
1 tsp. chopped flat leaf parsley
salt and pepper, to taste
2 tsp. potato starch
1 tbsp. cold water
1 cup cheddar cheese, grated

Steam or microwave vegetables until barely tender. Do not overcook. Set aside. Heat oil, sauté onion and garlic. Add tomatoes, salt and pepper. Cook 10 minutes and add vegetables.

Add cold water slowly to potato starch, mixing well so there are no lumps. Toss with noodles and vegetables and sprinkle with grated cheese.

Variation: Add bits of fresh fruit – wedges of strawberries, cubed kiwi, oranges or pineapple. Serves 4-6.

FRUIT SALAD WITH WINE SAUCE

Wine sauce
1 cup sugar
3 tbsp. potato starch
1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup kosher for Passover white wine
1 egg, beaten
2/3 cup orange juice

In a small saucepan, blend the sugar, potato starch and salt. Add the wine, stirring constantly. Bring to a boil and cook for 5 minutes or until clear and thick. Remove from heat. Add a spoonful of sauce to the beaten egg. Beat well. Return egg mixture to saucepan and cook one minute longer. Add orange juice, mixing well. Cool. Serves 8-10 (or more).

Fruit
1 papaya, peeled, seeded, cubed
1/2 melon, peeled, seeded, cubed
2 kiwis, peeled, sliced
2 peaches, peeled, sliced
1 cup seedless grapes
1 cup sliced strawberries
(or any fruit combination of your choice)
garnish roasted nuts

Arrange fruit in layers in individual serving dishes, parfait glasses or a glass bowl. Pour cooled wine sauce over fruit. Chill. Garnish with roasted nuts. Serve with Pesach Almond Cookies.

PESACH ALMOND COOKIES

2 egg whites
1 cup sugar
2 cups finely grated almonds
1/4 cup potato starch
1 tbsp. finely grated orange or lemon rind

Beat egg whites until soft peaks form, gradually adding sugar. Keep beating until stiff glossy peaks form. Slowly fold in the almonds, potato starch and rind.

Preheat oven to 250. Line 2 cookie sheets with foil or parchment paper. Using 2 spoons or your hands, shape round balls about 1 inch, placing them about 2 inches apart on cookie sheets. Bake 20 minutes. Turn off heat and leave in oven 10 minutes or a little longer if you like them brown and crisp. If you prefer cookies soft and pale, remove from oven after 20 minutes. Yield: 3 dozen.

SPICED-UP POTATO CHIPS

You may want to make several packages. A great appetizer or snack.

1 package potato chips
1/2 cup shredded cheddar cheese
thyme, oregano or any of your favourite Passover herbs

Preheat oven to 350. Spread package of potato chips on a foil-lined cookie sheet. Sprinkle with cheese and herbs. Heat in oven for 5 minutes or until cheese melts. Serve while hot. Yield depends on when you stop nibbling.

PASSOVER SUBSTITUTES

1/2 cup all purpose flour = 2 tbsp. cake meal + 6 tbsp. potato starch
1 cup all purpose flour = 1/2 cup matzah meal + 1/2 cup potato starch
1 cup cake or pastry flour = 1/4 cup cake meal + 3/4 cup potato starch
1 tbsp. corn starch = 1 tbsp. potato starch
1/3 cup icing sugar = 1/3 cup granulated sugar + 1/2 tsp. potato starch processed in blender or food processor
1 tbsp. flour = 1 1/2 tsp. potato starch

Aunt Estelle's mile-high strawberry sponge cake

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

It's that time again. Pesach is around the corner. Time for my annual wrestling match with my nemesis, the dreaded sponge cake.

Aunt Estelle was famous for her mile-high sponge cakes. Years ago, she sent me her recipe, outlining every step in exquisite detail. Yet every time I try it, mine comes up short.

It seems so simple. Whipped egg whites, trapping tiny air bubbles, expand to six or seven times their volume, creating an ethereal confection. But when I try it, the only thing that gets whipped is me to a frazzle. This year, I'm determined to reach new heights, but I need a little help from my friends. (And as they say, it's not what you know but who you know.)

"What am I doing wrong?" I asked Marcy Goldman, author of The Best of Betterbaking.com (Ten Speed Press).

"Are you using a strong, stationary mixer?" she asked. Check.

Goldman recommends a KitchenAid or Rival. She mentioned that when one of her testers upgraded her mixer, she was astounded by her cakes' added heights. I've been using my KitchenAid for years, so what else could be my problem?

"Are you using the size eggs called for in the recipe?" Goldman inquired. Check again.

"Separate your eggs when they are cold, but whip the whites at room temperature," she advised. "And make sure your eggs are fresh. Stale whites will not whip up well."

Hmm, maybe saving money on those five-dozen egg packs that languish forever in the fridge isn't such a hot idea.

I asked Rose Levy Beranbaum, author of The Cake Bible (William Morrow), why sponge cake recipes always warn you to beat the egg whites until stiff but not dry.

"When egg whites are overbeaten," she explained, "they start to lose their moisture, airiness and smoothness and break down when folded into other ingredients. And egg whites will never beat to stiff peaks if they come into contact with any grease, from the bowl, the beater, or even a bit of broken egg yolk."

Except on Passover, Beranbaum recommends adding 1/8 tsp. of cream of tartar for every egg white when they start to get frothy. "Then you can beat them as stiff as you want and never risk breaking them down," she told me. "More is not good and less won't do the job. It's truly miraculous!" But, alas, kosher for Passover cream of tartar is hard to find and not all that effective.

"Use salt instead," advised Joan Kekst, author of Passover Cookery (Five Star Publications). "Add 1/8 tsp. of salt to every four egg whites after 60 seconds of beating, when the whites are foamy and starting to softly peak," she advised. "Adding salt first delays foaming, and if you add it after beating, it won't incorporate. And use an absolutely clean, round-bottomed metal bowl, preferably copper."

Note to self: buy copper bowl!

"Once you start beating the whites, do not stop," she added. "They won't mound properly if interrupted."

Kekst also cautioned against using egg substitutes. "These are whites with preservatives and colour," she said. "Pure egg whites are usually available for Passover and will work fine for cakes. I've even used them for meringue cookies."

When folding in the beaten whites, combine one-quarter into the base mixture first to lighten it and then fold in the remaining whites in three additions. "Folding should take two to three minutes or the egg whites will deflate," advised Kekst.

Passover Food Ideas

Organization is key for mile-high sponge cake

"Don't grease the pan," warned Elinor Klivans, author of Fearless Baking (Simon & Schuster). "These cakes must climb slowly up the pan as they bake, and stay put," she said.

I've always wondered – which comes first, beating the egg yolks or the whites.

"Egg whites that have been beaten without sugar should be used immediately," cautioned Klivans. "But if sugar is beaten into egg whites, it stabilizes the foam and the mixture can sit for about 30 minutes before it must be used."

But perhaps the best advice she gave me was to take your time when baking. Multi-tasking is a great idea in the office. Bad idea in the kitchen.

"Whenever I try to hurry," she said, "I find that I have made some sort of major mistake. That is when I see the cup of sugar on the counter that I forgot to put in my cake. Check to see that you have all of your ingredients on hand before you begin. And, most important, have a good time!"

Will my sponge cake reach new heights this Pesach? Oh, well, it's only a cake. If life gives you lemons, make lemonade. If your sponge cake sinks, do as I do. Cut it in half and frost it!

AUNT ESTELLE'S MILE-HIGH SPONGE CAKE

9 large eggs, separated, at room temperature
1¼ cups sugar, sifted freshly grated zest and juice of 1 lemon freshly grated zest and juice of 1 orange 1½ tbsp. lemon extract
1 tbsp. orange extract
1 heaping cup (packed) Passover potato starch

Preheat oven to 325. With an electric mixer at medium-high speed, beat the yolks, very gradually adding 1 cup of the sugar until the mixture is very thick and very light yellow, making sure the sugar is completely dissolved. This may take 15 minutes or more. Beat in the lemon and orange juices, lemon and orange zests and extracts. Reduce the speed to low and very gradually add the potato starch until blended. Set aside.

With clean, dry bowl and beaters, beat egg whites at medium-high speed until frothy, about 30 seconds. Gradually add the remaining ¼ cup sugar and beat until stiff, about 90 seconds more. Mix ¼ of the beaten egg whites into the yolk mixture to lighten it. Carefully fold in the remaining beaten egg whites in 3 additions. Transfer the batter to an ungreased 10-inch tube pan with a removable bottom. Sprinkle the top with a little sugar if you want a crust on top. (Eliminate this step if you prefer a soft top.) Bake until the cake springs back when lightly touched, about 1 hour and 10 minutes.

Strawberry filling
1 pint fresh strawberries, rinsed and dried
1 pint Passover non-dairy whipping cream

When cake has completely cooled, split in half horizontally. Whip non-dairy topping according to the package directions and spread on the bottom layer. Distribute strawberries on top of the whipped topping, leaving some for garnish around the plate. Cover with top half of cake.

Chocolate frosting
1 cup Passover semisweet chocolate chips
¼ cup Passover non-dairy whipping cream
1 tbsp. margarine
¼ cup slivered almonds, toasted

Combine all the ingredients in a 2-cup measuring cup or bowl. Heat in microwave on high power 1 to 2 minutes, stirring once until smooth and chocolate is melted. Place cake, bottom side up, on serving plate. Frost top with chocolate and drizzle some down sides of cake. Sprinkle with toasted almonds. Let stand until chocolate is set.

Premier praises school's actions

Late last month, Kennedy said there's a good chance the teachers in question are not certified.

According to the Ontario College of Teachers, one of the suspended teachers is not certified. The status of the other is not known.

Provincial certification of teachers at private schools is not mandatory, college spokesperson Lois Brown told The CJN.

However, the Abraar school, established in 2000, is a member of the Ontario Federation of Independent Schools, an association of 125 private and faith-based schools with a total enrolment of some 15,000 students.

The province's Jewish day schools are not members of the OFIS.

Elaine Hopkins, the Ottawa-based federation's executive director, told The CJN she's been asked to serve on an "external" committee that will conduct its own investigation of the affair at the Abraar school.

"It appears to me to be a fairly isolated incident," Hopkins said. "I don't want to downplay this too much, but these things come up with children in any school.

"It's being dealt with in a very open way. I commend the school for doing that."

She said the OFIS doesn't get involved in member schools' curricula or values.

Even so, membership in the OFIS, according to the group's own rules, is open to schools that "actively work toward and maintain," among other criteria, "respect for diversity," which calls for "published and applied policies expressly requiring respect for all races, colours, creeds, origins and levels of ability."

Hopkins said that while member schools agree to abide by the directive, they are not required to teach it in the classroom.

Asked whether she's concerned that one – and possibly both – of the suspended teachers at the Abraar school are not certified, Hopkins said, "being certified does not make you perfect."

Meanwhile, Premier Dalton McGuinty told the Citizen that he commended the school for the steps taken to deal "with the teachers involved, in terms of inviting a broader interfaith community into the school and impressing upon students that here in this country, we hold ourselves as tolerant, progressive, open and respectful of differences."

Harris became accomplished musician

In addition to his political and community interests, Harris was an ardent athlete. In high school, he was a champion sprinter, and in college, he dabbled in boxing. For much of his life, he was an avid cyclist, patrolling the ravines of Toronto and bringing his bike with him to his cottage in the Muskokas.

About 12 years ago, he took up the organ and became quite an accomplished musician, though he did not like to play in public, Ethel said.

A student of history and politics, Harris consumed books voraciously and become knowledgeable on a number of subjects. A lifetime learner who was largely self-taught, Harris took an interest in primatology, the study of the great apes, and was a friend of Jane Goodall and Franz De Waal, two experts in the field.

Ethel attributes his interest in the area to his fierce desire "to understand how humans function, what consciousness was about."

It was all part of his intense curiosity about life, she added.

Largely self-taught about business as with his other interests, he turned Harris Steel into a world class corporation that purchased raw steel from mills and manufactured it into a variety of products. In 2004, the company reported a record annual profit of $71.5 million on annual sales of $731.5 million, another record.

Harris "was a modern-day Renaissance man with a special genius for commerce," said his nephew, John Harris, CEO of the Toronto-based company, in a news release. "I believe his greatest talent in business was to empower and mentor so many of us."

In addition to his wife, Ethel, Harris is survived by children Judith, Naomi and David.

Obituary

CHAT teacher was known as a leader and adviser

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Dan Salsberg, a popular science and physical education teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, died suddenly of a heart attack last month, while he was playing floor hockey. He was 43.

More than 500 staff, students and parents attended his funeral.

Paul Shaviv, CHAT's education director, described Salsberg as "an excellent teacher, with a quiet and respectful manner that impressed his students."

Salsberg coached the CHAT volleyball team, and "as a coach and a phys ed teacher, he was known as a leader and an adviser, and he excelled at that," Shaviv said.

"The whole school is devastated by his sudden and untimely death."

Rabbi Chaim Sacknowitz, director of guidance, said the school has been helping the students deal with the trauma. In addition to a special assembly, guidance counsellors and representatives from Jewish Family & Child Service went into classrooms, and counselling has been made available to anyone who wants it.

Students are working on a tzedakah project in Salsberg's memory

The students are working on a tzedakah project in Salsberg's memory, Rabbi Sacknowitz said. "It's important for kids to do something concrete at times like this."

Salsberg was born in Toronto and attended the University of Toronto, and later Brock University for his education degree. For about 15 years, he taught for the Peel District School Board at Brampton Centennial Secondary School. He came to CHAT in September 2001.

His wife Sharon said "he loved teaching at CHAT. He loved the kids, the morale and the teaching staff. And the kids gave back to him."

Sports was a big part of his life, she said. Besides floor hockey, he played golf, tennis, basketball, football and especially volleyball, which he pioneered as a competitive team sport at CHAT. He was also well known in the Ontario Volleyball Association.

Most of all, though, she said, he loved "kicking back" and spending time with her and their two children, Chelsea, 14, and Rachel, 11. The family went to Wasaga Beach in the summer, played board games, and did puzzles in the newspaper.

His children were the light of his life, Sharon said, and he enjoyed playing basketball on their driveway with them, going on rollercoaster rides at Canada's Wonderland and playing miniature golf.

He enjoyed playing poker "with the guys," and even liked joining her for mah jong, she said.

His special love was taking a big box of popcorn and watching movies on video, either alone or with her and the children, Sharon said.

Dan Salsberg

Grant Smith, head of the health club at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and convenor of the floor hockey league that Salsberg played in, described him as very competitive, always checking and questioning the scoring and point figures.

"He loved the game. I think he even arranged family functions around floor hockey!"

Smith said that from now on, the league champion will be awarded the Dan Salsberg Memorial Trophy, "to show how much he meant to all of us."

Sharon Salsberg summed up her husband in simple, yet poignant sentences. "He always smiled – always. He was very loved. We were very happy."

In addition to his wife and daughters, Salsberg is survived by brothers Michael and Robbie, sister Marilee Cuthbert, and many nieces and nephews.

ללכת על המים

מצב הישראלים בטורונטו

Born into Brothels הוא סרט מרגש עד דמעות, על איך אפשר למצוא אור גם במקומות הכי איומים בעולם, ועל איך שאנרגיה חיובית יכולה לשנות חיים. עשר בסולם קורן.

Yidden on Wheel בדרך לוושינגטון

חֲבֵרי נדעון לי גילה את אזני שארבע חבורות של רוכבי אופנועים יהודים מארה"ב וקנדה מתכוננים למפגש היסטורי ראשון במוזיאון השואה בוושינגטון ביום השואה (יום ששי, 6 במאי). אם אתם רוכבים, או אם מתחשק לכם להצטרף לחוויה נדירה זו על המושב האחורי (יש עדיין מושבים פנויים)- האיש שאתם רוצים לדבר איתו הוא לא אחר מאשר:

Steve Stein (416 930 4286)

איך יודעים שפֶּסַח עומד בפתח? והרי סימני הטבע הישראלים אינם קיימים כאן. אז ככה: אני, כמו רבים מיכם, לא יכול לאכול מָרָק בלי שקַדי מרק ישראלים. ופתאום-בגלל שאינם כשרים לפסח-הם נעלמו מהמדף בְּסוּפָר. והתוצאה? פסח בדרך, ואני לא אוכל מרק. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Jewish immigration lower than forecast, but still rising

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A massive influx of Jewish immigrants to Montreal from Argentina and France that was optimistically forecast by the community 2½ years ago has so far failed to materialize.

However, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) has seen its client load steadily increase over the past four years, largely due to more Argentine and French Jews coming here.

A total of 1,009 people who have been in Canada for two years or less are currently on JIAS' caseload, and they originate primarily from Argentina, France and Israel, said JIAS communications associate Miguel Banet, himself an Argentine who arrived in June. It's a relatively young group, with 352 of the newcomers aged 14 and under.

JIAS is also assisting 1,239 individuals who are in the process of immigrating and, for the most part, are still outside Canada. They also are predominantly from the same three countries.

Banet said it is estimated that about 80 per cent of Jewish immigrants to Montreal are seen by JIAS.

In the fall of 2002, FEDERATION CJA was preparing for as many as 10,000 immigrants to arrive by 2004 from Argentina, which was then in the midst of a severe economic crisis, as well as from France, where anti-Semitism was a growing concern. Officials were so confident that they spoke of Montreal's Jewish population doubling over the next 10 years.

Banet said it's expected that Argentine and French Jews will continue to immigrate here, but it is difficult to say how many.

While less than originally forecast, the numbers that are arriving are stretching the resources of JIAS, as well as those of Jewish Family Services, whose clients also include people who are new to the country.

The two agencies are teaming up to present the Montreal premiere of the acclaimed 1999 German movie Gloomy Sunday by Rolf Schabel, a partly fact-based dramatic romance set in circa 1940 Budapest, as a fundraiser April 13 at the Imperial Cinema.

The lead actress in the film, Erika Marozsan, the object of desire of three very different men, will be present that evening. Hungarian-born Canadian film producer Robert Lantos will introduce the movie.

One recent Argentine immigrant who is thankful to JIAS for its support is Ximena Rodriguez Solis. She arrived in Montreal with her husband Marcelo Arce, in June and gave birth to their first child, daughter Avril, in December.

Although she is happy with her decision to come to Montreal, she found it difficult to be without family and to be cooped up with a baby in a small apartment through a long and cold winter that she is not used to.

Through JIAS, she hooked up with a new mothers' group that was formed to help immigrant moms overcome the isolation they felt and to share information. JIAS has an Argentine-born counsellor, Deborah Rabinovitch, who has also been invaluable, Solis said.

Her husband Marcelo, who worked in telecommunications in Argentina, is still looking for a full-time job. He has a temporary job in data entry at the Red Cross. Both knew English before arriving and have been taking French lessons. She said Quebec was their first choice when they decided to emigrate, having been encouraged by the province's active immigration office in Buenos Aires.

Another young mother, Andrea Cooperberg, arrived with her husband Fernando Frankel from Argentina 3½ years ago. The have an 18-month-old son Lucas. Frankel is working as an HIV researcher at the Jewish General Hospital's Lady Davis Institute. Cooperberg, who was a Hebrew teacher, hopes to complete a master's degree in educational technology.

Unlike Solis, Cooperberg and her husband did use JIAS' services before they emigrated. She believes that a letter from JIAS attesting that there was a community in Montreal waiting to receive them helped advance their application.

JIAS has given both families a lot of baby supplies and other practical help, as well as eased their way through the the medical and educational systems.

Banet, Solis and Cooperberg all agreed that Montreal, with its Latin flavour and laid-back lifestyle, appeals to them and reminds them of Buenos Aires. Banet spent time in Toronto before settling in Montreal, and decided this city was more to his liking.

The women also feel that the city is a much better place to raise their children. Although the economic crisis has eased in Argentina, they were worried about fallout in the form of crime, corruption and general societal deterioration.

JIAS' hospitality committee tries to match new arrivals with local families to make them feel they are part of the community.

But Banet said the community could be more welcoming to the recent immigrants on a personal level. For example, more families are needed to share their seders with newcomers, or to act as informal language tutors.

Some institutions have gone out of their way to welcome the immigrants. For example, Congregation Shaare Zedek recently held a Friday night service that incorporated Spanish, as well as a dinner that 75 Argentines were invited to.

"[The Argentines] want to have Canadian friends desperately," Banet said.

Oil-for-food allegations ignored by media for years

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week, media attention was firmly focused on the possible role of UN Secretary General Kofi Annan and his son Kojo in the oil-for-food scandal in Iraq.

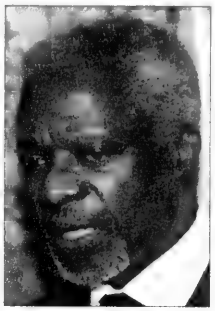
On March 29, former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker released a 144-page second interim report on the corruption and mismanagement of the $65 billion (US) program, in which Saddam Hussein's Iraq, under UN supervision, was allowed to sell oil in exchange for food and medicine intended for the Iraqi people.

Volcker determined there was insufficient evidence to show that Kofi Annan influenced or profited from the awarding of a contract to a company that employed his son Kojo. The secretary general, however, was faulted for failing to probe conflict-of-interest allegations involving Kojo, who worked for Cotecna, a Swiss firm that was awarded contracts by the now-deposed dictator Saddam to monitor aspects of the oil-for-food program. The younger Annan reportedly reaped financial rewards totalling hundreds of thousands of dollars, and he has refused to co-operate with the Volcker inquiry.

As early as 1999, the British media knew of Kojo Annan's employment by Cotecna, but little came of this disclosure. Few journalists pursued the story, or any other allegations of corruption.

The oil-for-food program began in 1996 and continued until just before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003. But during that time, most journalists filed reports from Iraq on what seemed to be only one story: how U.S.-imposed sanctions were starving the children.

The scenes of hospital wards packed with children deprived of food and medicine were just what Saddam wanted the world to see. And journalists obliged, rarely questioning what had happened to the oil money that was supposed to be set aside to purchase food and medicine. Nor did most of them raise questions about how Saddam could afford to spend billions building lavish palaces, and mosques, and purchase fleets of Mercedes, among other perks for his officials.



Kofi Annan

To be fair, reporters in Iraq, as in other repressive regimes without press freedoms, were constrained by government-appointed "minders." In such an atmosphere, journalists who ask tough, probing questions do so at their peril: they face intimidation or the prospect of being banned from the country. Yet, back in the West, few journalists bothered to look into allegations of corruption – which were circulating at the time – in the oil-for-food program involving European politicians and companies.

Where were prominent investigative journalists when it came to this subject?

This question arises frequently as one views CBC reporter Terence McKenna's trenchant two-part investigative piece "Bribes From Baghdad" (The National, March 28-29), which discloses the extent of Saddam's pay-offs to businessman, politicians and journalists.

McKenna shows how Saddam inveigled his way into the heart of French, Russian and even Vatican circles of power. Records of official after official who were awarded oil "allocations" worth millions of dollars are revealed in stunning detail.

To be sure, some of this information, as McKenna's report makes clear, only became available after the fall of Saddam and the subsequent seizure of secret documents. Still, other information about kickback schemes, illicit oil shipments and overpricing of goods imported into Iraq – among other forms of corruption, waste and mismanagement – was there to be probed long ago.

Strike drives Marvid Poultry out of business

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Montreal Jews and kosher butchers needing poultry for Passover are being assured that supply will meet demand after news the city's largest supplier, Marvid Poultry, has shut down operations as a result of a 6½-month strike.

Marvid, considered a Jewish community institution, was responsible for virtually all local kosher poultry slaughtering and processing. Its March 31 closure leaves the Montreal Jewish community without its own major kosher poultry slaughterhouse and processor.

Murray Steinberg, an agent for Chai Poultry of Toronto, told The CJN that his company will make up for any drop in local supply.

"I was reassured by [Chai owner] Chuck Weinberg… that the Montreal community will be covered completely for all its Passover needs," Steinberg told The CJN late last week.

"If it's not fresh, then it will be frozen," Steinberg said. "[Weinberg] could not have been clearer about it."

Despite the reassurances, news that Marvid, with its roots dating back to "The Main" decades ago, was closing stunned kosher butchers and consumers, who had expected the company and its employees to negotiate a new collective agreement.

Marvid's closure ended a contentious and bitter labour dispute over salaries and working conditions that dates back to last fall, just before Rosh Hashanah.

The strike began after Marvid started up a second production line that cut back employee hours.

Despite intense negotiations, sometimes in fits and starts, and several union votes, the two sides remained at odds. The last vote rejecting an offer by Marvid took place shortly before owner Moishe Friedman made the closure announcement.

"Due to ongoing labour problems… Marvid Poultry regrettably has no alternative than to close its production facilities as of March 31, 2005," Friedman stated in a terse letter to customers dated March 23.

"Marvid Poultry would like to thank all its customers for their loyalty and support during hard times."

At writing, it remained unclear whether outside kosher chicken producers other than Chai would also be able to supply the local market.

To make up for potential shortfalls during the strike, Montreal's kosher certification body, the Vaad Ha'ir (Jewish Community Council), loosened its ban on non-Montreal poultry being sold at MK-hechshered establishments. That opened the door for Marvid to import poultry from U.S. suppliers such as Empire Kosher Poultry and to give it a Marvid label once it got here.

But Marvid, which held the required import license, no longer exists, so it's unclear whether U.S. poultry can still come in.

Chai, for its part, has been supplying grocery chains such as IGA, Provigo and Loblaws as well as Costco and some local kosher butchers. Its products carry the "COR" hechsher, which is acceptable to the Vaad.

Commenting on Marvid's closure, the Vaad Ha'ir's executive director, Rabbi Saul Emanuel, said, "It is a very sad thing when a supplier has to close business." He added that the Vaad would "work with approved suppliers" to ensure Montreal Jews have sufficient poultry.

Avi Brook, owner of Cote St. Luc Kosher Butchers described Marvid's closure as yet another sign that "Montreal is becoming like a shtetl."

Although he agreed that Montreal Jews will ultimately get the supply of kosher poultry they need, he anticipated higher retail prices without any major local processor.

Brook, who until last week was selling poultry imported by Marvid, anticipated having to use Chai within the next week or two.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who has long been critical of the Vaad for not allowing outside kosher meat to be sold at MK-supervised establishments, said he was not concerned that Montreal Jews would lose their supply of kosher poultry as a result of Marvid's closure.

"If Chai can pick up the production, who cares?" he said. "I'm more concerned about the welfare of consumers.

"If there's a demand, there will be a supply. The marketplace will always win. There's enough dead chickens, don't worry."

Calls to Friedman were not returned.

Moderate growth projected for Canadian Jewry

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The number of Jews in Canada will likely continue to grow modestly over the next 12 years, but will remain the same as a percentage of the country's total population, according to a report issued last month by Statistics Canada.

The Montreal Jewish community, however, is expected to continue its long-term decline over the period, possibly dropping to under 74,000 from an estimated 92,200 based on 2001 census figures.

If trends of the recent past continue, there will be 349,200 Jews in the country by 2006, 360,800 by 2011, and 375,100 by 2017. Jews will represent a constant 1.1 per cent of Canadians through those years.

The comparable population projections for Montreal Jews are 85,900 in 2006, 81,300 in 2111, and 76,700 in 2017.

The 2001 census and subsequent adjustments made for under-reporting and inclusion of non-permanent residents identified 340,800 Jews in Canada.

The 2001 figure of 92,200 for Montreal – and 93,400 for Quebec as a whole – already represented a loss of about eight per cent between 1991 and 2001.

Under Statistic Canada's 12-year projection, the total number of Jews in Quebec would be 85,500 in 2017 – meaning about 9,000 would be living outside the Montreal area, an unlikely increase of almost 8,000 over 2001, compared to a large expected drop in the city.

For that reason, Alain Belanger, the report's co-author, cautioned that because of the relatively small numbers involved, the regional projections are "less reliable" than figures for Canada as a whole.

Belanger also conceded that the projected number of Jews living outside Montreal in 2017 may be the result of "a statistical flaw."

He suggested the Montreal projection could actually be closer to the expected provincial total of 85,500.

FEDERATION CJA was not commenting for the moment on the report. "We have not yet had an opportunity to review the study and therefore have no comments at this point in time. I would expect that we would be looking at it over the next short while," said Bram Freedman, director of operations and strategic initiatives.

The lengthy report, titled Population Projections of Visible Minority Groups and commissioned by Heritage Canada, contains a section on non-Christian denominations. Jews are not otherwise counted as a visible minority.

The report provides five scenarios. The reference scenario, the one used as a standard, is based on the assumption that trends in immigration, fertility, mortality, internal migration and emigration continue as they were between 1996-2001.

Two other scenarios factor in higher or lower population growth. A third scenario assumes internal migration, that is the movement of people between regions, will stay the same as it was in 1995-96; and the fifth scenario looks at what will happen if the number of immigrants is increased to the level of 1 per cent of the total population in that year.

Among these four other scenarios, projections for the number of Jews in Canada in 2017 range from 360,100 to 399,000, but Jews will remain 1.1 per cent of the population in any case.

For Montreal Jews, the range is from 73,700 to 80,600. Ontario should see the largest increase in Jewish population, going from 197,000 in 2001 to 223,100 in 2017, with Toronto accounting for 151,500 under the reference scenario.

British Columbia's Jews should also increase from 21,800 in 2001 to 27,600 in 2017, as will Alberta's from, respectively, 11,200 to 17,900.

The report predicts that Manitoba, however, will lose Jews, going from 13,500 in 2001 to 11,700 in 2017. While Jews are expected to maintain their relative strength compared to the total Canadian population, they are rapidly losing ground to the Muslim community.

Under the reference scenario, Muslims will increase by 145 per cent between 2001 and 2017, and reach 1.42 million or 4.1 per cent of the total population. In the most generous scenario, if immigration quotas are raised, the Muslim community will increase by more than 200 per cent. Muslims also have a comparatively high birth rate, which contributes to this growth.

In Quebec in 2001, there were 103,900 Muslims. Under the reference scenario, there will be 247,600 in 2017. In Ontario, the numbers will soar from 356,700 to 910,600.

The report notes that Judaism is the only major non-Christian denomination that will not grow at a rate greater than the population as a whole.

Israelis remember John Paul II as good for Jews

By DINA KRAFT & DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NAZARETH — From the Galilee, where church bells tolled, to Tel Aviv, where people sat in cafés as they read about his death on the front pages of newspapers, Pope John Paul II was remembered in Israel as someone who cared about the country.

Many Israeli citizens – Christians, Muslims and Jews alike – felt that the Pope, who died at 84 last Saturday after a long illness, spoke to them.

In Israel, memories of the Pope's 2000 pilgrimage still resonate. People remember the frail, stooped pontiff, dressed all in white, slowly walking to Jerusalem's Western Wall to tuck a note of apology in a crack between the stones of Judaism's holiest site.

That followed his 1993 decision to establish diplomatic ties with Israel, reversing his church's chilly attitude toward a Jewish state seen by many Christians as anathema.

"We are deeply saddened by the behaviour of those who in the course of history have caused these children of yours to suffer, and asking your forgiveness, we wish to commit ourselves to genuine brotherhood with the people of the Covenant," the letter the Pope placed between the ancient stones read.

Israelis also remember the Pope lighting the flame of remembrance at Yad Vashem and later greeting Palestinians at a refugee camp in the West Bank.

"He was a symbol of tolerance, and I hope everyone will follow his path," said Victor Zeitoun, 54, a hospital administrator in Haifa. "He taught people how to talk to each other." Zeitoun, who is Catholic, came to Nazareth for mass at the Basilica of the Annunciation, the church built on the spot where Christian tradition says the Angel Gabriel told Mary she was pregnant with Jesus.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was among the Israelis who praised the Pope as a friend to the Jews. Calling the Pope one of the "most important leaders of our generation" Sharon said the world had lost someone "whose great contribution to rapprochement and unity between peoples, understanding and tolerance will be with us for many years."

But John Paul was far from an unconditional friend of Israel.

He outraged many Israelis with his hearty embrace of Yasser Arafat, years before the Palestinian leader had passed from terrorist to statesman in the eyes of many in the West.

During his millennium visit to Israel, the Pope visited sites in Jerusalem, but he conspicuously did not endorse Israel's claim on the city as its eternal capital.

Still, no one was ever in doubt about his dedication to Jewish survival.

That dedication came earlier, at a time when the Pope was a Polish schoolboy named Karol Wojtyla, famed for his generosity with study notes.

"We sat together in class, on the same bench, throughout the years," Josef Bielenstock, an 85-year-old Holocaust survivor who lives in Israel, told Army Radio on Sunday. "I didn't have to do homework or check if I made mistakes. I just copied from him."

John Paul never forgot the Nazi annihilation of Jews, who had made up a quarter of the population of his hometown of Wadowice.

"I can vividly remember the Jews who gathered every Saturday at the synagogue behind the school," he wrote. "Then came the Second World War, with its concentration camps and systematic extermination."

As a priest at the end of the war, the young Wojtyla scoured the streets of Poland, finding food and shelter for those who had been spared death in the Holocaust. "He was a kindred spirit in the greatest sense – a man who could save a girl in such a state, freezing, starving and full of lice, and carry her to safety," one such survivor, Edith Zierer, told Reuters. "I would not have survived had it not been for him."

One survivor, Idit Tzirer, said that she was an emaciated 13-year-old in 1945. She had just been released from a Nazi labor camp and was sitting on a street corner in the snow, too weak to walk, when Wojtyla approached.

Pope repeatedly condemned anti-Semitism

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Though a staunch conservative on most Catholic issues, Pope John Paul II took revolutionary strides during his reign of more than 26 years toward improving Jewish-Catholic relations.

The Pope repeatedly condemned anti-Semitism, commemorated the Holocaust on many occasions, presided over the establishment of diplomatic relations with Israel and met frequently with Jewish religious and lay leaders.

Lingering tensions and unresolved issues remained, but in general, most Jewish observers say, the Polish-born Pontiff, who died Saturday night at age 84 after a lengthy illness, will be remembered as the friendliest pope ever toward the Jews.

"Pope John Paul II was a man of peace, a friend of the Jewish people, who worked to bring about historic reconciliation between the peoples and to renew diplomatic ties between Israel and the Vatican at the end of 1993," Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told his cabinet on Sunday. "Yesterday, the world lost one of the most important leaders of our generation, whose great contribution toward reconciliation, unity among peoples, understanding and tolerance will remain with us for many years."

World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman said Pope John Paul II "reached across millennial divides to promote mutual respect and understanding. His lessons and accomplishments are a legacy for Catholics, Jews and all humanity."

Rabbi Jack Bemporad was one of more than 100 rabbis and cantors who met with the Pope in January to thank him for his commitment.

"No pope has done as much or cared as much about creating a brotherly relationship between Catholics and Jews as Pope John Paul II," Rabbi Bemporad, director of the Center for Interreligious Understanding in Secaucus, N.J., said at the time. "I believe Pope John Paul II will be considered a great healer in the relationship between Catholics and Jews."

In Toronto, CJC national president Ed Morgan said, "This is a tragic loss for the entire human family. The Jewish community, with whom he cultivated a mutually respectful relationship, grieves along with the rest of the world. To use a Yiddish expression that he would have appreciated, John Paul II was a mensch [a good human being] through and through."

"John Paul II was especially moving and eloquent in giving voice to the pain he experienced over the unimaginable Jewish suffering in the Shoah [Holocaust] and to its implications for humankind," Morgan said. "It was this Pope, not coincidentally, who recognized the Jewish people's claim to its ancestral homeland and led the Vatican to establish diplomatic relations with the State of Israel in 1994."

"The Pope took up the spirit of Nostra Aetate, the historic 1965 document issued under Pope John XXIII affirming the eternity of the Divine Covenant with the Jewish people, and turned it into a program for personal action and interfaith reconciliation," said Ottawa's Rabbi Reuven Bulka, CJC's national chair of religious and interreligious affairs.

"The issuance in 2000 by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops of Jubilee: Renewing our common bonds with the Jewish Community, directly reflected John Paul II's attitudes. It has served as a milestone on the road to strong positive Catholic-Jewish relations in our country," Rabbi Bulka said.

In a statement, B'nai Brith Canada said it joins with peoples of all religions and backgrounds in mourning the Pontiff's death. The Pope will be remembered for his important role in fostering Jewish-Christian relations, B'nai Brith said.

Karol Jozef Wojtyla, then the 58-year-old archbishop of Krakow, was elected to the papacy in October 1978. The first pope from Poland and the first non-Italian to sit on the papal throne in more than 450 years, he took the name John Paul II to honour his immediate predecessor, who died after only three weeks in office.

Wojtyla assumed the papacy just 13 years after the Vatican's historic Nostra Aetate declaration opened the way toward Jewish-Catholic dialogue. The declaration, issued in 1965 by the Second Vatican Council convened by Pope John XXIII, condemned anti-Semitism and for the first time, officially repudiated the age-old assertion that the "perfidious Jews" were collectively responsible for the crucifixion of Jesus.

John Paul's papacy built on this, and in Jewish terms, it was marked by dramatic "firsts," starting with the pontiff's own personal history. Born in 1920 in the town of Wadowice, near Krakow, he was an eyewitness both to the Holocaust and to the oppressive and often anti-Semitic policies of communism.

He grew up at a time when Poland was the heartland of European Jewry. The country's 3.5 million Jews represented 10 per cent of Poland's overall population. Wadowice itself was more than 25 per cent Jewish, and the future pope had Jewish friends, neighbours and classmates.

Half of the six million Jews murdered in the Holocaust were Polish, including his friends and neighbours. Wojtyla himself worked in a Nazi slave labour camp and studied for the priesthood in secret.

After World War II, the discovery of what had happened at Auschwitz, only a few miles from his hometown, marked Wojtyla for life.

As Pope, John Paul referred to the 20th century as "the century of the Shoah," and it was highly symbolic that in 1979, on his first visit back to Poland after his election, he knelt in prayer at Auschwitz-Birkenau to commemorate the Jews killed there.

Throughout his reign, Pope John Paul repeatedly recalled the Holocaust and condemned anti-Semitism as a sin against God and humanity. On his more than 100 trips around the globe, he sought to meet with Jewish leaders. He also issued unprecedented expressions of contrition for past Christian hostility and violence toward Jews.

The most dramatic of the Pope's many meetings with Jews took place in April 1986, when he crossed the Tiber River to visit the Great Synagogue in Rome, becoming the first pope to visit a Jewish house of worship since Peter.

After warmly embracing Rome's chief rabbi, the Pope spoke of the "irrevocable covenant" between God and the Jews. With Judaism, he said, "we have a relationship that we do not have with any other religion. You are our dearly beloved brothers and in a certain way, it may be said that you are our elder brothers."

At the end of 1993, the Pope took another unprecedented step, overseeing the formal establishment of full diplomatic relations between Israel and the Holy See, 45 years after the founding of the Jewish state.

The Pope's historic visit to Israel in March 2000 marked a culmination of this process. His visit was formulated as a pilgrimage to the Holy Land to mark the beginning of Christianity's third millennium, but it brimmed with significance for Jews as well.

He visited Yad Vashem, and at Jerusalem's Western Wall, he bowed his head in prayer and slipped a typed, signed note into one of the cracks between the stones.

"We are deeply saddened by the behaviour of those who, in the course of history, have caused these children of yours to suffer, and asking your forgiveness, we wish to commit ourselves to genuine brotherhood with the people of the Covenant," the note said.

But several issues still dog Catholic-Jewish relations and continue to provoke clashes from time to time.

These include differences over what can be called "historical memory" – for example, over the wartime role of Pope Pius XII, whom the Vatican wants to beatify but critics accuse of failing to speak out to save Jews.

There also is a continuing internal debate within the Catholic hierarchy about whether the church as an institution is responsible for anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism, or whether responsibility rests with individuals.

Israel passes budget

Israeli lawmakers passed a $61 billion (US) national budget by a 58-36 vote last week. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon managed to consolidate parliamentary support before the vote by promising funds to causes supported by Shinui, the main opposition party. The vote strengthens Sharon ahead of the government's plans to withdraw from the Gaza Strip and the northern West Bank this summer.

Graves defaced

The grave of Israel's first prime minister David Ben-Gurion and a memorial to Theodor Herzl, the founder of modern Zionism, were defaced with Nazi graffiti, while a vandal scrawled "murderous dog" on former prime minister Yithak Rabin's tomb in Jerusalem's Mount Herzl cemetery last week. The word "Hitler" was written on Ben-Gurion's grave in the Negev. In Jerusalem, vandals scrawled "Neo-Nazis long live Beilin" on the tomb of Herzl, an apparent allusion to left-wing MK Yossi Beilin.

Budget boosts Birthright

The government earmarked $10 million (US) for Birthright Israel. Funding for the program, which enables foreign Jewish students to visit Israel for free, was part of the state budget approved last week, a spokesperson for Diaspora Minister Natan Sharansky said. She said the money would cover one-third of Birthright Israel's 2005 activities, with the rest coming from Jewish groups and private donors.

University of the Galil

Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres announced last week the donation of $100 million (US) by American Arnon Milchan to establish the first university in the Galilee region. The university would be built in Carmiel.

Envoy commits suicide

Israel's ambassador to Ethiopia died Sunday after shooting himself. Doron Grossman was flown back to Israel in critical condition last week after being discovered in an Addis Ababa hotel room with a gunshot wound. Ethiopian police said he shot himself last Tuesday. Israeli sources said Grossman, 49, was distraught after learning he had cancer. His next appointment was to have been ambassador to South Africa.

Militant trained in Syria

A Hamas member admitted he received military training at a Hamas camp in Syria. Osama Mattar, 20, told Associated Press in a jailhouse interview that he received training at a Hamas base outside Damascus earlier this year. It is believed to be the first time a Palestinian has spoken publicly about being trained at a terrorist camp in Syria. Israel long has accused Syria of harboring Palestinian terrorists, but Syrian officials have denied such training camps exist. Israeli officials said the timing of the man's training, which he said took place in February, shows Hamas is not serious about the current Israeli-Palestinian ceasefire.

Will successor have same commitment to Israel?

Outstanding differences on bilateral issues, as well as broader differences over Middle East politics, have also clouded relations with Israel and are the focus of protracted negotiations. These matters include taxes and the legal status of church institutions, as well as questions about visas and residency permits for Christian clergy in Israel.

Looming above all is the question of whether Pope John Paul's proactive teachings about Jews will endure, and whether they will trickle down to the world's 1 billion Catholics.

During his audience with the rabbis and cantors in January, Pope John Paul noted that 2005 marks the 40th anniversary of the Nostra Aetate declaration and urged "renewed commitment to increased understanding and co-operation."

But Jewish observers have expressed concern that Pope John Paul's successor may not have the same commitment.

"You're not going to get anybody with his sensitivity," Rabbi Joseph Ehrenkranz, director of the Center for Christian-Jewish Understanding at Sacred Heart University in Fairfield, Conn., said in January. "The fear is, whatever you've got done can be undone."

But Vatican officials say the Pope's legacy should be safe, noting that the sea-changes wrought by Nostra Aetate in 1965 and by Vatican documents and pronouncements issued throughout John Paul's papacy are enshrined as official church teaching.

Former chief rabbi Lau recalls meeting Pope

"Suddenly, he appeared, like an angel from heaven, when nobody else was taking any notice of me," she said on Israel TV. "He brought me a cup of hot tea and two huge slices of bread and cheese… After a while, he asked me if I wanted to get away from that place and I told him I wanted to get to Krakow, but I couldn't walk. So he hoisted me on his back, like a sack of flour, and carried me four or five kilometres."

Former Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel Meir Lau, also a Holocaust survivor, recalled that he met the Pope five times. At one, the aging pontiff told him that he remembered the rabbi's grandfather going to synagogue every Saturday with masses of grandchildren.

"He asked me: 'How many survived the Holocaust?'" Lau told Israel Radio. "Just five, 42 were killed. And then he [the Pope] looked at the ceiling and said: 'In all my travels – I visited 120 countries – I see anti-Semitism and I emphasize our obligation, the obligation of all humanity, to ensure the continued existence and the future of our elder brother, the Jewish nation.'"

Mrs. Gavsie's eyes lit up when she saw herself in the photo above. A warm smile crossed her lips. She had always taken a special pride in her appearance. She still does. Habs hockey legend visits Metulla rink

By PAUL SHINDMAN
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Rookie Toronto MP and former Montreal Canadiens star goaltender Ken Dryden stepped back on the ice in Israel during a visit last week to the Canada Center in Metulla.

One of the first stops on Dryden's four-day mission to Israel was the Olympic rink in Metulla, where he held talks with officials from the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel (IHFI) and met some local players.

Dryden was amazed the small town of 3,000 had such a large multi-facility sports centre and is home to Israel's ice hockey, figure skating and speed skating programs.

"The surprise and the effect for me is where Metulla is, how right at the border it is and how small it is," Dryden said.

"It clearly doesn't have the capacity to have a centre like that, and yet it has it. That to me was the miracle of it."

Dryden was in Israel to meet with Israeli and Palestinian politicians and finalize negotiations on mutual Israeli-Canadian recognition of pension and retirement benefits for citizens living in each other's countries. The Minister of Community Development also visited Israeli and Palestinian day-care and youth rehabilitation centres.

Dryden paid tribute to the dedication of Israeli hockey players who lace up regularly.

"You don't fall into hockey in Israel by accident," Dryden said. "You could fall into hockey accidentally in Canada, but it's got to be a big choice and a big commitment if you want to play hockey in Israel.

Canada's Minister of Social Development Ken Dryden, back row, second from left, was in Israel last week to meet with Israeli Minister of Housing and Construction Isaac Herzog and conduct a number of visits to day-care centres. While in Israel, the National Hockey League Hall of Fame goalie found time to skate with some young Israeli hockey players at the Canada Center in Metulla. [Isranet photo]

"I'm sure Roger Neilson must have really enjoyed coaching the kids in Metulla because they sure as heck want to play." Neilson, the former coach of the Toronto Maple Leafs, Philadelphia Flyers and Vancouver Canucks who died in 2003, ran a summer hockey camp in Metulla for several years. Another camp staffed with NHL coaches will be held this summer.

Hosted by Metulla Mayor Kobi Katz, Dryden was given a tour of the town, which sits on the Lebanese border. Dryden was accompanied by his wife Lynda, Canadian Ambassador Don Sinclair and a dozen members of his entourage from his ministry.

IHFI president Sergei Matin presented Dryden with a Team Israel sweater and invited him to visit in 2006 when Israel bids to host the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) world under-18 junior championships for division III, which includes Australia, Belgium, Bulgaria, New Zealand and Turkey.

Though the Russians at the Canada Center "are more interested in our [Russian] stars… I remember him as the goalie in the 1972 [Summit] Series," Matin said.

"It was a great feeling. He's a great guy an we talked about hockey, and it's a language l loves above anything else."

The minister didn't have any spare time d his trip, his first visit to Israel. Dryden toure the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and th Western Wall in the Old City of Jerusalem, the walked the streets to see the haredi neigh bourhood of Mea Shearim.

Dryden's visit to the Canada Center too place with almost no advanced notice. IHF Chair Alan Maislin of Montreal was frustra ed that Canadian officials did not inform Katz office that the visiting cabinet minister wa also a onetime hockey star.

"When you get an NHL player of tha caliber, there's no way our children couldn have benefited from having some time wit him. It brings up the profile of hockey in th country," Maislin told The CJN via telephon from the United States, where he was negot ating details of a new hockey rink to be bui in the Tel Aviv area.

In other Israeli hockey developments, th junior under-18 team took the bronze medal a the IIHF Division III championships with thre wins and two losses in the round robin tour nament, finishing behind gold medal winne Australia and Belgium.

Israel's senior national team is currently i Belgrade to compete in the IIHF World Cham pionship Division II Group B against Belgium Spain, Iceland, Serbia and South Korea.

The Afikoman

"Halayla hazeh, halayla hazeh, kulanu misubim." Hadar, my little sister, finished singing Mah Nishtanah. Everyone at the Seder immediately began gushing all over her. "What a beautiful voice she has!" "And she did it in Hebrew too!" "By heart!"

Me? I'm just sitting here near the end of the packed table, completely ignored. I remember a couple of years ago when Hadar was too young to sing, and I got to. But now, I'm a nobody at the Seder. Hadar gets the Ma Nishtana and Aaron gets the afikoman.

"What's the afikoman?" you wanna know. Well, when the seder starts, there are three matzot stacked in front of my father. Right before Hadar sings Mah Nishtanah, my father picks up the middle matzah and breaks it in half. The smaller piece gets put back in the stack, while the larger piece becomes the afikoman.

My father wraps it up in a napkin, and saves it for the end of the Seder, when everyone has to eat a piece of it. And that's where all the fun starts. You see, some time during the Seder, my father sneaks away and hides it. All the kids try to find the afikoman, because whoever does, gets to ransom it back.

The problem is, there's no point in looking for it, because every year, my older brother Aaron finds it first. So that leaves me here at the Seder, with absolutely nothing to do. Blah.

So I tell everybody what I learned in school about Passover. About how we used to be slaves in Egypt, and how God took us out with miracles and all kinds of cool stuff.

And Uncle Pete asks me if I really believe all that stuff happened, and I tell him I do.

And everyone tells me that I'm telling the story of Passover so well, so I guess the seder's not so bad after all. But I still wish I could find the afikoman this year.

"Okay," my father announces. "Now we're all going to wash our hands at the sink before we eat the first piece of matza." Everybody stands up to go to the kitchen, but my father walks toward the living room. He's going to hide the afikoman now! I sneak past my aunts and uncles to try to follow him, but it's too late. He's already coming back. Out of the corner of my eye, I see Aaron watching him too. It's now or never. While everyone else washes at the sink, Aaron and I dash to the living room. It won't be between the bookcases, it was there last year. Maybe it's in the sofa. I pick up all the cushions one by one, but's it's not there either.

"I got it!" screams Aaron triumphantly, lifting up the folded napkin from under a quilt, and my heart sinks. But what should I have expected? Of course he would find it again this year.

I go to the kitchen to wash.

"You know," Aaron says to me, crunching down his romaine lettuce, "It's almost unfair the way I get the afikoman every year. I was thinking that this year should be your turn."

I almost choke on my matzah. "You're going to give it to me?"

"Well, not give it to you. I was thinking more like hiding it again. If you find it, fine. If not, I still get it. Whaddaya think?"

"Of course. I mean, thanks!"

Aaron gets up to hide it. "But no peeking!"

* * * * *

And I look and I look and I look everywhere and I only have a few minutes left to find the afikoman before it's too late. And I'm ready to give up.

"Danny, are you looking for that?" It's Hadar, and she's pointing to — the afikoman! It's sticking out of a picture frame, way out of her reach.

I climb on the couch, and can just barely reach it. I'm about to run into the dining room yelling, "I found the afikoman," when I realize that I didn't. Hadar did. I don't deserve a prize. She does.

And she's positively beaming. "Now we both get a prize, right?"

"Both?"

"Yeah. I found the afkiforman.but I couldn't reach it. You reached it but you couldn't find it."

"Yeah, and Aaron hid it. I think we all deserve a prize."

Look good, feel good

I have noticed that when people look good, they tend to be more pleasant and feel more self-confident. They are also more inclined to greet others and to smile.

Our lives are harried, with multiple priorities constantly battling for our time. We never know which priority to place first. Do we make that phone call, pay our bills, go to the mailbox, answer the telephone, plan supper, answer our e-mail messages – or take a few moments to brush our hair and swipe on some lipstick? It's a hard choice, since we often tend to put ourselves and our personal needs last, especially when our daily demands far exceed the time available!

Those of us who are self-employed or who don't work outside the home have less external pressure to groom ourselves properly, since we spend most of our day indoors, with little interaction with others. We tend to assume that we don't need to put on a "nice face" since we will just quickly run out for groceries, or to the bank, or to do carpool, all the while hoping that no one will see us, or better yet, if we do see someone we know, we will pretend not to see them!

Inevitably, of course, we do run into someone, and that short trip outside tends to take longer. We wind up feeling embarrassed and making excuses about our unkempt appearance.

But people who feel bad about themselves tend to "hibernate" even more and reject social interactions.

Although it may sound a bit superficial, I have become a firm believer in taking a few extra minutes to grab that fast shower, throw on some makeup and put on some flattering clothes. If necessary, we can get it down to a science! Five minutes for a shower, four minutes to put on makeup, three minutes to dry our hair and three minutes to get dressed – total time, 15 minutes.

Somehow, we can find 15 minutes in our day. For men, a quick shave and shower will take even less time. The rewards will far exceed the time taken. People will look at us more favourably, we will have a more positive outlook and our interactions with all those people we would otherwise pretend not to see might even be rewarding.

We should do this instead of answering that one extra phone call; we can always check the message later.

The Torah teaches us that, in fact, it is more important to be well-groomed for our spouses than it is for others, whereas the values of our society have us do the exact opposite! When we get home, we stop caring about how we look, taking the time to fix ourselves up only for the outside world.

Yet, if we manage to make the time to take care of ourselves for others, all the more reason to present an attractive image for our loved ones. Not only will our spouses appreciate it, but our children will also respond favourably. Mom will be seen as more than just the cook, house cleaner, homework helper and mediator. She will be seen as all of those things, as well as the person who takes pride in who she is. A well-groomed Dad will be more fun to wrestle with on the floor, or cuddle, and the children will be proud to be seen with him in public.

Our external selves do create impressions. It is up to us to ensure that the impression we create is favourable. Not that our focus should only be on the external. On the contrary, our internal selves are what count the most, but by feeling good about how we look, we will feel better inside too, which will result in a more positive outlook overall.

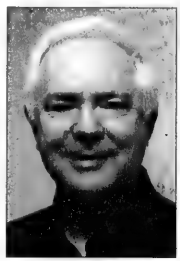
Mount Sinai researcher wins Wolf Prize

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Anthony Pawson, director of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, has been named one of three 2005 Wolf Prize winners in medicine for his research into cancer development and treatment.



Dr. Anthony Pawson

Pawson, 52, received the annual prize, which has been awarded since 1978 to scientists and artists by the Israel-based Wolf Foundation, for "his discovery of protein domains essential for mediating protein-protein interactions in cellular signalling pathways, and the insights this research has provided into cancer," Mount Sinai said.

The $100,000 (US) prize aims to promote science and art for the benefit of mankind. Five are awarded each year in rotating areas of arts and science.

Pawson is sharing his award with fellow cancer researchers Dr. Anthony Hunter of the Salk Institute in La Jolla, Calif., and Prof. Alexander Levitzki of Hebrew University.

Pawson said his research aims to find out how the proteins that cause cancer work. "We developed a new way of seeing how cells are put together. Because of this, new therapies can be developed."

He said this is really basic science. "We want to see what goes wrong in the body, so that we can create treatments that are less toxic and more efficient."

Israeli Consul General Ya'acov Brosh presented Pawson with a certificate in a recent ceremony at the Israeli consulate. Pawson will formally accept his prize from Israeli President Moshe Katsav on May 22 in Israel.

Brosh said the Wolf Prize shows "how much we value achievements, our own and around the world, that can help humanity."

Film about Israeli military entertainers out on DVD

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Video Services Corporation (VSC) has been releasing a number of Israeli films on DVD recently. Some of these are golden oldies, while others are real gems of the Israeli cinema.

One such classic is The Troupe, which also happens to be one of my favourite Israeli films of all time.

The Troupe tells the story of an army entertainment troupe and the backstage shenanigans that went on within these groups.

During the 1960s and '70s, the Israeli army had many such groups. At one point each territorial command had its own group, the air force and navy each had its own group and the armoured corps had a group, as did such specialized units such as NAHAL (Pioneer and Youth Corps).

Many of Israel's biggest stars started out as members of these groups. Eventually, the Israeli army blew the whistle and disbanded most of these troupes, preferring instead to go with smaller, less expensive groups of entertainers.

The Troupe is sort of a tribute to the heyday of this phenomenon. The film is set in 1968, shortly after the Six Day War, and follows three rookie members of one such group from the auditions, through their integration into the unit, all the way to their live television broadcast to the entire nation.

The DVD version of the film was released to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the film and presents it with a digitally remastered picture and sound. This edition comes on two discs, with almost two hours of special features, including The Troupe – Then and Now, The Troupe – Reunion, Casting the Troupe, music video clips and much more. Some of these extra features have English subtitles and some don't, so the Hebrew- speaking viewer will get more out of the extras than those of us who can't speak the language.

The film itself comes with English subtitles and is an entertaining mix of comedy and some of the best music to come out of Israel during this era. This is also the film that is played on Israeli television on almost every Independence Day.

Other DVDs recently released by VSC include Songs In Uniforms: The Songs of Israeli Army Bands and contains 10 songs, matching the music to entertaining video clips, while the lyrics are displayed at the bottom of the screen – in Hebrew or in a transliterated form. It's up to the viewer to decide which form he or she prefers.

There is also a karaoke feature that allows the viewer to sing along. The DVD comes in PAL and NTSC. All you have to do is flip it over to get the format you prefer.

> The film is set in 1968, shortly after the Six Day War

Another film, The Hit, features Hagashash Hachiver, a popular comedy group. This is a film from 1979 with a silly story line and over-acting cast. Its sole saving grace for audiences today is the fact that the cast includes Ofra Haza, the Israeli singing superstar who succeeded in breaking through into the international music market and who is featured on the soundtrack of the film Prince of Egypt. Her sudden death a few years ago shocked her millions of fans around the world and this DVD is dedicated to her memory.

The Hit was probably Haza's first film appearance and includes her performing the song Freha. The film also features a score by Zvika Pick, a singer/songwriter well-known to fans of Israeli music.

All three DVDs are now available and can be ordered by most video stores from their distributors or directly from VSC at 416-597-8325.

Bring out the rugelach...TJFF is a month away

Get ready to watch great Jewish movies and nosh on gefilte fish balls, knishes and rugelach.

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival opens its bar mitzvah year with the multi-award winning film by Eran Riklis, The Syrian Bride.

The Syrian Bride, about a Druze woman from the Golan Heights who is engaged to a Syrian man and can never return home if she moves to Syria, won three top honours (best actor, actress and director) at the Israeli Film Academy Awards; the People's Choice Awards at the Montreal World Film Festival; and Best Screenplay at the Flanders International Film Festival.

The Syrian Bride is one of dozens of films screening at this year's festival, which runs May 7 to 15.The festival closes with the Russian film Papa, about an imaginary shtetl in Moscow.

Some of the themes at this year's festival include music, forgiveness and Israeli features.

Among the music films are Awake Zion, a documentary about the convergence of Rasta, reggae and Judaism. Another documentary, Channels of Rage, follows Israeli rapper Subliminal (who recently toured Canada) over three years.

Academy Award nominee Sister Rose's Passion leads off the forgiveness theme. This documentary is about Sister Rose Therring, a Roman Catholic nun, whose soul searching in the 1960s resulted in a Church declaration that Jews could no longer be blamed for the death of Christ.

The short comedy Two Minutes From Faradis, about a teenage girl who rebels by dating an Arab man, and the coming-of-age Hebrew film Bonjour Monsieur Schlomi are two of the Israeli films presented.

The festival will also include midnight screenings of Jericho's Echo: Punk in the Holy Land, Channels of Rage, and Rex Steele: Nazi Smasher, a short animated feature that parodies the old-fashioned newsreel.

This year's festival includes films from more than 18 different countries; a special presentation of the documentary Protocols of Zion; and the premiere of Canadian controversial director Igal Hecht's Not in My Name.

The TJFF is the largest of more than 100 Jewish film festivals worldwide. It is the only film festival (Jewish or not) to offer food.

The festival will be at the Bloor Cinema (at Bathurst) and the Al Green Theatre of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. The TJFF box office opens April 18 at 17 Madison Ave., Toronto.

Tickets range from $6 to $20 for individual movies and passes are $60 to $200. Box office hotline, 416-324-9121. Check www.tjff.com for up to date information.

Legendary producer encourages local singer/songwriter

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Playing a gig at a Bathurst and Eglinton coffee shop, Adlai Waxman fielded a comment from a listener who appreciates the power of lyricism.

"Please turn up the microphone because I like to focus on the words," said Margaret Atwood, sitting a few feet away from the band.

When a Canlit megastar takes the time to check out your tunes, it could be a prophetic sign of good things to come. Waxman, a 29-year-old pianist and singer, is already enjoying success in an industry where potent lyricism counts as much as catchy melodies.

It would be tough to peg Toronto-born Waxman into a category, which is why he labels his style as "singer/songwriter," much in the same vein as Randy Newman, Bob Dylan and Tom Waits.

"I'm now committed to music, full-time," Waxman says in an interview at Toronto's Free Times Café, where he has performed klezmer music during the Sunday afternoon buffet. "I take pride in being an independent artist."

In the Jewish community, his name may sound familiar to any followers of Mark Weinstock, Beyond the Pale, Bais Groove or Theresa Tova – Waxman has collaborated with all these indie musicians, in one form or another.

Familiar with diverse musical styles, Waxman realizes that breadth could give him an edge in the competitive music business. Already, he is a few steps ahead of most: in May 2004, he released a six-track indie album called Pomona Valley, and he embarked on a 45-day tour that took him from Asheville, N.C., to St. Catharines, Ont.

"And I guess I should announce something now," Waxman says tentatively, and then goes on to explain how he signed a management deal with Boston-based Foley Entertainment, a music consultant group that handles artists' bookings, album solicitation and American business deals.

"Music is my baby, and I'm sensitive who represents it, but I'm confident I'm putting my career in a positive direction with Foley," says Waxman. At the behest of Foley, Waxman will soon record a five-track demo CD to send to music venues and record labels.

Adlai Waxman

To date, Waxman has played in several cities in Ontario and British Columbia, a handful in Quebec, in Israel, and in American states such as Vermont, New Jersey and New York.

While he relishes live performances with his own band, which now includes new members on violin, bass and drums, he pays the bills by working as a studio or session musician. When a band looks for a fill-in piano player, Waxman is available for gigs or studio work.

"I was once the only white guy in a reggae band practising in the basement of a Trinidadian restaurant," Waxman recalls, smiling.

Then Ray Charles' Georgia on My Mind seeps from the Free Times speakers and I point out that I'm interviewing an up-and-coming pianist/singer while listening to a legendary one.

Waxman launches into his Ray Charles connection. After he gave his well-connected uncle a copy of Pomona Valley, he received an inspiring phone call while driving down Bathurst Street. It was from Jerry Wexler, the producer for Ray Charles' music.

"He told me I could fit in with the best of them," Waxman says, "and whenever I get down on myself, I think about his words."

Wexler wasn't just being tactful. In Pomona Valley, the original melodies are wistfully sweet, while Waxman's voice resembles an early Elton John. Ardent music lovers showed their appreciation: the track Nothing Left rocketed to number 1 on the CBC New Music Canada website, and it also nabbed top spots on two Internet radio stations.

The album's themes revolve around his experience in Vancouver, where he took music classes at Capilano College and played in the city and at the Vancouver Jazz Festival.

"Why move back to Toronto if Vancouver acted as a musical muse?

"For every one bar to play there, there are three here in Toronto," Waxman says. "I need to be around a strong, vibrant music scene, because my goal in 2005 is to play even more shows than I do now."

He wants to concentrate on making a name for himself in university towns, where audiences have so far embraced his band with open arms and enthusiastic applause. He is also keen to play to older audiences because, as Waxman says, "my music is for everybody."

Like a Randy Newman with a splash of Ben Folds Five, Waxman is a talented songwriter hoping to offer a fresh alternative to the hohum alt-rock blasting from radio stations in Canada. But with every artistic dream, isn't there a backup plan, a career option in case music doesn't pan out?

Waxman shakes his head. "Nope, that's not an option. There's no turning back now." He pauses. "Nor would I want to turn back."

To purchase Waxman's CD Pomona Valley, visit www.adlaiwaxman.com. He plays in Toronto at the Renaissance Café, 1938 Danforth Ave., on May 30 and at C'est What, 67 Front St. E., on June 14.

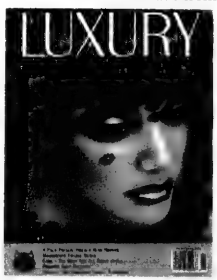
Collector turns a passion for vintage jewelry into a business

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

What's old is new again – that is with jewelry.

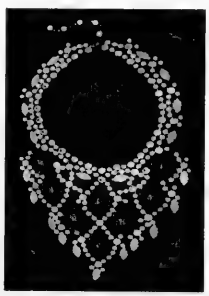
Gemstones have been adorning women and men for thousands of years. They are a sign of wealth, they enhance the appearance of an outfit, and they can be tokens of love and friendship.

These days, vintage costume jewelry – necklaces, pins, earrings, rings and bracelets – can be seen on runways, at posh parties, in the movies and on television, as well as with everyday outfits.



Carole Tanenbaum's jewelry designs have graced the covers of magazines.

Carole Tanenbaum, who has been an incurable collector since childhood, has turned her love of art and jewelry into an international business. Her collectibles are now sold in 40 venues.



Tanenbaum's current collection includes Bakelite (an early form of plastic) bracelets, bug and butterfly pins, Scottish Victorian sterling jewels, Czech pieces and designer-stamped pieces.

Born and raised in Brooklyn, N.Y., she moved to Toronto when she married real estate developer Howard Tanenbaum.

"My parents were in the art world and they gave me my ground work, my basis for looking at items and looking at them as collectibles," she says.

A pioneer in vintage jewelry (jewelry that is made from non-precious materials), she has more than 8,000 pieces in her collection. "I saw a fantasy and creativity in this jewelry and you couldn't do it with real stones," she says. "What is junk to one person is another person's treasure."

She anticipated the current revival of interest in vintage jewelry 10 years ago, when she set up Carole Tanenbaum Vintage Department at Holt Renfrew on Toronto's Bloor Street and has become known for her jewelry in the fashion industry.

Tanenbaum has one of North America's premier collections of vintage costume jewelry, much of it dating from the 1940s, '50s and '60s, with some pieces dating back to the Victorian period.

Buyers from department stores as far away as Hong Kong come to Tanenbaum for their accessories. Her jewelry is used in fashion shows, fashion shoots, television and films, including in the movie Chicago. She has exhibited in New York at Bergdorfs and, recently, the exclusive Selfridges in London, England, opened a Carole Tanenbaum Vintage Jewelry Department.

Her collection also includes a unique line of hair accessories, beaded bags and Lucite '50s purses. She buys vintage items from around the world.

"My husband and I love to travel, and on our travels, we look for treasures," she says.

"I love my work and never feel as though I am working. I can still pick up a brooch and feel the thrill and rush of its beauty. And when I find a rare piece, it is like finding a treasure."

Although the pieces are fake jewels, Tanenbaum says that she can tell if they are "authentic" or copies. "It takes experience. The more you see, the more you know."

Major auction houses, recognizing that faux jewelry is in vogue, are now including vintage jewelry at their sales. "Pieces that I paid $50 for about 10 or 15 years ago, today are valued at $850 to $1,000," she says. "More people and institutions are collecting vintage pieces, so there is less supply."

Tanenbaum will be speaking about costume jewelry at a sold-out lecture at the Royal Ontario Museum on April 10.

She is writing a book on her personal jewelry collection titled Fabulous Fakes. It will include a section on how vintage jewelry fits into current fashion trends.

Emma Richler's darkly comic novel is about familial love

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Emma Richler would much rather write than talk, at least on this cold Monday morning in Toronto in early March.

"It's so unnatural for a writer to talk about herself and her work," she said with a touch of exasperation. "The natural thing for a writer is to sit at home and write."

But on this particular day, in the airy boardroom of Random House, her Canadian publisher, she has no alternative but to submit to yet another interview to promote her second book and first novel, Feed My Dear Dogs.

"It's difficult," she said, referring to the demands imposed on her by a gruelling cross-Canada book tour. "It makes you feel so sick."

But being a trouper, Richler is anything but monosyllabic. She may be the daughter of Mordecai Richler, the illustrious and curmudgeonly Montreal novelist who could be verbally parsimonious when locked in conversations with journalists. Yet unlike her late father, who died a few years ago, Richler can chat up a storm if she is in the mood.

Having been an actress, she has an advantage over him. She is accustomed to performing in front of an audience, even if it consists of only a solitary reporter with a notebook and ballpoint pen.

As she put it, "I can get over my nerves and launch myself into the life of my characters."

And so Richler – a pale, waif-like figure with streaked hair who forms her literate sentences in a somewhat sultry British accent – is ready to discuss Feed My Dear Dogs, a darkly comic novel about familial love narrated by Jemina Weiss, a young woman looking back nostalgically on her childhood in the Weiss family.

A boisterous, intelligent clan bearing more than merely a passing resemblance to the Richlers, the Weisses are unmistakably Richlerian.

The father, Yaakov, is a rumpled sportswriter who doles out his words in small doses. The mother, Frances, is beautiful and approachable. Like the Richlers, they have five children, two girls and three boys.

Richler, who grew up in London and Montreal, maintains that Feed My Dear Dogs is not autobiographical, but in fact a work of the imagination.

A writer inevitably draws on his or her experiences, she explained. "You borrow details. Life feeds the imagination. That's how it goes. That's the fun of it. The characters were very distinct in my mind, but quite different from my own family."

Pausing for effect, she added, "I don't write non-fiction."

Feed My Dear Dogs, which is scheduled to be published in the United States later this year, takes up the narrative thread of Sister Crazy, her short story collection that won the 2002 Jewish Book Award for fiction.

Richler, 43 and single, has no intention of including the Weiss' family in her third book, which she is currently writing.

"It's a completely different novel," she said, declining for superstitious reasons to be more specific.

"It was fun while it lasted, but new people have come on stage. The family is not powerfully with me anymore. A new thing has taken hold. The Weisses are not with me now, but may come back in 15 years."

As Richler tells it, she never intended to emulate her famous father and become a professional writer. After studying French literature at the University of Toronto and the University of Provence in southern France, she trained to be an actress at the Circle in the Square in New York City.

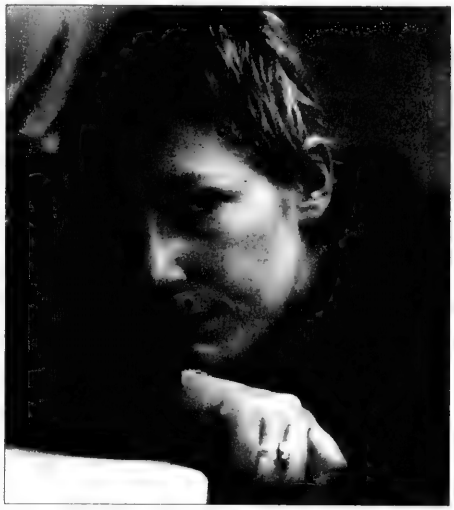
Returning to Canada, she snagged small parts at the Young People's Theatre in Toronto and the Stratford Festival. Subsequently, she appeared in a succession of plays and television dramas in London and read poetry on BBC radio.

"I was doing well at acting and getting good roles," she noted. "But the life of an actor didn't suit me. I'm not a social person and you have to be in acting." Hammering home her point, she said, "I'm a private person."

In 1997, after 10 years, she left the stage and went back to London. "I missed it. I was born and brought up in London. It was familiar to me."

Embarking on a fresh career as a manuscript reader, Richler began writing reports for Random House in London. "I needed the money, and I liked the people. It was a very nice job, like doing book reviews."

For Richler, a voracious reader who grew up in a house filled with books, it was an ideal position.



Emma Richler

"We were all interested in books," she recalled, referring to her parents and her siblings, Daniel, Noah, Jacob and Martha. "No one had to be forced to read. We all fell in love with books."

She especially enjoyed the novels of Charles Dickens and the Russian classics. And she lapped up the enchanting stories in the Tintin adventure series, originally published in France.

Within approximately a year of resettling in London, she set pen to paper and started writing Sister Crazy. "I didn't begin until I felt I had a distinct voice. When I'm writing, I feel voices and rhythm."

She considers her talent a gift from the gods. "Writing on this level is innate," she mused. "You can't be taught the essential things, though you can learn to do it better."

The first person who read Richler's work in progress, Sister Crazy, was her mother, Florence, a convert to Judaism who divides her time between London and Montreal.

Richler generously describes her as her muse. "She's a brilliant reader and critic, and is invaluable. She affected my father's writing and sensibility, and it's been the same for me. She's very important to me as an ear."

Florence Richler also encouraged her to show Sister Crazy to her dad. Having read the first chapter, he was similarly impressed. "He gave me a bone-crushing bear hug and said I had a special voice."

For a man of so few words, this was fulsome praise. "He was very proud of me and profoundly encouraging."

Having been raised Jewish, Richler feels at ease in Jewish culture, which she calls a "great gift to the world."

And thus it is not surprising that Feed My Dear Dogs is sprinkled with Jewish references, ranging from rabbinical scholar Moses ben Maimon and baseball player Hank Greenberg to the shtetl, bagels and challah.

"I'm interested in Jewish culture – otherwise I wouldn't have been able to explore it. It's one of the most sympathetic and culturally rich things that can be. I can't imagine not being Jewish."

Though she was reluctant to enter into a discussion about politics, a subject her father relished, Richler admitted she is personally discomfited by the "veiled anti-Semitic sentiment" in the British press when the topic is Israel.

"Some anti-Zionism is a polite cover for anti-Semitic feelings," observed Richler, qualifying her remark by saying the Israeli government "can behave very badly."

Although she does not regard Israel as just another country in the Middle East, she rejects Israel's territorial claims beyond its 1967 borders.

"I don't believe, biblically, anything belongs to anyone anywhere. The world is for sharing. God never said, 'Don't share.'"

Israeli journalist's frank memoir reviews an exciting life

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hirsh Goodman has been there and done that as a journalist and editor.

A South African Jew of Latvian origin, Goodman made aliyah in 1965. He lived on a kibbutz, served in the Israeli army, wrote for the Jerusalem Post and founded the Jerusalem Report (to which he still contributes a column). Today, he is a senior research associate at Tel Aviv University's Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies.

Having had a rich life, he recounts his experiences in his first book, a frank, stimulating memoir titled Let Me Create a Paradise, God Said to Himself: A Journey of Conscience from Johannesburg to Jerusalem (HarperCollins).

Goodman, who was in Toronto on April 6 to discuss the book at Holy Blossom Temple, was born in Port Elizabeth on March 6, 1946, but raised in Johannesburg. Likening South Africa's close-knit Jewish community to a family, he suggests that its members enjoyed a cozy and comfortable lifestyle that even Jews of modest means, such as his parents, could afford.

Raised by a black nanny and domestic servant whose gefilte fish was apparently the talk of the town, Goodman loved South Africa, but he was not at peace with its unjust apartheid system. Indeed, he describes the South Africa of his youth as "a cruel and violent society."

At 15, after witnessing a fight between two black men that was emblematic of South Africa's racial inequities, he decided to immigrate to Israel. It was not a surprising choice. A member of Habonim whose father was a Hebrew teacher, Goodman had been brought up as a Zionist.

He left the country for good in 1965 after fulfilling his duty as a soldier in the South African army. He recalls that period with some distaste.

Goodman's "romantic phase" with Zionism ended quickly when members of his kibbutz burst into raucous laughter while watching the film version of Exodus. "To the Israelis in the dining hall, this was hilarious kitsch, an embarrassment," he writes. Yet, he continued to see Israel in idealistic terms, and was happy and felt alive in the Jewish state.

His rite of passage from bright-eyed Zionist to Israeli occurred when he earned his red beret as a paratrooper. Boot camp was tough, but it prepared him for skirmishes with Syria over water rights and the wars to come. Assigned to the 50th Paratroop Battalion, Goodman fought in the northern Sinai Peninsula during the Six Day War, which he describes as "an existential war of survival."

Memories of that war linger in his mind: the incredible sight of thousands of pairs of boots hastily abandoned in the sand dunes by fleeing Egyptian soldiers; the utter contempt for Arabs that Israeli Druze troops showed in a mosque; their brutal interrogative method in questioning an Egyptian air force officer.

Goodman's political consciousness was aroused by David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, in a radio broadcast during the war. Citing the imperative of demography, Ben Gurion warned Israel it would be better off without the new territories and their Palestinian inhabitants.

He returns to this theme periodically. At one point, he observes that Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip "was eating away at the nation." Later, in a different context, he sums it up as "a curse that would consume us from within."

Goodman portrays his entry into journalism in 1971 as accidental. A seminar paper on the Cuban missile crisis he had written at university was given a failing grade, having been judged to be "too journalistic." He headed for The Jerusalem Post, where the whiff of fresh ink and molten lead captivated him.

He landed a job in the advertising department, but Goodman had already set his sights on editorial work. Thanks to a patient mentor, he learned the essentials of reporting.

His big break came early one evening when the editor, Ted Lurie, met him in a corridor. "He told me to follow him, which I did, all the way to the men's room, where he proceeded to take a leak. While doing so he asked me if I wanted to be the paper's military reporter." And thus Goodman's career was launched.

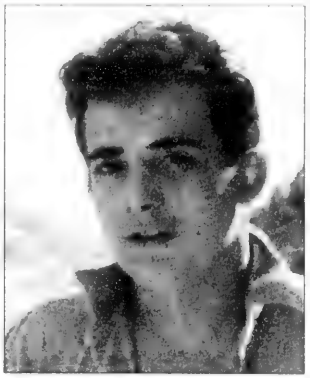
He has many stories to tell, and one of the most interesting turns on the breathtaking arrogance of Israel's chief of military intelligence in the days leading up to the 1973 Yom Kippur War. Ignoring all evidence to the contrary, Eli Zeira claimed that Egypt was merely posturing. "Who was I to argue?" he writes.

Goodman, who was called up as a reservist during the war, regrets he was conned and bought into the seductive myth of Israeli invincibility. "All this I dutifully reported, verbatim, unquestioning, uncritically," he confesses.

He adds: "One would have thought that the Yom Kippur War would have taught Israel and its leaders about the limits of brute strength and deterrence. It did neither."

In this critical spirit, Goodman punctures the aura of the legendary Moshe Dayan, the then-defence minister. Dayan was arrogant, rude to reporters and not much of a mensch, he notes.

Goodman had a lot on his plate when he returned to his job after six months in the reserves – the war of attrition on the Golan Heights and the terrorist attacks in Kiryat Shmona and Ma'alot. "The work was relentless."



Hirsh Goodman as a young man

Burned out, he signed on as a Jewish Agency emissary in St. Louis, Mo. He got off to a disastrous start, but recovered, spending two "fabulous" years in the United States.

Returning to the Post, Goodman went back to his old position as a defence reporter. He made an amazing voyage on an Israeli missile boat to Djibouti. He covered Anwar Sadat's historic trip to Jerusalem, quietly sobbing as the Egyptian president stepped off his airplane. He paid a visit to Cairo, impressed by the friendliness of merchants who offered him a "peace price" on goods.

In 1978, Goodman came upon "a scene of sheer horror" after terrorists killed 37 Israelis on the road from Haifa to Tel Aviv. The stench of burning flesh turned him into a vegetarian for the next nine years. Israel responded to the attack by invading southern Lebanon in Operation Litani. Goodman covered it, but was almost blown up by a land mine.

He was also in the thick of things following Israel's second invasion of Lebanon in 1982. Goodman reminds readers that this war was waged without public consensus and left the problem of Palestinian terror unresolved. Goodman was not impressed by the behaviour of Israel's then-defence minister, Ariel Sharon. "His arrogance was monumental, his brazenness beyond belief."

Goodman left the Post in 1988, sick of "writing about the same things" and miffed because he had not been included in a management shuffle that turned the paper to the left. He glosses over his year at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, and strangely enough, remains mum about his interregnum as vice-president of the Post. His observations about the founding of the Jerusalem Report are pungent, yet all too brief.

Typically, he does not pull his punches in analyzing the political situation: Jewish settlers with children who remained in Gaza after the second Palestinian uprising are either fanatics or fools. Full peace with Israel was not on the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's agenda. The attempt by Ehud Barak, Israel's prime minister from 1999 to 2001, to reach an end-of-conflict agreement with Arafat was ill-conceived.

Goodman thinks that Sharon's insistence on achieving an interim agreement with the Palestinians has merit. It would launch a promising peace process, he claims.

He dismisses critics who compare Israel to apartheid-era South Africa as malevolent ignoramuses.

In this engaging memoir, Goodman sometimes succumbs to pessimism. But his last sentence brims with optimism. "I have seen the end of apartheid and witnessed modern Israel rising from the ashes of the Holocaust. Don't tell me miracles can't happen."

Israel & the Jewish World

Overseas conversions recognized

By YUVAL YOAZ
Ha'artez Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israeli residents who travel overseas solely for the purpose of undergoing a non-Orthodox conversion are entitled to Israeli citizenship under the Law of Return, the High Court of Justice ruled last week in a 7-4 decision.

The precedent-setting decision was handed down in a petition filed in 1999 by 17 tourists and legal foreign workers who have lived in Israel as temporary residents for many years. All of the petitioners studied for conversion in Israel, but underwent the actual conversion overseas.

While overseas residents who underwent non-Orthodox conversions in their own communities have long been eligible for citizenship under the Law of Return, the state has hitherto refused to recognize overseas conversions by Israeli residents unless the convert resided in the community in which he converted for at least a year.

"The Jewish nation is one," Supreme Court President Aharon Barak wrote in the verdict. "It is dispersed around the world, in communities. Whoever converted to Judaism in one of these communities overseas has joined the Jewish nation by so doing, and is to be seen as a 'Jew' under the Law of Return."

Several of the justices, however, ruled that since overseas conversion entitles the convert to Israeli citizenship, the state has the right to "set criteria for the recognition of overseas conversions." Lawyers working for the state said that such criteria could include a "minimum time" that the convert must spend in the relevant overseas community overseas – a criterion that, if adopted, would effectively restore the status quo and render yesterday's ruling meaningless.

Last week's ruling predictably elicited furious reactions from the Orthodox and joyful ones from the non-Orthodox movements and secular politicians.

Israel's chief rabbis, Shlomo Amar and Yonah Metzger, along with Shas spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef and former chief rabbis Mordechai Eliyahu, Avraham Shapira and Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron, declared: "There is no value or weight to 'conversions' not performed by an Orthodox rabbinical court in accordance with the conversion procedures specified in the Shulchan Aruch. Any such conversion, under its various names such as 'Reform' or 'Conservative,' has no validity…"

Shas chair Eli Yishai called the ruling an "explosives belt that has formed an identity terror attack against the Jewish people," and his party collected the necessary 25 signatures from Knesset members to convene a special Knesset session this week, even though the house is officially recessed.

The Israel Religious Action Centre – the Israeli branch of the Reform movement, and the organization that represented the petitioners in court – was pleased with the verdict, but disappointed that it did not extend to conversions in Israel. The Conservative Movement's response was similar.

Secular politicians were unequivocally enthusiastic. Shinui MK Etti Livni called the ruling "a historic breakthrough," adding that Reform Judaism would now cease to be a stepchild of the Jewish people. Yachad leader Yossi Beilin said the ruling would "finally break the Orthodox monopoly over conversion."

Kitchener centre one of youngest players in OHL

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For most of his young career, Myles Applebaum has "played up."

From the time he turned nine until his 15th birthday, he played competitive hockey with guys who were one year older.

Sure, there was a two-year stretch during his midget years when he played within his age group, but he's back at it again as one of the youngest guys on the Kitchener Rangers, a barely 17-year-old playing against 19- and 20-year-olds.

When you're one of the rookies on a talented OHL team, ice time can be limited, but Toronto-born Applebaum isn't complaining. He knows he has to pay his dues and earn a position as one of the team's go-to guys.

In his first regular season as a centre with the Rangers, he's seen spot duty as a checker and a grinder. Applebaum, however, knows he has lots more to show.

A good scorer throughout his minor hockey career, he believes his time will come and he'll be able to revert to his point-popping past. Earlier this season, he showed how prolific he can be when he scored four goals and two assists in only six games – second on the team – to help Team Ontario during an international under-17 tournament.

The Christmas-time tourney, which attracted top teams from across Canada, the United States and Europe, was the highlight of his hockey career, he said on the line from Kitchener.

The competition was awesome, he got to line up with top Ontario players and he enjoyed the international atmosphere, he said.

Although Ontario lost the bronze medal game to a team representing the Atlantic region, Applebaum really clicked in the tournament, making the experience all the more sweet. "I just found my groove," he said.

Back in Kitchener, the 6-2, 185-lb. centre had an okay season, scoring two goals and six assists in 44 games. The Rangers, he said, are a pretty fast team with big, strong defencemen. Up front, they feature a mix of quick wingers and bigger checking-style players who like to dump the puck deep and cycle it. The style should suit the team, which finished third in the Midwest Division, in the first round of the playoffs against the fourth-place Erie Otters, he said.

Post-season play will allow Applebaum to lock horns with two other Jewish players in the OHL, Erie goaltender Jhase Sniderman of Toronto and defenceman Jake Heller of Skokie, Ill. That is, if he bounces back from a late season shoulder separation.

Rangers coach Peter DeBoer said he expected Applebaum to lace up for at least one of the games versus Erie. The series was tied 2-2 at The CJN's press time with three of the games decided in overtime.

DeBoer thinks Applebaum has "a bright future with the Rangers." Although he's one of the youngest players in the league, let alone on the team, Applebaum shows good maturity and hockey smarts, Deboer said.

"His transition [to the OHL] has been seamless."

DeBoer predicts Applebaum will eventually secure a spot as the team's number one or two centre. He even ventures to say that he has "potential as a pro."

"He's a typical power forward," DeBoer said. "He's a big kid who plays a power game."

Myles Applebaum

A fifth-round selection by the Rangers in the OHL's entry draft, Applebaum believes he would have been chosen higher had it not been known he was close to signing with Michigan State University.

But the prospect of playing for DeBoer, a two-time OHL coach of the year, and the rest of the Rangers' coaching staff helped sway his decision, as did the fact OHL games are heavily scouted by NHL personnel. That Kitchener is only an hour away from home – meaning his parents, Mark and Susan, and sister Dori, can drive over to watch him play – was also a factor.

Back when he was a house league player, rising at 5:30 a.m. for morning games, Applebaum played for the love of the sport. When he hit 14, he realized that making the OHL was a realistic possibility. From there, the NHL beckons.

"Like other kids, I always hoped to make the NHL. Now I figure it's a possibility," he said.

Still, his parents, who sent him to Sunday school at Temple Emanu-El, always stressed family and education.

"I guess playing in the NHL would just be a bonus," he said.

Tournament brings together day school hockey teams

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The mid-March date has become a fixture on the calendars of Jewish day schools across Toronto. It's an opportunity for school spirit to peak and for administrators to bus kids to a hockey rink to watch the school's best players face off against those from other Jewish educational institutions.

The 10th annual Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Hockey Tournament recently attracted almost 250 players on 15 teams from 11 schools to the rinks at York University's Ice Gardens. Many fans also made the trek to take in the action.

Divided into a junior competition for youngsters in grades 3 to 5 and a senior tournament for kids in grades 6 through 8, teams played from three to five games in a single day.

When the final whistle blew, the team representing Leo Baeck Day School's northern branch defeated a team from United Synagogue Day School's Bayview Avenue campus to capture bragging rights in the senior competition. Among the juniors, who were divided into Tel Aviv and Jerusalem divisions, Associated Hebrew Schools' Thornhill team emerged as champions in the Tel Aviv division, defeating Bialik Hebrew Day School, while Leo Baeck north defeated USDS Bayview to win the Jerusalem division.

Co-convener Michelle Adler said the tournament marked the end of the Jewish Day School Hockey League's regular season, which began in January. League games were held early in the morning, before school, and helped determine seeding positions for the tournament.

The tournament has been growing each year as more schools have been able to ice teams, Adler said.

Participants this year included the Toronto Heschel School; Leo Baeck; USDS Bathurst; USDS Bayview; USDS Richmond Hill; Associated's Neptune branch; Associated's Thornhill branch; a team from Associated's middle school; and Bialik.

Israel ties France in World Cup qualifier

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RAMAT GAN — Israel and France played to a 1-1 draw last week, a result that disappointed Israeli coach Avraham Grant even though Israel is the only team to have scored against France, the 1998 World Cup champions, in World Cup qualifying Group 4.

David Trezeguet put France ahead with a header at the 50-minute mark, but turned from hero to villain for the visitors after being sent off minutes later by referee Markus Merk for a head butt on Tal Ben Haim. Walid Badir evened the score with an 83rd-minute header, as Israel's pressure on 10-man France finally paid off.

"I don't want to sound arrogant," said Grant, "but we deserved to win. In every parameter, we were better than the French. I wanted to win, and at the end, there was a real feeling that we missed an opportunity."

"Despite the fact that I scored, I am very disappointed because we were much better and we deserved to win," Badir said. "I have a dream to play in the World Cup and I am determined to make that dream come true."

The draw keeps France and Israel at the head of Group 4 with 10 points, followed by Switzerland and Ireland, both with nine points.

The match began in a sour atmosphere as the home fans booed the French national anthem. French keeper Fabien Barthez was the target of irate Israeli fans throughout the match, as they protested his pre-game comments that he did not want to play in Israel.

On the field itself, the teams shared possession but the match didn't really take off until after the interval, when Willy Sagnol sent a perfect ball from the left wing straight to Trezeguet, who was left unguarded and put the visitors ahead with a perfect header.

Five minutes later, fortunes turned dramatically when Trezeguet was red-carded for crudely head butting Tal Ben Haim, in reaction to an over-zealous challenge.

Israel failed to click on several good chances, but finally, in the 83rd minute, Adoram Kesei found space on the left side and sent a high cross that found Badir who headed cleanly into goal, sending the Israeli fans into raptures.

Depression an epidemic

20 something

By SANDIE BENITAH

When I was in high school, my friends and I would always count down the days and years until we reached a magical milestone age — 16 so that we could drive, 19 so we could hit the clubs and 20-anything so that our life could finally come together.

We all had a plan for our 20s, and figured out the ideal age to finish school, start our dream jobs, meet our dream husband or wife and the age we would start a family. Not once did we ever have a Plan B just in case there happened to be a glitch in one of those steps.

It turns out we should have.

Not one person and certainly not one John Hughes movie warned us that we would be facing a serious crisis when we reached this age. We all grew up thinking that being a teenager with zits and no date to the prom would be the worst thing to happen in our lives. In fact, as my friends and I are starting to figure out, being without direction in your 20s is far more traumatizing.

That's right… traumatizing.

Depression is a condition that transcends generations and age gaps, but judging from the number of people I know that have been clinically diagnosed recently, it seems to be an epidemic among my peers.

One of my girlfriends cried for hours one night over the phone, wondering how it was that she couldn't find the right job, despite her hard work and university degree.

"I did everything right, didn't I?" she asked.

Yes, we did everything right, I tell her, but nothing I say makes her feel better.

The themes of despair and confusion are always the same. Friends question the choices they've made for their career and then almost in the same breath, they question whether or not they'll ever be successful. But worst of all, some have confessed to me that they've even questioned whether or not this time in their life is one worth living through.

My friends have said it's hard seeing a way out of depression and it's easy to understand why.

While I'm sure that depression at any age is traumatic, it seems that being depressed while we're in our 20s is the worst that it can be. First of all, we're expected to be and expecting ourselves to be in our prime… but we're not. Second of all, we're expected to have the experience, rationality and maturity of our parents… but we don't. Last of all, we're expected to still have our youthful optimistic outlook on life… but for some of us, our optimism is as ragged as our old childhood security blanket.

Therefore, all we're left with is this feeling that we've failed not only our expectations but everybody else's as well.

Sigh.

When we're feeling this desperate about ourselves and our situation, it's hard to believe anybody could see us in a different light. If they do see us differently, then we must have pulled a fast one over them.

But the truth is, we should all – whether we're depressed or not – take a second to listen to those who might know us best to give us perspective on ourselves and maybe even our future.

Our parents apparently have never thought twice about us not making them proud and our bosses for some reason are still convinced we'll turn out to be the young prodigy they thought they hired. Even our friends have words of encouragement.

The only ones we seem to be disappointing are ourselves and while that's what hurts the very most, it's also a challenge that needs to be dealt with before we move on to the next phase in our lives.

Granted, it won't be an easy challenge to overcome and for once, I'm actually looking forward to hitting that milestone age of 30.

But at the very least, we should be giving ourselves the chance to get there.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My mother passed away in November 2003. She was the real matriarch of our family and it hit us all very hard.

Since her death, my two brothers and I have seen very little of each other. It seems we all have very busy lives, as well as our own families, and are not willing to make the time to see each other.

When my mother was alive we met at her place for every occasion – all the Jewish holidays and birthdays.

Now, with Passover around the corner, there is talk about not having a seder together. Neither of my brothers wants to make the effort to get together. The feeling of family is slowly fading with every month that passes. I'm afraid if we don't have our seder together, it will be the end of what was once a close family. What can I do to fix this before it's too late?

Family at Passover

Dear Family at Passover,

Your mother created something very special for all of you that will live in your hearts forever. With her passing, things changed. Of course it would be wonderful to keep the tradition of having seders together alive. However, now you all have your own families and some have chosen to have the seder either with their immediate families or possibly with others.

On one hand, it is sad that the chapter of togetherness with your mother is gone, but on the other hand, children are born and families continue to grow. It's the cycle of life.

If your brothers don't want to get together for the seder there is little you can do. Maybe for them it is too painful to have a seder without your mother, or maybe they were just doing it for her. It's hard to speculate. But you can still have a wonderful seder with your own family. Keep your mother's spirit alive. Tell stories, laugh, cry, cook her favourite foods and begin a new tradition for your own growing family. There is no doubt a seder together would be special. However, there will be many opportunities still to come when your families can and will get together.

Milt Harris: a Jewish warrior

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Life is a challenge. Of that there is no doubt. Some people hide from its rainbow of trials, afraid to be unmasked, instead relying on the leadership and activism of their neighbour. Then there are men like the late, great Milt Harris, individuals who charge into the "battle of right," manoeuvring with grace and guts, in his commitment to repair the world.

Milt was the real deal – a warrior, a renaissance man in a constant state of awe and forever honing his mental, spiritual and physical agility with tenacity of spirit. He passed away last month at age 77 after a short battle with cancer. When I heard about his death, I sensed a subtle shift in the world, the type that occurs when a great person departs this earth.

In Profiles in Courage, John F. Kennedy wrote this about politicians: "When that roll is called, he cannot hide, he cannot equivocate, he cannot delay… as he casts the vote that stakes his political future." This was Milt.

He was not a politician, but he boldly influenced many of them in his daring fight to bring Nazi war criminals to justice. Milt was not a lawyer, but he fought audaciously for justice on behalf of the Jewish community decades ago in his childhood home of London, Ont. He was not the archetypal right-of-centre Jewish leader when he chaired the Canadian Jewish Congress, but he gained admiration from his colleagues and created bonds with other communities through such unique missions as demanding redress for Japanese Canadians who were interned during World War II.

I cried when I heard Milt died, because he was a virtuous human being, gone forever, and because I missed him, for he had become one of my mentors. I wondered where I would find another man who was an officer of the Order of Canada; who took up piano in his mid-60s and was able to master baroque music; who supported his friend Jane Goodall, the world's leading primatologist in her bid to learn about and protect apes; who cared about our indigenous people and established educational scholarships for native youth, quietly donating substantial funds to Na Me Res (Native Men's Residence) to help build a youth shelter and big-heartedly supporting Ve'ahavta's homeless program.

I cried when I heard Milt passed away, because I questioned whether I would ever meet another human being who overcame a thorny childhood so well; who was was a track star and boxer though he stood only 5-5; who built one of the most successful steel companies in North America, but forever extended vast amounts of love, wisdom and mentorship to his family, friends and colleagues.

Milt, men like you are hard to find. They are because you modestly and unassumingly set the standard for greatness. Now that you are gone, a shrill silence has overtaken us. Our frontline of valour and guts has been weakened because we have lost a dazzling fighter.

Your wife, children and entire family should find peace in the knowledge that they were blessed to have had a great and righteous man among them. Thank you for showing the Jewish community and the people of Canada the true meaning of bravery, kindness and decency.

So long, Milt. You are missed already. Where will we find a man like you again?

"Milton was a consummate Jewish philanthropist with a twist; he knew how to give but also knew how to act. Rare is such an individual who can straddle both camps with such grace and ease. Rare is the person who is respected both as a man of charity and a man of action. That was our beloved friend Milton Harris." – Ed Morgan, president, Canadian Jewish Congress

Israel, Canada firm up industrial ties

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Israel and Ontario have ventured into new economic territory with last week's signing of an agreement committing the two governments to work together in a number of industrial, technological and scientific areas.

It was all smiles between Premier Dalton McGuinty and Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert after they inked the Ontario-Israel Memorandum of Understanding at a Queen's Park signing ceremony attended by provincial politicians, Israeli diplomats and Jewish community representatives.

Separate memorandum of understanding signed at Queen's Park

Hailed as the first such research and development agreement between Ontario and a foreign government in years, the deal targets at least 12 Ontario-Israel collaborative projects over three years.

Priorities include drug development, information and communication technology, and life sciences. Officials say that it could potentially be worth millions of dollars for both Israel and Ontario.

"Ontario and Israel both have strong economies," McGuinty said in a statement. "By signing this agreement, we are taking another step toward strengthening our partnership, our people and our prosperity."

After the formal exchange of documents and signatures, Olmert, who is also Israel's minister of industry, trade and labour, presented McGuinty with a gift and joked with photographers, "Do you want us to hug?"

The Toronto stop was part of a two-day whirlwind trip to Canada by Olmert to renew the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF), established in 1994 to promote collaborative R&D between firms in both countries.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Killers to be Freed

TORONTO — The two men convicted of beating 15-year-old Matti Baranovski to death in November 1999 will likely be released from jail later this month. Meir Mariani and William Cochrane, both now 20, will have served two-thirds of their 10-year sentences and will be eligible for statutory release. Under Canadian law, four years they served prior to conviction is counted double (eight years). Both men were turned down for parole last August when the provincial parole board found they were at risk of re-offending and had disciplinary problems in jail.

Saul Bellow Dies

TORONTO — Canadian-born Saul Bellow, the Nobel Prize-winning author, died last week at 89. Bellow brought the American Jewish experience to a wider North American audience. His best-know works include such novels as Herzog, Mr. Sammler's Planet and The Adventures of Augie March. When he received the Nobel in 1976, he was cited for the "human understanding and subtle analysis of contemporary culture that are combined in his work." Bellow, who was born in Lachine, Que., also wrote a non-fiction work, To Jerusalem and Back, about his trip to Israel in 1975.

WORLD

Anti-Semitic Acts Up

NEW YORK — Anti-Semitic incidents in the United States reached their highest levels in nine years in 2004, the Anti-Defamation League said. The ADL's annual Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents, released last week, showed 1,821 incidents in 2004, up from 1,557 in 2003. More neo-Nazi activity and harassment reports from schools led to the rise. The data comes from crime statistics and ADL regional reports.

C-Span Nixes Irving

WASHINGTON — C-SPAN cancelled plans last week to air a lecture by Holocaust denier David Irving. It had planned to air the talk to "balance" one by historian Deborah Lipstadt, but she refused to let cameras tape one of her lectures at Harvard University. Instead, C-SPAN aired a show with a reporter who covered a 2000 trial in which Irving lost a libel suit against Lipstadt and her publisher after she called him a Holocaust denier. Some 500 scholars protested the plan to pair her and Irving. On the show, a C-SPAN executive said it was wrong to use "balance" to describe the original intent.

Supremacist Jailed

CHICAGO — Mathew Hale, a white supremacist convicted of soliciting an FBI informant to kill Judge Joan Lefkow, was sentenced to 40 years in jail. Hale was charged with soliciting her murder because she ordered him to stop using the name World Church of the Creator, a trademark of an unrelated group. Lefkow is not Jewish, but in an e-mail to followers about the name case, Hale called her the "judge with the Jew surname." Her mother and husband were later killed by a man unconnected to Hale.

Neo-Nazi Prof Fired

TEANECK, N.J. — A professor at New Jersey's Fairleigh Dickinson University with links to a Nazi group was fired. The school dismissed Jacques Pluss, 51, for missing too many classes, but Pluss said he was fired for his political beliefs and activities. Pluss, a history lecturer, admits he is a member of the National Socialist Movement, and he hosts a webcast titled White Viewpoint.

Missionaries Cut Off

PHILADELPHIA — Presbyterian leaders have cut off funding to a missionary church aimed at converting Jews. Late last month, officials with the Presbyterian Church (USA) voted to stop funding Congregation Avodat Yisrael near Philadelphia, the Philadelphia Inquirer reported. The vote came after a church report questioned the congregation's methods and effectiveness.

'I Am Anti-Zionism,' Columbia Prof Says

NEW YORK — Several members of Columbia University's faculty spoke out against Israeli policies and Zionism in an address to several hundred students and other members of the university community at a campus event last Monday.

The event, billed as supporting academic freedom, came after a faculty committee issued a report the previous week on charges professors had bullied pro-Israel students and found only one such charge credible.

"If some Columbia faculty are going to be stigmatized for being anti-Zionism, then let me be among them," said Noha Radwan, an assistant professor in the Middle East & Asian Languages & Cultures (MEALAC) department. "I am anti-Zionism."

The report found that Joseph Massad, also a MEALAC professor, had "exceeded commonly accepted bounds" when responding to a pro-Israel student's question. Massad's "defence is the front line of academic freedom today," film professor Lewis Cole said. At the meeting, Massad said the committee that issued the report is illegitimate.

Addressing the 'crisis in Jewish education'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Michael Steinhardt admits to some discomfort when people tell him that Birthright Israel – the free, 10-day trip to Israel for 18- to 26-year-olds – makes it cool to be Jewish.

The New York-based philanthropist and Birthright Israel founder told a small group of Birthright alumni earlier this month that it's "unfortunate to have to rely on these 10 days to do the job that should be done in all sorts of other areas – day schools, preschools, general education."

He met with the group at Hillel of Greater Toronto's Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life on April 1, and later appeared at United Israel Appeal Federation Canada's National Young Leadership Conference to deliver the keynote address and meet with more Birthright alumni.

There's a crisis in Jewish education in the non-Orthodox world, Steinhardt told The CJN in an interview at a downtown hotel. "How can you say otherwise?" he asked rhetorically. "Outside of day schools, the quality of Jewish education is nothing less than appalling."

Maybe if it were better – instead of "crummy," as he referred to it – Birthright wouldn't have such an impact, but there would be "deeper, better educated Jews," he said.

Steinhardt had no kind words for the Hebrew afternoon schools he has seen, which he said have created the "dumbed-down American non-Orthodox Jew [who] is disappearing from Judaism, intermarrying with abandon and forgetting about his Jewishness with hardly a second thought."

Michael Steinhardt

Speaking to the Birthright alumni, he expressed his concern about changing Jewish demographics. "Jews don't reproduce themselves," he said. "If I knew you better… I would urge you to have considerably more children per family."

Jewish philanthropists should think about the Jewish future, he said. In fact, the day Steinhardt spoke, Brandeis University announced his $120 million (US) gift for the establishment of the Steinhardt Social Research Institute, which will analyze data to help the Jewish community better plan for its future, according to a news release.

"I think our overwhelming focus should be on our children and therefore on the education of our children," Steinhardt told The CJN.

Are day schools the answer? Steinhardt said he doesn't know. It seems to him that day schools are "unlikely to ever attract the majority of non-Orthodox Jews, and that's a great conundrum. I'm not interested in a small elite being educated in day schools, and the rest of the non-Orthodox population being allowed to be painfully undereducated."

He believes the Jewish community hasn't been "experimental enough" with day schools. "I think that the single institution that is most needed in the Jewish world is the day school at the same level of religiosity as the average non-Orthodox Jew, meaning a day school far less religiously demanding," but one that emphasizes the highest academic standards and a more secular teaching of the Bible.

He wants the Jewish community to have "better day schools, with better teachers and a more vigorous program, and insistence upon more involvement of the family."

"I keep going back to what can we do at an earlier age that will allow other elements in our arsenal to work before Birthright."

One of his projects is a new Jewish preschool program, expected to start in 12 North American cities in September. Steinhardt hopes it will be "so good, so exciting, so resonant, that it will involve families of preschool kids in ways they're not presently involved and that will engage them in Jewish learning at that age [in such a way] that a substantially larger number will want to go to day school."

To make a difference...

From the editor's desk

He sat in the four-person viola section of the energetically performing Koffler Chamber Music Society, posture erect, his head and shoulders moving slightly with the flow of the music and the precisioned pulling of his bow.

And when the audience applauded and "bravo-ed" its enthusiastic approval of the sensually melodic Serenade 1 in E by Antonin Dvorak, the violist and most of his fellow musicians smiled widely. The violist was Alan Pollard.

Born in London, England, he graduated from the Middlesex Hospital Medical School in 1954 and settled into a successful career in laboratory medicine in London.

Twenty-three years after his graduation, in 1967, Pollard and his family moved to Toronto, where he applied his science, his skill and his dedication in biochemical medicine at the Mount Sinai Hospital.

He said to The CJN, "I was very impressed with the attitude of the people at Mount Sinai. Here, I felt, I could come and make a difference."

And he did. And he continues to – in medicine and in music. For along with his training as a physician, Pollard also brought to Toronto his considerable talents as a musician.

It was the heartfelt performance of the Koffler Chamber Music Society in its inaugural concert in February at the Leah Posluns Theatre in Toronto that brought me to Pollard's mid-Toronto home last month for tea, biscuits, almonds and an interview. I wanted to learn more about the music group and Pollard was to be my mentor.

It was at his home that I learned about him as well.

Music seems to course through Pollard's veins in equal measure to the red and white blood cells he has spent a professional lifetime studying. First the piano, then the violin and finally, at age 15, he picked up the viola.

Pollard was a musician before he was a doctor. As a teenager, he played with the National Youth Orchestra in London. As a student at the University of Cambridge, he played his viola at Britain's famous Music Camp, which was started by Bernard Robinson, a physician and a keen amateur musician.

The Music Camp was a unique and highly formative musical experience for Pollard. He was exposed to a wide range of music and musicians of the highest standard. People who loved music, indeed "were obsessed by it," as Pollard explained, came together, at first in a farmer's field and barn to make their harmonies. They lived in tents, tended to the chores of the farm by day and made music through the night. Attendance was by invitation only and Pollard was among the few who were invited.

Drawing of Alan Pollard by Mary-Lou Peyzant

The Music Camp exists to this day, but has evolved from the early rustic, egalitarian setting to a more formalized structure.

Pollard was a regular attendee at that special camp until he said goodbye to England in 1967, but he "forged friendships there from all over the country," he said. From the near-reverential way he recalled his experiences at the camp, it was apparent that they helped to imprint music even deeper into his soul.

Pollard is representative of the members of the Koffler Chamber Music Society. Music is their calling, but it is not necessarily their professional vocation.

For example, one of the cellists, Jennifer Brunton, is a resident in anaesthesiology; another, Anita Zafrani, is an occupational therapist. John Soloninka, one of the violinists, is an engineer. Charles Small, one of the four violists along with Pollard, is a retired mathematics professor.

The 21 musicians are a widely diverse group, each of whom was auditioned and approved by Jacques Israelievitch, the celebrated concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. He is the chamber group's maestro and shares his talent, experience and insight with the musicians.

They rehearse together once a week for 2½ hours. And of course, there is a great deal of private practice as well. The musicians work hard. But it seems not to bother them. As Pollard said, "one has to put in a lot of time to be able to play one note beautifully and to do so gives a great deal of satisfaction."

Israelievitch is especially adept, Pollard points out. His gentility, sense of humour and tact help to evoke those beautifully played notes from the disparate group of string quartet players.

"He [Israelievitch] knows exactly what he wants and how to get it. Most importantly however, he treats people kindly. He never makes you feel small."

The Koffler Chamber Music Society performs its next concert on May 2 at the Leah Posluns Theatre. The program will include works by Tchaikovsky, Mendelssohn, Gershwin and Copland.

With that lineup of composers, musicians and conductor, the audience is bound to hear a great many beautifully played notes that night.

Jews, Christians raise funds for Israeli rehab centre

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

During the Yom Kippur War, Israeli soldier Eran Almog lay bleeding and wounded in the field for seven days before fellow soldiers evacuated him. His injuries proved to be fatal.

When Eran's brother, Maj.-Gen. Doron Almog, learned of this tragedy, he made a solemn vow.

"I swore that I would... never leave a wounded [soldier] behind," he said.

"That's what I've done in 35 years of service."

Almog has carried this philosophy into his personal life, never leaving behind his autistic son, Eran, nor hundreds of other children who benefit from the services of Aleh – which means "raise up" – an association that builds care-giving centres in Israel for children of all faiths with mental and physical disabilities.

Last week, Almog spoke before more than 500 people who had gathered at the Canada Christian College to help raise funds for the construction of Aleh Negev, a new, 25-acre rehabilitative village for young adults with special needs.

"Tonight is a parade of the strongest for the weakest," Almog said passionately.

"We don't see the weakest every day. They are gathered in centres like Aleh, centres that give hope, centres that create a lot of love. This is an imperative mission to help them."

Aleh Negev is a $42-million project. In addition to providing medical care, therapeutic services, rehabilitative aid and special education to thousands of patients, the village will offer green open spaces, a petting zoo and a hotel for guests and family members.

The endeavour is also expected to create some 500 jobs for residents of Ofakim and nearby communities.

The Israeli government has committed to funding 50 per cent of the cost, with the remainder coming from donations.

Moshe Schapiro, director of development for Aleh Rehabilitation of Canada, said $13 million has been raised so far.

"We're only starting to get our feet wet in Canada," he said.

Charles McVety, president of Canada Christian College, said the local fundraising goal is $1 million.

"This is part of our, 'Israel you're not alone campaign,'" McVety told the audience, noting he visited an Aleh centre in Jerusalem in 2003 while on a trip to Israel with 20 fellow Christian leaders.

"Israel has given me and every other Christian what we have. We owe everything we have to you."

Christian collaboration in the Aleh project, and support for Israel in general, was lauded by Israel's Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in his keynote speech to the gathering.

"The Christian community in Canada has been very friendly to Israel," said Olmert, who was in Canada to meet government officials about trade issues.

"This exceptional involvement [in Aleh]... is outside [the realm] of political issues and cares for the human needs of people."

There are three Aleh centres in Israel – in Jerusalem, Bnei Barak and Gederah.

Many of the children in the centres were born with congenital diseases or sustained brain damage later in life.

Almog's son, named after his uncle who died in the Yom Kippur War, is now 21, wears a diaper, eats only baby food and cannot speak.

These challenges have had a tremendous impact on the general, who was the first Israeli soldier on the ground and the last to leave in the famous Entebbe rescue operation of 1976 that saved more than 100 lives.

"He's the most influential person in my life," Almog said of his son. "He has made me learn to be more sensitive to people."

Almog said involvement with Aleh is his "life project."

"Every morning when I wake up, I feel strong enough to do something for the weakest," he said.

"They are unable to fight, unable to protest and unable to lobby... They are shouting with their silence."

For more information on Aleh, visit www.aleh.org.

Local union threatens to strike El Al airlines

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Employees of the Canadian operations of El Al airlines have voted in favour of a strike if they do not receive paid days off for the High Holy Days and greater time between shifts.

El Al management responded by promising the airline will continue to fly in the event of a strike, with management filling in for the 12 workers who have given their union, the United Steelworkers of America, a strike mandate.

Despite the tough talk, negotiations were scheduled to continue to resolve the outstanding issues. Workers have been without a collective agreement since December 2003 and talks have been productive to date, with most issues settled, including wages and benefits, say spokespeople for both sides.

Dave Neale, president of Steelworkers local 1976, said the "major" issue for the workers was being paid when Yom Kippur or Rosh Hashanah fall on a weekend, as was the case under the previous collective agreement. The two Jewish holy days should be considered on par with Christmas, Boxing Day and Good Friday and be paid days for all workers, Jewish or not, he said.

Neale also raised concerns over scheduling, saying El Al was scheduling shifts only five hours after the end of the previous one. "The turnaround time is short," he said.

But Stanley Morais, general manager of El Al's Canadian operations, said the airline has already made many concessions to the union, which represents ticket agents at the airline's downtown office and personnel at Pearson International Airport.

The carrier has agreed to raise wages by 75 per cent of the cost of living in the first year of a contract and 100 in the second year. Most other airlines are asking for wage rollbacks from their employees, given the dire economic circumstances facing the airline industry, Morais said.

What's more, the High Holy Days are not Canadian statutory holidays and even in Israel, employees are not paid for High Holy Days that fall on a weekend, he said.

"No one will lose salary if we're closed during the week, but they want to get paid if it falls on a weekend," Morais said.

Turning to the shift-scheduling issue, he said aircraft arrivals and departures require personnel to be on hand at the airport within the 10-hour span being requested by the union. By demanding greater time between shifts, "the union is trying to determine how El Al runs its schedule," Morais said.

He noted the workers were also asking the airline to pick up the provincial employee health premium.

For the workers, "these outstanding issues are basic ones of fairness, equality and health and safety," Neale stated. "It is particularly galling that El Al would demand concessions in light of a profit picture that is the best showing the company has had in five years."

Neale said the publicly traded company reported a profit of $33.1 million (US) in 2004, an increase of 421 per cent over the previous year.

Morais said the increased profit resulted from cost-cutting measures implemented by the airline. But the Toronto-Tel Aviv route is not a money-maker and senior managers in Israel are constantly reviewing whether to retain the route, he said.

In other developments, Morais said El Al joined other international carriers to lobby the parliamentary standing committee on transportation to eliminate Crown rents charged to the Greater Toronto Airports Authority (GTAA), the organization that runs Pearson airport. The GTAA pays about $145 million per year in rent to the federal government, amounting to 20 per cent of its expenses. Those costs are passed on to airlines in the form of landing fees, which make Toronto one of the most costly airports in the world, he said.

Morais, who serves as chair of the Association of Airline Representatives in Canada, said it costs El Al $5,308 in landing fees for one of its Boeing 767 aircraft at Pearson, compared to $1,050 in Los Angeles and $1,760 in Israel (all figures Canadian).

Meanwhile, travel to Israel continues to pick up. The airline added a sixth weekly flight on April 1 and will offer nine weekly flights for the summer high season.

Nevertheless, the Toronto route loses money for El Al because of high operating expenses, "among the highest in the world," 18 per cent higher than in 2004, Morais said.

He said he is constantly urging head office to retain the route as a service for the Jewish community.

Tragically, the same sad script

These words were written after Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon arrived in the United States on Sunday, but before his visit with President George W. Bush at the president's ranch in Crawford, Texas. The prime minister's send-off in Israel for his visit, however, was more than the expression of good wishes from his cabinet colleagues. It included also, alas, a return to the predictable mischief – duplicitous and murderous – that characterized the heyday of Yasser Arafat's control over the Palestinian Authority.

Between Saturday and Sunday, Palestinians launched some 80 mortars and Qassam rockets into the Gush Katif area of Gaza. No one was injured. An additional 30 mortar shells were fired at the Jewish community, but landed in Palestinian territory.

The shelling was said to be in retaliation for the killing of three Palestinian youths by Israeli troops near the Egyptian-Gaza border.The youths were part of a group of five who had been recruited, according to some Israeli sources, by Mussa Arafat, the head of Palestinian military intelligence in Gaza and of the Popular Resistance Committee there, to smuggle arms into Gaza. Each of the lads was apparently paid 1,500 shekels by Arafat and his confederates. Knowing he was likely sending the youths to their deaths, Arafat bought them very cheaply.

The recruiting and killing of the young Palestinian smugglers followed the news that Egypt had arrested a Palestinian some time earlier who admitted under questioning that he had smuggled Russian-made, Strela surface-to-air missiles into Gaza through Sinai. The nature of the weaponry the Palestinian attempted to bring into Gaza was chilling, but equally chilling was the organization to which he belonged: the Fatah Hawks, which nominally, at least, fall under the authority and control of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz spoke with Abbas on Sunday and asked him to deploy forces in the Gaza Strip to prevent further shelling. "If you do not act quickly, the understandings reached in Sharm El-Sheikh are liable to collapse," Mofaz told Abbas. The conversation was described as difficult.

There is no doubt that the attempted weapons smuggling, the response it was intended to – and did – evoke from Israel, as well as the missile barrage against the Jews, were all designed to undermine the still very tenuous peace process on the eve of the Sharon-Bush visit.

The American administration last week called upon Israel to hew closely to the terms of the "road map" peace plan. Washington reacted very quickly and forcefully to Israel's announced intention to build more housing between Jerusalem and Ma'aleh Adumim. But where is Washington's pique at the continued – and publicly declared – refusal by Abbas and the PA to disarm and dismantle the terrorist groups?

The very first obligation of the road map is precisely the one that Abbas refuses to fulfil. It is a very ill omen for the future, especially as the planned withdrawal of Jews from Gaza approaches and the tensions in Israeli society increase.

Schools' Israel Bonds program (1)

We believe the parent interviewed in the article "Balancing the bar with the mitzvah" (CJN, March 24) has misunderstood the Israel Savings Bonds program that has been embraced by parents at many Jewish day schools for gifts between classmates attending one another's bar/bat mitzvahs.

Israel Bonds are a real and valuable gift, as are cheques, cash and jewelry. It is not a tzedakah program, nor is it intended to be imposed on parents. The program binds the children to important Jewish values, demonstrates a commitment to the community and reinforces a love for Israel. In our frantic, materialistic, upwardly mobile society, it is an opportunity to participate in a gift-giving program that has an inherent value that is greater than a 12- or 13-year-old's penchant for the latest fad. Unfortunately, an excessive focus on gifts has increasingly been part of the values associated with bar/bat mitzvahs for too long.

What we found disappointing in the article was that it focused the inquiry on one parent who chose not to participate in the program. It should have "balanced the scale" by giving voice to the overwhelming majority of families who see the Israel Bonds program as helping to elevate the meaning of the simchah by inserting a real connection to the State of Israel. Given that the average participation is more than 85 per cent in the eight Jewish schools where parents have implemented some form of Israel Bonds program, parents are resoundingly endorsing the program.

Our daughter is in the bar/bat mitzvah year at the Toronto Heschel School. The school's B'nei Mitzvah Gift Program grew from a desire by the parents to ensure that a gift would be meaningful and minimize the chore of having to buy a gift for each bar/bat mitzvah. Reflecting the core values of the group, the children in the grade receive the same gift, including those whose families do not participate in the program. The amount each family contributes is voluntary and kept confidential.

Becoming a bar/bat mitzvah signals the Jewish child's entry into the adult community. While it is an occasion to be celebrated, perhaps it is time for us to recognize and reinforce that the real lesson of becoming bar/bat mitzvah is much deeper than opening gifts on the day after the simchah.

Schools' Israel Bonds program (2)

Having just finished celebrating my daughter's bat mitzvah and being in the midst of near-weekly bar and bat mitzvah celebrations for family and friends, I read with interest the article on school-organized gift-giving ("Balancing the bar with the mitzvah") and read Larry Wallach's letter (March 31) on the same subject.

I wholeheartedly agree with Wallach that Israel Bonds are a wonderful gift for any simchah, especially bar and bat mitzvahs, where the focus should rightly include a connection to Eretz Yisrael.

Notwithstanding my shared affinity with Wallach for Israel Bonds, I cannot see how he can argue that Ellen Hennick's "comments make it clear she does not view receiving an Israel bond as a gift." I have read and re-read the original article and do not see this as Hennick's point. Her beef appears to be with a school-mandated program taking away the individual's freedom of choice when it comes to gift giving.

Beth Emeth's assistant rabbi

Your article about Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda's 50-year jubilee ("Beth Emeth celebrates its 50-year jubilee," CJN, April 7) reflected well the spirit and enthusiasm with which our congregants, lay leadership, clergy team and professional staff have embraced this important and meaningful milestone.

In giving credit to our current clergy team for attracting young members to our synagogue, one very important person's name was omitted. Our assistant rabbi, David Bauman, who joined our clergy staff in 2003, has also been a vital factor in our renewed dynamism. Rabbi Bauman's efforts have enriched the participation of Beth Emeth's younger members to a significant degree. We are very proud of our entire clergy team for their individual and collective efforts in helping to make Beth Emeth what it is today.

The article "Jewish Renewal event planned for Oshawa" (CJN, March 31) might give the impression that the Beth Zion Congregation is affiliated with the Jewish Renewal movement or that the event is synagogue-sponsored. This is not the case.

Einstein's intellect was matched by his humanity

Fifty years ago on April 18, the 26th day of Nisan in the Jewish calendar, Albert Einstein died. His thought so profoundly affected our modern way of life that this year, 2005, has been designated as the international year of physics in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of his revolutionary discoveries and writings on quantum theory.

To mark Einstein's yahrzeit, we are pleased to republish this tribute essay by Eli Honig, which appeared in The CJN on Oct. 12, 1995, recalling the life and work of Albert Einstein.

By ELI HONIG

"The most incomprehensible thing about the world is that it is comprehensible."
Albert Einstein

Physicist and philosopher, pacifist and outspoken anti-fascist, Zionist and anti-nationalist, citizen of the world and lonely man of science, Albert Einstein was one of the most profound and influential thinkers of the last few centuries, if not of all time.

Born in 1879 in Ulm, Germany, to assimilated Jewish parents, Einstein's early years were unremarkable. He attended a Catholic elementary school for its sound education and because the more distant Jewish school was charging high fees. At age 10, he transferred to the Luitpold Gymnasium, where the Prussian rigidity moulded his lifelong distaste for authority and Germany.

He eventually moved to Switzerland, where at 16, he renounced his German citizenship and attended the Zurich Polytechnic. After his graduation, he spent some time as a private tutor and then obtained a position at the Swiss patent office, a position which presented him with technical problems that honed his analytical mind and allowed him time to think about other matters as well.

In 1905, while he was still at the patent office, the unknown Einstein published five papers. Three of them were to make indelible marks in different fields of physics and were worthy of separate Nobel prizes. They caught the eyes of some of the leading physicists, and starting in 1909, Einstein assumed various academic posts. In 1914, a few months before the start of World War I, he returned to Germany as a professor in the Prussian Academy of Science and as director of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute of Physics.

In the midst of the fierce nationalism of this period, when most of his scientific colleagues were involved in the war effort, he signed the Manifesto to Europeans, which pleaded for European unity and an end to the conflict. There were only three other signatories.

After the war, Einstein became active in the pacifist cause. Referring to warfare, he once remarked that he "would rather be hacked to pieces than take part in such an abominable business." His views however, were tempered when he clearly saw the need to oppose Nazism. Likewise, as a Zionist he reluctantly but firmly supported the active resistance of Jews against Arab attacks.

In 1919, British astronomer and physicist Arthur Eddington led an expedition to Africa to verify Einstein's prediction of the bending of light under the influence of gravity. His confirmation of this prediction corroborated Einstein's theory of general relativity, which in turn caught the imagination of the press. The reaction was nothing short of sensational. Einstein became a worldwide celebrity, his name a household item, and his opinions were sought by royalty and commoner alike. His life was never the same after that and he once noted wryly: "To punish me for my contempt for authority, fate made me an authority, as well."

In 1929, with the political storm clouds visible, especially to Einstein who, as a celebrated Jew, was the target of virulent attacks, he noted: "When I came to Germany some 15 years ago, I discovered for the first time that I was a Jew. I owed this discovery more to gentiles than to Jews."

In 1933, he left Germany, renounced his German citizenship for the second time and took up residence at the Institute for Advanced Studies in Princeton, N.J., where he remained until his death in 1955.

The advent of Hitler's brand of anti-Semitism, which culminated in the destruction of European Jewry, affected him so deeply that he refused to have anything to do with Germany after the war. "Because of the mass murder which the Germans inflicted upon the Jewish people, it is evident that a self-respecting Jew could not possible wish to be associated in any way with any official German institution."

Two men, Chaim Weizmann and Kurt Blumenfeld, had a profound influence on Einstein's adoption of Zionism. They recognized early on the benefit that Einstein's name and fame would bring to the cause. Einstein was particularly taken with the challenge of building from scratch the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. To this end, in 1921, he travelled with Weizmann on a fundraising mission to America and in 1923, he went to Mount Scopus in Jerusalem, where he delivered the inaugural address from "the lectern that had waited for him for 2,000 years."

Einstein's inner conflict over the appeal of Zionism and his aversion to nationalism are clear from an address he gave in 1938. "I would much rather see reasonable agreement with the Arabs on the basis of living together in peace than the creation of a Jewish state."

Despite his misgivings, Einstein recognized the need for Jews to defend themselves against attacks and he heralded the establishment of the State of Israel. Just before his death, he told Reuven Dafni, an Israeli consul in the United States, that he "saw the rebirth of Israel as one of the few political acts in his lifetime which had an essential moral quality."

In 1952, upon the death of Israel's first president Chaim Weizmann, Einstein was offered the presidency. But he declined.

Isaiah Berlin, one of the greatest philosophers of this century, remarked eloquently: "That Einstein, who tolerated no deviation from human decency, above all on the part of his own people – that he believed in this [Zionist] movement and this state [Israel] and stood by it through thick and thin to the end of his life, however critical he was at times of particular men and policies – this fact is perhaps among the highest moral testimonials on which any state or any movement in this century can pride itself."

Berlin also pointed out that it was Einstein's recognized genius in mathematical physics that gave credence to his utterances in other fields. In fact, his outstanding accomplishments in physics did not in and of themselves earn him the right to be an authority in other areas. However, coupled with his awe inspiring intellect, his deep humility and his concern for mankind, they earned for him the right and perhaps even the obligation to be heard whenever he stated his convictions or ventured an opinion. The depth of his insight was matched by a brutal honesty that speaks directly to us, and occasionally, discomfits us. As an example, consider his pithy comment: "Common sense is that layer of prejudice laid down in the mind prior to the age of 18."

Einstein appealed for the transmission of human values in schools. He recognized the importance of studying the classics as well as the natural sciences and he insisted on the development of critical independent thinking in young people. On the other hand, he looked at competition in education with a jaundiced eye.

To those who would make a religion of science and to those who would ignore it altogether he wrote, "Science without religion is lame, religion without science is blind." He also captured the essence of how things should be conveyed without oversimplification, with his observation that "Everything should be made as simple as possible, but not simpler."

Einstein's contribution to physics cannot be overlooked. Like Newton in his day, he forged entirely new fields and new ways of looking at the physical world. His special theory of relativity of 1905 followed by his general theory in 1916 undermined the underpinnings of physics established by Isaac Newton two centuries earlier. He played havoc with Newton's, and for that matter, everyone else's conception of space and time. Henceforth, space and time could not be considered absolute. Though his novel ideas were understood and appreciated by leading physicists, there were many people in the scientific and non-scientific communities who were both confused and disturbed by them.

It is ironic that there were so many others who, with no idea of what the theory meant, distorted it unwittingly or wittingly to imply that there are no absolutes. James Neman notes in Science and Sensibility: "One of the cliches about Einstein's theory is that it shows that everything is relative. The statement that everything is relative is as meaningful as the statement that everything is bigger. As Russell pointed out, if everything were relative, there would be nothing for it to be relative to."

Einstein also made fundamental contributions to quantum theory, the branch of physics that deals with the behaviour of matter and energy at the atomic and subatomic levels. The first of these contributions was his 1905 explanation of a puzzling experimental result (photoelectric effect), for which he won the 1921 Nobel prize in physics. Ironically, he was greatly disturbed by some of the implications of this theory, though he was a major player in its development. One of its consequences in particular upset him: At the atomic level, physical events are governed by chance. He protested emphatically that "God does not throw dice."

It is also ironic that in his almost desperate attempt to find internal contradictions and holes in the theory, he ended up strengthening it. In the latter half of his life, he tried but ultimately failed to combine two fields of physics – gravitation and electromagnetism. His lonely quest outside the mainstream of the physics community, however, did not diminish the reverence with which he was held both within and without that community.

Some small insight into Einstein's mind can perhaps be gained by first going back to 1827 when the Scottish botanist Robert Brown was looking through his microscope at grains of pollen suspended in water. He noticed that they were undergoing erratic, jerky motion. This phenomenon, now known as Brownian motion, is often cited as a crowning experimental glory of the kinetic theory of gases, which postulates the random motion of tiny particles called molecules. In fact, Brownian motion turned into an embarrassment to 19th-century physicists when they realized that the particles that Brown and they had seen were far too large to be the molecules predicted by theory.

This state of affairs continued until 1905 when Einstein, who was not aware of this effect, was looking for a way of showing the reality of atoms and molecules. It seems that some very influential scientists of his day (including E. Mach and W. Ostwald) contended that atoms as well as molecules were fictitious entities that were useful only because they helped "explain" various observations. Since no one had ever seen atoms or molecules. Einstein suggested an indirect method of verifying their existence. He posited that a large particle suspended in a fluid should be buffeted by myriads of molecular collisions, none of which is significant in itself. In particular he hypothesized that while the molecular motion is random, at any instant of time there might be more collisions in some direction than another. This in turn would cause the particle to move in that direction. The net effect would be a random, observable motion of the suspended particle.

It is a measure of Einstein's genius that he was able to hypothesize Brownian motion without having heard of it, and that he was able to successfully analyze it and to suggest experiments, when all along the solution to this "known" problem eluded some of the best physics minds of the 19th century. Interestingly enough, the experimental work that Einstein had suggested was carried out by Jean Perrin in 1909 and formed the basis for Perrin's winning the 1926 Nobel prize.

When Isaac Newton unlocked nature's secrets, the English poet Alexander Pope, immortalized him with the couplet: "Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night./ God said 'Let Newton be!' and all was light."

Some 200 years later, Sir John Squire penned half in jest, half in truth:

"It did not last; the devil howling 'Ho,/ Let Einstein be!' restored the status quo."

Eli Honig is a physicist who teaches at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and at the University of Toronto.

Opinions

An unconscionable silence

Upon returning from a recent conference, colleagues asked if I enjoyed myself. No! I was challenged and alarmed, but there could be no enjoyment. One cannot use that word when talking about domestic violence.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Organized by Jewish Women International, this was the second International Conference on Domestic Violence in the Jewish Community. Yes, we have it, too. More than 500 people attended 80 workshops. Like a growing cancer, domestic violence attacks all parts of our community. We can no longer say "Jewish men don't do that" or "It doesn't happen to smart Jewish women!" And "Oy vey" is not a sufficient response.

Last year, we heard from a medical doctor who had been abused for many years. This year, a lawyer spoke of her own experience with abuse and her inability to escape. Another pioneer in the world of Jewish abuse spoke of her abusive upbringing that led her to repeat the same behaviour with her own children. All the women moved us to tears, destroying stereotypes as they warned us of our communities' inability to hear and deal with their cases. It took such courage. One wants to respond with similar courage while at the same time avoid facing their reality.

Regrettably, we are the same as all other nations and communities when it comes to the incidence of domestic violence. But there is one unique form of Jewish domestic violence. Jewish divorce processes today have created an arena we call "get abuse," an unequal power base that enables extortion and revenge. Our system of divorce makes us unique, but it is nothing to be proud of.

How can this be?

Maimonides warned of the terrible evil of domestic violence. He noted that it is worse than any form of oppression, for it occurs at home, in the place one has an expectation of protection and safety. Some rabbis refuse to talk about it in synagogues. That must change.

We met right before Purim, and many speakers noted links with Purim – with Esther's bravery and with Mordechai's warning not to be silent. Perhaps next year, we should declare the pre-Purim Sabbath of Parshat Zachhor (which means "remember") to be our Jewish domestic violence day. On that Shabbat, we are commanded to remember Amalek, an evil nation guilty of attacking us in the rear. They attacked in the exact spot where a travelling community places its most vulnerable, with expectations of safety. Similarly, an abuser uses the expectation of safety to attack the most vulnerable. It is unconscionable. And our silence as a community is similarly unacceptable.

Thankfully, the National Council of Jewish Women established a kosher shelter in Montreal, and JWI runs temporary housing across Canada. But we need more. Talk about it. Listen better. Do something!

Let these people go

The rabbis considered captivity to be a punishment worse than starvation or death. The duty to ransom Jewish captives was placed on communities above feeding or clothing the poor. Any communal treasury, including money collected for building a synagogue, could be used to free a captive.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

In ancient as well as medieval times, Jews were captured and held for ransom by Christians as well as Muslims. Jews were sold as slaves by the Romans, and later taken by pirates, as happened to many Jews fleeing the expulsion from Spain. In 17th century Poland, the Chmielnicki hordes kidnapped thousands of (mostly) girls and women and took them into Tartar country, the so-called "Tartar brides."

In modern times we, as a vulnerable people, have not escaped this despicable practice. The Jews of Ethiopia were ransomed. Iraqi Jews often had to pay to liberate their relatives, and, similarly, the Jews of Syria were held for ransom. During the waning days of World War II, the Nazis made a bizarre offer to the Allies: they would free Hungary's remaining Jews in exchange for 10,000 trucks. The offer came to nothing, dooming thousands. More happily, "Let my people go" became the rallying cry for Soviet Jewry.

These are a few examples of many.

As we approach Passover, our founding story of liberation from slavery, we take pride in how, over the centuries, our national liberation became a model for other enslaved populations. Most notably, the American civil rights movement took it as a paradigm.

When considering how captives were to be ransomed, the rabbis declared that, given the vulnerability of women to rape by their captors, female captives were to be ransomed before male ones.

Therefore, it should come as a shock that Canada harbours a population of female slaves, yet we as Canadians have done nothing to assist them, and in fact have contributed to their captivity. As Canadian Jews, we have a double responsibility.

Who are these women?

As far as I know, they are not Jewish, so you may say that our obligation to them is diminished. But the texts that apply to ransoming captives are broad enough to imply their inclusion: "Do not harden your heart" (Deuteronomy, xv. 7); "Do not stand by the blood of your neighbour" (Leviticus, xix. 16) "Love your neighbour as yourself" (Leviticus xix. 18); "Deliver them that are drawn unto death" (Proverbs, xxiv. 11).

My MP, Hedy Fry, was parliamentary secretary to Judy Sgro, the former immigration minister who resigned over the issue of 600 "exotic dancers" brought into Canada to fill jobs in strip bars – a euphemism for women who most likely will be entering the sex trade, willingly or not.

Quoting the Liberal Party platform, Fry pledged in a recent newsletter to her constituents that the government will "deal with issues affecting the sex trade and human trafficking."

How is the government dealing with it? By welcoming dancers who are destined to do a lot more than dance at weddings and bar mitzvahs?

This is not to let the original author of this abominable policy off the hook. Pierre Pettigrew, now foreign minister but immigration minister when the policy was established, should spend some community service time at women's shelters in Vancouver's downtown east side, as I do. Then maybe he would understand the horror I feel when I see what is being done to "deal with issues affecting the sex trade and human trafficking." A big fat nothing.

What has happened to these women? Is anyone in our government interested? How about Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, who Fry quotes as wanting to be involved in the discussion of human trafficking? As a committed Jew, he knows that allowing this practice to go unpunished – even if more "ministerial permits" aren't given out, there are still 600 women at the mercy of their strip club bosses – is wrong.

Those 600 women, and many more uncounted women, are enslaved – by their pimps, by their employers, by the men who buy their favours. We may not be able to stop the rapes in Darfur and the Congo, and we may have been ineffectual in Rwanda, but these women live in our towns and cities. We owe them redemption.

Until everyone is free, no one is free.

Teaching harmony and combating hatred

People learn to hate. No one is born with a hateful mindset – these attitudes are learned, most likely during the formative years of development, sometimes through family attitudes, peer pressures or the influences of the media, popular music and the Internet.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Some people transfer their feelings of inadequacy to attitudes of hate, while others look for scapegoats to escape their own personal prisons.

What can we as a society do to counter anti-Semitism and other hateful attitudes? In recent years, many strategies have been employed, including the inclusion of hate propaganda provisions in the Criminal Code as well as sentence enhancement provisions for hate crimes. Recently, the federal government announced a $56-million anti-racism plan in another effort to combat racism through the fostering of multiculturalism. We have anti-discrimination agencies – human rights commissions – federally and in every province and territory. There are non-government organizations across our country that are mandated to combat prejudice.

Despite all of these laudable efforts, the conventional wisdom is that the best way to combat racism is through education in our schools. We now see human rights being taught as an integral part of mandatory social studies curricula. Some school boards authorize the daily recitation of humanistic readings to begin the school day.

But here lies the greatest irony. Although schools offer a strong vehicle to promote tolerance and understanding of our Canadian mosaic, some of the worst, most notorious instances of anti-Semitism have arisen in the context of our school system.

The infamous example of James Keegstra immediately comes to mind. For about 10 years, he taught revisionist history that included virulent anti-Semitism in his mandatory high school courses in a rural Alberta public school. Keegstra eventually lost his teaching certificate and was found guilty of hate propaganda under the Criminal Code. The case exhibited bizarre twists and turns as it made its way through the courts. Another example is the case of teacher Malcolm Ross who repeatedly made public attacks on Jews. Although he did so during so-called off-duty time, it nonetheless created a poisoned environment in the school.

The most recent example of prejudicial attitudes being encouraged in the school system occurred at the Abraar Islamic School in Ottawa. Some teachers there encouraged and praised students for glorifying violence against Jews. Subsequently, the school principal suspended two teachers and, days later, an imam in a sermon raised the issue as an example or object lesson in the importance of teaching harmony and understanding.

Bernie Farber, national chief executive officer of the Canadian Jewish Congress, said that "schools play a significant role in the inculcation of the values of respect for the individual and civil discourse. The glorification of violence is completely antithetical to the goals of education and the promotion of Canadian values."

Schools are, of course, more than just teachers and classrooms.

Students spend many hours with their peers, bringing with them attitudes learned at home, acquired through their music and on the Internet, and, in some instances, from their religious institutions. Mass murderer Jeff Weise became obsessed with the ideas expressed on a neo-Nazi Internet site before embarking on his horrific violence at Red Lake High School in Minnesota.

Schools are vital in promulgating values that are integral to enlightened Canadian society. Curricula must continue to be responsive to society's need to foster the values of understanding, harmony, multiculturalism and those other constitutionally entrenched norms enshrined in the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in our own Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

These values are often reinforced outside of schools in youth organizations such as the scouting movement. In Alberta, human rights and understanding of others are even "taught" as part of a program offered at playgrounds and summer camps.

The teaching of human rights must be a pervasive activity, reaching into all aspects of the development of our youths. As they mature and take responsible positions in society, these young Canadians will be entrusted with the sharing and promulgating of these values to others.

Despite the Keegstra case and other aberrations that appear from time to time in our school system, formal education remains a primary tool in promoting a healthier, harmonious society devoid of hate.

The Kirshner File

DP camps in Germany harboured survivors

Sixty years ago this week, at precisely 3:07 p.m. on April 15, 1945, the British army stormed into Bergen-Belsen, the notorious concentration camp in northern Germany, and liberated it. "You are free!" announced a British officer over a loudspeaker.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The sight that met British troops was appalling: piles of corpses in various stages of decomposition. On the eve of Germany's surrender, the SS had forced prisoners to dig massive pits and bury as many of the emaciated cadavers as possible.

But the grisly task had not been completed when the first British tank rolled over the barbed wire fence that enclosed the camp, which had originally housed political dissidents and prisoners of war.

At its euphoric moment of liberation, Bergen-Belsen was bursting at the seams with a swollen population of 60,000, some of whom, such as my parents, David and Genia, were Jewish refugees whose lives had been torn asunder by the Holocaust.

They were among an estimated 900,000 displaced persons (DPs) who had drifted into western Germany at the end of World War II. Of these, 83,000 were Jews, mainly survivors from Poland, France, Belgium, Holland, Hungary and Romania.

Within the smaller group were 15,000 so-called "privileged" German Jews who had lived through the Nazi regime simply because they were half-Jewish, converts to Christianity or married to Christians.

Jewish survivors who were unwilling to return to their former homes, or unable to immigrate to destinations like Israel, Canada or America ended up in DP camps ranging from Landsberg and Feldafing to Fohrenwald and Bergen-Belsen, the biggest of them all.

These camps were administered by Britain, France and the United States with humanitarian assistance from UNRRA, the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.

At first, the majority of DPs were found in the British zone, writes Hagit Lavsky, a Hebrew University professor, in New Beginnings: Holocaust Survivors in Bergen-Belsen and the British Zone in Germany, 1945-1950 (Wayne State University Press). But by the end of 1945, most Jewish DPs in Germany had migrated into the U.S. zone.

With the establishment of Israel and the passage of new American immigration laws, the DP population in Germany shrank, prompting the closure of a succession of DP camps. Fohrenwald, which functioned until 1956, was the last to be shut.

Before these developments, the British occupation zone was home to 45 DP camps as well as small clusters of Jewish settlement in such cities as Hamburg, Hanover, Celle, Kiel, Cologne, Dusseldorf and Brunswick. The founders of these resurrected Jewish communities were assimilated German Jews, many in mixed marriages.

A number of Jewish DPs also settled in cities. For a brief period, Celle – a town near Bergen-Belsen that had a modest Jewish population prior to the rise of Adolf Hitler in 1933 – was the largest community in postwar Germany inhabited by DPs. This happened when the British decided to depopulate Bergen-Belsen.

Conditions in Bergen-Belsen – which had a population of 500 child survivors – were beyond belief when it was liberated. A typhus epidemic broke out just months before and dysentery and tuberculosis were widespread. Twenty-nine thousand people required hospitalization.

It took the British two days to realize that the army rations of canned meat and vegetables they had generously distributed were unsuitable for the sick and the starving. As a result, thousand of inmates died needlessly.

Faced with a catastrophic situation, the British resorted to mass burials as early as April 17. With Jewish survivors looking on and army cameras whirring, they forced SS personnel to do the gruesome work.

In addition to UNRRA, a plethora of overseas Jewish organizations – from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee to the Organization for Rehabilitation and Training (ORT) – worked non-stop to alleviate the hardships of survivors. But, as Lavsky points out in this thorough book, the World Jewish Congress and the Board of Deputies of British Jews waged a bitter struggle to be allowed into the camp.

Quick to organize themselves, the Jews in Bergen-Belsen formed the Central Committee, whose chief function was to maintain contact with the British authorities.

Its first two presidents were Dutch and Czech Jews. Its third and most outstanding president, Josef (Yossele) Rosensaft (1911-1975), was a Zionist from Bedzin, Poland, who had been deported to Auschwitz and was then sent to Dora-Mittelbau before arriving in Bergen-Belsen in a transport.

Although he did not speak English, Rosensaft was, Lavsky says, "a genuine representative of the Polish Jewish masses" who understood their needs and wishes. He was chair of the Central Committee until its dissolution in the summer of 1950. Rosensaft immigrated to the United States but maintained close ties with Israel.

Another figure of note in the Central Committee was Paul Trepman (1916-1987), a teacher and Zionist Revisionist who later settled in Canada and became the director of the Jewish Public Library in Montreal. As one of the heads of the Central Committee's cultural department, he played an instrumental role in the opening of a school, a Yiddish theatre and a newspaper.

The publication, Unzer Sztyme, expressed the concerns and the wishes of the survivors and was read by virtually every DP in the British zone. In 1947, Unzer Sztyme was supplanted by Wochenblatt.

Jewish children in Bergen-Belsen, circa 1945

Life in Bergen-Belsen, though culturally rich, could be daunting. Black marketeers flourished, but nearly all the other DPs barely kept body and limb together.

Food shortages persisted for months after the war and sparked a general strike. Lavsky says that the daily ration of 2,000 calories per person was never fully enforced and that fat, proteins, fresh vegetables, fruits and milk were always in short supply.

Relations with the German population in the immediate vicinity of the camp hardly existed. According to Lavsky, Jews encountered Germans on two levels: in the form of anti-Semitic attacks on Jewish cemeteries and synagogues outside Bergen-Belsen, and in trade and barter in the black market.

Within Bergen-Belsen, anti-Semitic attacks by non-Germans, chiefly Polish and Lithuanian DPs, presented quite a problem until the British cleared out the offenders.

Zionism and aliyah constituted an integral part of the survivors' national agenda.

The Central Committee urged DPs to join Jewish armed forces in Palestine and raised funds for the Yishuv. But, as Lavsky observes, almost none of the Zionist leaders, from Rosensaft to Trepman, made aliyah.

David Ben-Gurion, chair of the Jewish Agency, visited Bergen-Belsen and other camps in the autumn of 1945 in an effort to encourage aliyah and drum up interest in Zionist education.

He needn't have bothered.

Toward the end of 1946, the British began issuing certificates that enabled DPs to immigrate to Palestine. Humanitarian impulses did not underpin Britain's new policy. The British government, having virtually closed the doors to Jewish immigration in 1939, was simply anxious to solve the DP problem.

German Jews were not eligible for the program, though one doubts that they would have been interested in being resettled in Palestine.

By May 1948, 6,000 Jews had left the British zone for Palestine. But many took advantage of offers by Canada and Norway to absorb DPs.

In September 1949, Harry Greenstein, the advisor on Jewish affairs in the U.S. zone, called a conference on "The Future of Jews in Germany." The subject aroused the deepest passions.

Those who supported a continued Jewish presence in Germany ran the gamut from John J. McCloy, the American high commissioner there, to Rabbi Isaac Klein of the Synagogue Council of America. They argued that a Jewish community in Germany was a reality that could not be ignored.

The skeptics, including Rosensaft, contended that there was no place for Jews in Germany after the Holocaust and that Jews belonged in Israel.

The debate resolved itself.

At least 100,000 Jews currently live in Germany, and last year, for the first time, more Russian Jews immigrated to Germany than to Israel.

Family philanthropy brings passion to giving

Michael Steinhardt addresses Family Philanthropy Forum

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Philanthropists today are more interested in taking a proactive role in their giving, while teaching their children to do the same, according to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. The Jewish Foundation has created the Family Philanthropy Forum as a resource for families to encourage intergenerational consultation.

"Our goal for the Family Philanthropy Forum is to introduce passion into our philanthropy," explained Karen Morton, chair of the Family Philanthropy Forum Committee. "In year one, we are hoping that, by examining different philanthropic models, each one of us will be able to evaluate our own giving objectives. In year two, our goals will be to offer skills and tools that will assist each of us in igniting and pursuing our own passions for philanthropy."

To open this year's, first session, the committee invited noted Jewish philanthropist Michael Steinhardt to address the audience. Steinhardt's philanthropic resume is indeed an impressive one. He is the founding co-chairman of birthright israel, creator of the Jewish Life Network, and founder of the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education, (PEJE), and Makor, a social and cultural outreach program to Jews in their 20s and 30s, to name but a few.

"My interests lie in revitalizing secular Jewish culture," Steinhardt said. "That's why I started the Jewish Life Network. This is innovative Jewish philanthropy."

Steinhardt has always believed that wealth and achievement are not enough to give full value and meaning to life. At the same time, he has felt a growing alarm about the erosion of Jewish identity and a deep concern about the threat to continuity of non-Orthodox Jews through generations.

"Secular Jewish culture needs to be rooted in joy," he explained. "We need to create programs that are life-enhancing experiences and be totally focused on the next generation; they are a light for our nation." Most importantly, he stressed, "In philanthropy you must do what you care about, follow your heart."

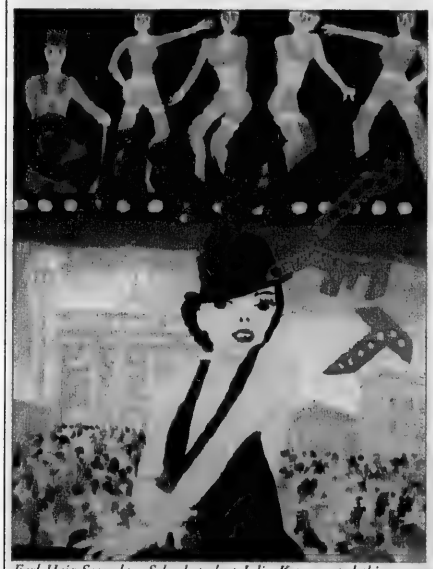
"Our committee has worked very hard this year to plan the "Ignite Your Passion for Philanthropy" series. We have invited philanthropists – such as Michael Steinhardt - who are the 'poster children' in their field," Morton said. "They have brought passion, vision and critical analysis into their philanthropic decisions and subsequently, are making measurable changes in the world. Hopefully, they will motivate and encourage each of us to become the philanthropist we always wanted to be."

The next session will take place on June 9, at the Sunnybrook Estates, featuring Martin P. Connell, co-founder and co-owner of ACE Bakery Limited, creator of Calmeadow, a charitable organization to strengthen small scale enterprises.

Holocaust Centre inspires students' artwork

Each year across Ontario, thousands of students graduate from high schools with little understanding of the Holocaust and its implications world-wide. Susan Vale, an art instructor at Earl Haig Secondary School, recently sought to alter this fact, turning to UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre for help and guidance.

As an art instructor, it was not easy for her to find a way to infuse Holocaust education into the school's curriculum, but it was something she felt was essential. Vale, a teacher in the public school system for years, was growing more and more concerned about her students and their values.



Earl Haig. Secondary School student Julia Kota created this poster depicting her interpretation of the play Cabaret, after a visit to the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

"I was seeing a real lack of respect for the individual and property," she explained. "I see that lack of respect as the beginning of a society that is comfortable with hate, and that worried me."

It was a happy coincidence that her grade nine visual art students were scheduled to view a Claude Watson School for the Arts presentation of Cabaret, because, it was in this way, that she was able to incorporate a discussion of the Holocaust and educate her students about WWII and its aftermath.

A new member of the Holocaust Education Committee herself, Vale contacted the Holocaust Centre and had 55 of her students from diverse backgrounds visit the site. The students were offered the moving experience of meeting with Arnold Friedman, a survivor, to receive a first-hand account of the atrocities committed during the war.

"This encounter changed my students' life," Vale gushed. "It has been a very powerful experience."

To further the lessons learned at the Centre, back at the school, Vale's students were given the task of creating provocative drawings to act as advertisements for the upcoming play, which is set in pre-World War II Germany.

"I was so surprised by the way in which the students really got it," Vale enthused. "The temper of the times with all its antisemitism, corruption and lawlessness, the Centre was really instrumental in getting that all across," she added.

Adam Fuerstenberg, director of the Holocaust Centre, was so impressed with the final rendering of the drawings that were displayed at the Claude Watson production of Cabaret; he inquired whether several of them could be showcased at the Holocaust Centre itself. Earl Haig was quick to oblige and for two weeks the images were exhibited in the lobby of the fourth floor of the Lipa Green Building at 4600 Bathurst Street. The drawings are now on display at the Loggia of the Koffler Centre of the Arts until Friday Aprill 22.

Each year, more than 25,000 students from across Ontario visit the Holocaust Centre and gain greater sensitivity to the Holocaust and Jewish history through interactive speakers, arts initiatives and educational materials.

TO'05 Conference inspires tomorrow's leaders

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

More than 400 participants between the ages of 25 and 40 came from across Canada and Israel to Toronto's Sheraton Centre recently to take part in TO'05, the UIA Federations Canada and UJA Federation's National young Leadership Conference. The conference is designed to give our future Jewish leaders the chance to learn, enjoy themselves, and make important and long-lasting friendships.

The conference - chaired by Josh Cooper, Liann Granovsky and Alison Himel - saw some of the world's preeminent speakers on hand to educate participants about the importance of giving back to our community. Among those who addressed the participants were Dennis Prager, one of America's most respected radio talk show hosts; Rabbi Joseph Telushkin, a prolific author and lecturer, and Neil Lazarus, an internationally acclaimed expert in the field of Middle East and Israel advocacy training.

At the Shabbat dinner which officially opened the conference, participants were treated to an inspiring and spirited address by Michael Steinhardt, founding co-chairman of birthright israel, creator of the Jewish Life network, and founder of the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE). Steinhardt spoke about the future of the worldwide Jewish community and the importance of supporting causes you believe in.

"It was just a fantastic event," said Cooper. "To see 400 young leaders come together as they did to discuss issues that concern them, and to find ways to work together and strengthen the Jewish community, was wonderful to see. It was a tremendous success."

A "Night on the Town" - a TO'05 party held at Toronto's Steam Whistle Brewery gave participants the chance to relax and meet their counterparts from across the country and Israel.

"What an amazing weekend it was," enthused Toronto's Nancy Klein, a TO'05 Conference participant. "Most importantly we heard from so many great speakers, people who personify what giving back to our Jewish community is really all about. At the party, I spent time with six people who came from Eilat. To sit and share ideas and get their views on all things Jewish, was so meaningful to me."

Bringing The Falash Mura Home

JAFI expedites aliyah of Ethiopian Jews

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

An historic mission to expedite the aliyah of the Falash Mura, the last remnants of Ethiopian Jewry wishing to be reunited with their extended families already living in Israel, is now underway. This undertaking is spearheaded by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), in coordination with the Government of Israel. JAFI is UJA Federation's overseas partner.

In the wake of this monumental humanitarian decision, made in the spirit of Jewish-Zionist heritage, JAFI has committed itself to facilitate the Falash Mura's homecoming and re-settlement into permanent housing over the next three years. This challenge calls for increasing their aliyah rate from the current 300 persons per month by 100% to 600 persons per month, beginning this summer. The plan is to bring all the Falash Mura to Israel by 2007.

"The decision of the prime minister on the issue of the Falash Mura is a Zionist decision of the highest order, and I salute him on his leadership," said JAFI's chairman Sallai Meridor. "This is a decision that will alleviate much human suffering from individuals who are waiting to immigrate to Israel, of whom the majority is children and youth."

The implementation of bringing the Falash Mura to Israel, and their initial absorption, will require 2 stages of execution according to JAFI. First the Falash Mura will need to be registered and cared for with food and medical attention in order to make the trip to Israel. They will be taught introductory Hebrew language skills to further assist them once in Israel. At the second stage, the Falash Mura will be flown to Israel where their process of absorption will begin in preliminary housing at absorption centres. The final step will be permanent housing and an educational process leading to full conversion to Judaism for these remaining Falash Mura.

"The Jewish Agency and its partners around the world are proving the power of collective action through the extraordinary reunification of Jewish Ethiopian families in Israel," said Leslie Gales, UJA Federation board chair. "We are turning the dreams of those Jews still left in Ethiopia into reality and that is truly amazing."

Pictured right: The challenge calls for increasing Falash Mura aliyah rate from the current 300 persons per month by 100% to 600 persons per month, beginning this summer. The plan is to bring all the Falash Mura to Israel by 2007.

Stars of the 21st Century

There are few fundraising events in the City of Toronto that celebrate the arts on the scale and grandeur of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's (BJCC) Koffler Centre of the Arts. On Sunday, April 17, the Koffler Centre will host its fourth annual Fundraising gala, Hearts on Fire, showcasing Stars of the 21st Century, a dance extravaganza highlighting dancers from around the world.

The Koffler Centre's director of the Academy of Ballet & Jazz, Solomon Tencer, and Artistic director, Nadia Veselova-Tencer, have produced Stars of the 21st Century since 1998, presenting it in Paris and New York. It was at the Lincoln Center in Manhattan that Tiana Koffler Boyman, president of the Koffler Centre watched the Tencer's production of Stars of the 21st Century and decided this would be an appropriate event to fundraise for the Koffler Centre. It has paid off, with the gala raising over $200,000 for the Centre and its programs.

This year, Koffler has teamed up with Julia Paisly to co-chair the event.

"The first time I went to the show, I went as a patron and I was surprised by the high quality of the performances," Paisly explained. "But I got hooked. I have a huge sensitivity to the arts, and to the grass roots nature of the Centre, the way it aspires to be world class. It really is important to support the arts; it's integral to a strong community."

The entire event hinges on attracting top dancers from around the world, performing their signature pieces. The prestige of the production and the caliber of the performers mean that dancers participate in the event year after year.

Guillaume Cote, a principal dancer with the National Ballet of Canada, has participated in the production before and is excited to dance in it again this year.

"Being in Canada, we are somewhat isolated," Guillaume explained. "So to dance in a production with top international performers is a wonderful learning experience and an educational opportunity."

Gala proceeds will benefit programs provided by the Koffler Gallery, the Koffler Schools of Music, Dance, Theatre and Visual Arts as well as Jewish Contemporary Arts.

For inquiries please contact Marni Brinder at the Koffler Centre of the Arts, 416-636-1880 ext. 271.

Hate crime up in Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The number of reported incidents of hate crimes in Toronto increased by nine per cent last year, with the Jewish community the single most targeted group, according to the Toronto Police Service's 2004 Annual Hate/Bias Crime Statistical Report.

Jews were attacked 59 times and Israelis six, states the report, which breaks down incidents in categories including religion, ethnicity and nationality.

The next most frequently targeted group was the black community, with 31 incidents, gays with 10 and Muslims with nine. A "multi-bias" category, which includes a variety of groupings, experienced 18 incidents.

Prepared by the police hate crime unit, the report noted the nine per cent increase last year reversed a two-year period of decline.

"A small increase in the number of reported hate crimes occurred in 2004," the report states. "Last year, the Toronto Police Service hate crime unit identified a total of 163 hate crime occurrences… The 163 occurrences in 2004 is the third lowest number recorded since the unit began in 1993 and is well below the 12-year average of 222 occurrences per year."

The report drew special attention to two high profile incidents. In March, Jewish communal institutions, including a synagogue and cemetery, were the subject of vandalism and mischief. Three young men were subsequently charged with a number of criminal offences, including the promotion of hatred.

The other widely publicized incident took place during the summer at Ryerson University when an individual distributed "virulently anti-Muslim materials on campus." The suspect was charged in October with a number of hate-related offences.

Most incidents reported to police involve either mischief, assault or threats, with mischief (vandalism and graffiti) the most common, accounting for 59 per cent of the total. Hate propaganda offences "decreased significantly in 2004, with just 12 occurrences being recorded compared to 31 in 2003," the report found.

Twenty-three persons, mostly young men, were arrested in 2004, with 57 criminal charges laid. Thirteen cases are before the court. Six cases resulted in convictions and sentencing, two of which included weapons prohibition orders. "Other penalties have included numerous days in pre-trial custody, one to three year terms of probation with conditions, time to be served in addition to pre-trial custody, suspended sentences and a peace bond," the report stated.

B'nai Brith Canada, which publishes an annual audit of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada, noted the police findings coincide with its own report. B'nai Brith found that anti-Semitic incidents reached an all time high in 2004 – 857 incidents – a 47 per cent jump over the year before.

"The Toronto Police study details the doubling of hate crime activity directed at members of the Jewish community – a finding that is especially disturbing given that Jews are the most targeted group, yet make up only a very small fraction of the total city population," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said Jews were the subject of only 29 incidents in 2003. While the number of incidents overall grew by nine per cent, those directed against Jews more than doubled. If not for the increase in offences against Jews, pushing the overall statistics higher, the trend would have continued downward, he added.

"I believe what we're seeing is an accumulation of factors… I think what the accumulation is doing is creating a greater sense of permissibility. People always wanted to do it but felt societal pressure made it the wrong thing to do."

Why is this 'knight' different?

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN

In a few days, Jews the world over will be gathering in their homes with family and friends for the Passover seder commemorating the miraculous exodus from Egypt. The seder will begin with the traditional four questions known as the Mah Nishtanah recited by the youngest members of the family. Many children will memorize the opening lines of the seder way in advance, so that they can recite them fluently without mistakes.

But the age-old Mah Nishtanah is more than just a seder icebreaker, to warm us up and prepare us to discuss the Pesach story. It actually teaches us some very important lessons about the Jewish tradition of inquiring, asking questions and never taking anything for granted.

On an even deeper level, the seemingly simple questions discussed in the Mah Nishtanah about the matzah, the bitter herbs and the other unusual observances of Pesach allude to our own unique identity as Jews and some of our unusual experiences throughout history.

A story is told of an elderly English Jew, a prominent novelist and intellectual, who is informed that he will be knighted. The queen's protocol officials prepare him and the other knights-to-be for the ceremony. When he stands before the queen, he is to recite certain Latin words just before being knighted.

On the day of the ceremony, the man is very nervous and when he approaches the queen, he forgets the Latin expression. As precious seconds tick by, the only non-English words that he knows pour out of him: "Mah nishta-nah halaila hazeh mikol haleilot?" The queen, confused, turns to her protocol officer and asks: "Why is this knight different from all other knights?"

The Mah Nishtanah and the seder experience are so deeply etched in our memory that it is the first thing we blurt out when can't remember anything else. When a Jew is confronted or challenged, even in a secular setting, his natural response is a Jewish one. This is what makes the Jewish "knight" different from all the other "knights" of the world.

The seder manual called the Haggadah describes four archetypal children invited to the seder table: "The Torah speaks of four sons – one is wise, one is wicked, one is simple and one does not even know how to ask." A question that comes to mind when reading this section is why does the Haggadah preface each child with the word "one," the Hebrew "echad"? It could have simply described the sons as – "the wise, the wicked, the simple and the son who can't even ask," without repeating the word "one" four times?

The previous Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn of blessed memory, offers a revolutionary explanation: The repetition of the number "one" reminds us that deep down inside every Jewish child lie the memory and connection to the "Number One." There exists deep down in every Jew a natural monotheistic belief in the "numero uno" – the one and only, almighty God.

Regardless of observance, background or affiliation, every Jewish child has a born connection to the one and only – "HaShem Echad." It is the very same "Echad" that appears in the most popular and definitive prayer of the Jewish people – Shema Yisrael. It is the very same "Echad" that is meticulously emphasized by pious Jews during the recitation of the Shema, to evoke a greater degree of concentration. It is this same "Echad" that is shared by each of the "Four Sons" equally.

It was this natural Jewishness that surfaced in the English novelist in front of the queen, and it is this sense of Jewishness that lies dormant in the heart of every Jewish child. It is just a matter of spending enough time with them at the seder and the rest of the year to help them discover it.

Menachem Begin's finest hour

By SHELDON LERMAN

Many remember Menachem Begin as the first Israeli prime minister to receive the Nobel Peace Prize – after the signing of the 1978 Camp David Accords. Personally, I believe Begin's finest hour was in the leadership he displayed following the June 1948 attack on the Altalena, in preventing a civil war that would have had disastrous consequences for the new State of Israel.

One of the enduring tragedies of the "Altalena affair" has been the repeated attempt by some to perpetuate the myth that David Ben-Gurion heroically destroyed this ship laden with badly needed arms and ammunition and 940 volunteers to fight in Israel's War of Independence in order to prevent the overthrow of the Provisional Government of Israel by followers of Menachem Begin who had led the 1944-48 Irgun revolt against British rule.

Rick Lavere's article, "Lessons for Abbas from the Altalena Affair" (CJN, March 31), goes even further by seeking to draw parallels between Begin and the assortment of Arab terrorist organizations currently aligned against Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Lavere writes that "news of the [Altalena's] secret landing soon reached the ears of Israel's prime minister." In fact, the Irgun had contacted Israel's newly formed Ministry of Defence, asked whether the ship should proceed to Israel or be diverted (because of an Arab-Israeli truce called by the United Nations) and was told to bring in the ship as quickly as possible.

Lavere mentions "repeated warnings to captain and crew of imminent attack if they attempted to land," but omits that the ship, instead of anchoring off Tel Aviv, many of whose residents ardently supported Begin and the Irgun, sailed further north to Kfar Vitkin, a moshav largely populated by members of Ben-Gurion's own Mapai (Workers') party, under instructions received from the government.

Lavere talks about "the ensuing violence that took place… [that] proved to be a death blow for the Irgun and established the newly formed Labor government as the sole voice of Jewish resistance to the invading Arab armies." He implies that the violence just happened and fails to explain how it started and who fired on whom.

He says Begin's "miscalculation resulted in the deaths of 16 Irgun fighters and two members of the IDF, as well as the bombardment and eventual sinking of the Altalena by the Israeli army." It was Begin's "fault" because he "did not believe Ben-Gurion would ever order the IDF to fire upon fellow Israelis". But what about Ben-Gurion's responsibility? Did not he, or at least his people, mislead Begin? If Begin was at fault, it was because of his misplaced trust in Ben-Gurion for, although there were political and ideological differences between them, Begin nevertheless respected Ben-Gurion's authority as head of the new Provisional Government.

Lavere justifies Ben-Gurion's actions by concluding that "never again would they [the Irgun] openly challenge the IDF," implying that the Irgun was opposed to the Israeli Army. This flies in the face of everything the Irgun stood for. They had fought to drive out the British Mandatory regime and to bring in boatloads of Jews fleeing Nazi persecution – not to overthrow the Israeli government. Ideologically and practically, the leadership and rank and file of the Irgun enthusiastically embraced the concept of a united Israeli army to defend the fledgling state and to bring home the survivors of Hitler's death camps.

To characterize Begin as presenting "a challenge to his own government and to the rule of law" is a total misrepresentation of everything Begin struggled for throughout his life. It is a credit to Begin that Ben-Gurion's unprovoked destruction of the Altalena did not degenerate into a civil war.

On the eve of the June 1967 Six Day War, Begin joined a delegation that visited David Ben-Gurion in retirement and asked Ben-Gurion to return and accept the premiership again. Following that meeting, Ben-Gurion is reported to have said that if he had known Begin in 1948 as he did now, the face of history would have been different.

Although Israel and its supporters continue to face many challenges, we are fortunate to follow in the footsteps of many good and dedicated people who came before and from whom we can derive inspiration and guidance in tackling the problems of our own day. Menachem Begin was such a person. The time has come to stop trying to draw false parallels between him and those who are the very antithesis of all he stood for.

Between the known and unknown

A Sense of the Mysterious: Science and the Human Spirit by Alan Lightman, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

In the midst of his remarkable career, Albert Einstein made the following surprising assertion: "The most beautiful experience we can have is the mysterious. It is the fundamental emotion which stands at the cradle of true art and true science."

But what is the mysterious? For Alan Lightman in A Sense of the Mysterious: Science and the Human Spirit, it isn't synonymous with the unexpected, the unknowable or the supernatural. Rather, for him, it means that we can stand right at the edge between the known and unknown and gaze into that cavern and be exhilarated rather than frightened.

He writes, "I have experienced that beautiful mystery both as a physicist and as a novelist. As a physicist, in the infinite mystery of physical nature. As a novelist, in the infinite mystery of human nature and the power of words to portray some of that mystery."

The 11 accessible and splendidly written essays in this slim volume have all – apart from one – been previously published in a variety of periodicals.

They explore such themes as the emotional life of the scientist, the place of metaphor and imagination in the creative process and the alternate ways in which scientists and humanists regard the world about them.

Lightman discusses his unlikely journey from the life and work of a theoretical scientist to the world of literature. Although he was exhilarated and even obsessed in seeking answers to problems in science, he was, at the same time, aroused and ultimately seduced by the power of language. He ended up with a foot in each camp.

Especially noteworthy are the insightful and sprightly sketches of four fellow scientists: Albert Einstein, Richard Feynman, Edward Teller and the astronomer Vera Rubin. Less known then the others, Rubin is a role model for women in science. A brilliant pioneer in the difficult field of "dark matter," her contributions have been numerous and ground-breaking.

The author informs us that modern astronomers believe that only about five per cent of the mass of the universe exists in the form of ordinary, light-producing material. Another 25 per cent is believed to be dark matter, as yet unidentified. And about 70 per cent exists in an even stranger, non-material form called "dark energy."

In his concluding article, Prisoner of the Wired World, Lightman laments the corroding influence of technology on the ethical and emotional fabric of society. Many persons feel trapped in a world beyond their control. It comes down to this, "Somehow, each of us must figure out how to measure the 'life,' our personal life, our inner self, that we exchange for each piece of technology… This accounting may have to be done item by item, hour by hour, but I believe that it must be done and it can be done only by the individual. Only individuals can measure their own values and needs, their own spirit, their own story of life."

A Sense of the Mysterious conveys the elegance, contributions and perils of science, as well as the supremacy of literature to open a door to human feelings and emotions.

Passover recipes from abroad

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Matzah balls, again?

Now, don't get me wrong. I have nothing against matzah balls. But if your seders have become somewhat repetitive, then it may be time to widen your Pesach culinary repertoire. And where better to search than in the collective Jewish cookbook, thanks to the wandering of Jews throughout the world?

Before we get to the recipes, please note that not only do Passover food traditions vary around the world but so do the restrictions. For example, while Ashkenazi Jews do not eat rice, beans (or in most cases) egg matzahs, these foods are quite permissible for most Sephardic Jews. The Jerusalem Post has a good overview about how these different customs evolved [http://tinyurl.com/5h296] but when in doubt about a food, always check with a rabbi.

The RFCJ Archive is the work of hundreds of people from around the world who have a Jewish recipe to share. Delving into the Passover section can be a bit daunting because the holiday only lasts eight days (seven in Israel). Here's a small sample of what you'll find: Fried Mexican Gefilte Fish, Sopa di Galina (Curaçao Chicken Soup With Tomatoes), Khoresht Garch (Persian Veal and Mushroom Stew), Masa Tiganitas (Sephardic Matzah Brei), Greek Lamb Stew with Romaine Lettuce and Dill and Hungarian Dobostorte. [www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/]

In Mangiare alla Giudia (Eating the Jewish Way), Ariel Toaff, a professor at Bar-Ilan University, traces Italian Jewry's culinary history. Although his book doesn't contain recipes, you could use its research to reconstruct a historic Italian seder. How about sitting down to some scacchi (checkers), squares of matzah soaked in capon broth, browned in goose fat and baked in alternating layers with cooked greens or poultry giblets. The menu for a seder in the central Italian city of Urbino in April 1892 included scacchi, boiled meat served with goose salami, salad and desserts made from marzipan, matzah meal and quince preserves. [http://tinyurl.com/5pyzm] If you're looking for some contemporary Italian Pesach recipes, you'll find directions for two seders' worth at Italianfood.about.com. [http://tinyurl.com/3l7hv]

From Italy, travel south to Ethiopia to see how Jews there would mark the holiday with a very different kind of seder. "The ritual meal took place outdoors, by moonlight. The Jews sat on the ground, separated by age and gender. The sparse meal, of kita (Ethiopian matzah) and meat (ritually slaughtered cow or sheep), was eaten rapidly, as if indeed they were fleeing from Egypt." [http://tinyurl.com/3jenc]

Although "Passover in Poland" may not sound too exotic when you have a name like mine, Polish-Jewish food could very well be glamorous if your family hails from Yemen or Morocco. You'll find suggestions for standards such as Roast Chicken, Matzah Stuffing, and Apple and Carrot Tzimmes. [http://tinyurl.com/3uok2]

I don't think this particular Jewish community has been around quite as long as Italy's or Ethiopia's, but I was intrigued to see that Jews in Alaska have begun to develop their own local holiday fare. Ellyn Goodrich is one of Alaska's 5,000 Jews, the so-called "frozen chosen." Her Alaskan Halibut and Salmon Gefilte Fish Terrine is baked in a bundt pan and unmoulded, for a festive look. [http://tinyurl.com/7ytxz]

Aside from the matzah and maror, perhaps the most distinctive food at the seder is charoset (also known as "charoses"), often a blend of walnuts, wine and apples that is reminiscent of the mortar used by the Israelites during their forced labour in Egypt. The Jewish Food Archives [www.jewish-food.org/catindex] and My JewishLearning.com [http://tinyurl.com/3j476] have collected more variations, including those from Morocco (dates, cinnamon and cloves), Piedmont, Italy (chestnuts, orange zest and hard-boiled eggs) and California (prunes, dates and avocado). But given the nature of the holiday, what could be more appropriate than charoset from Egypt (dates, sultana raisins and walnuts)?

Which brings me to the last word on "charoses," thanks to the folks at JewishLearning.com. [http://tinyurl.com/6le68] It seems that a group of leading medical researchers has published data indicating that seder participants should not partake of both chopped liver and charoses. It seems that this combination can lead to "charoses of the liver."

Ukrainian president orders return of Kiev synagogue

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Not far from Kiev's Independence Square, in the heart of the Ukrainian capital, stands the city's main synagogue, an elegant structure that was known as the Brodsky Synagogue in pre-revolution days.

For decades the house of worship, named for one of Russia's pre-eminent sugar magnates, was lost to the Jewish community as Soviet expropriators decreed it would better serve as a puppet theatre. But with the collapse of the Soviet Union and the return of religious freedoms, the Jewish community successfully lobbied for its return.

Rabbi Moshe-Reuven Azman

The synagogue was only one of many Jewish communal institutions seized by the Soviets and only two weeks ago, the recently elected president of Ukraine, Viktor Yushchenko, issued a directive to the mayor of Kiev to begin the process of returning a second large Kiev synagogue, also constructed by the Brodsky brothers, that was being used as a cinema.

Rabbi Moshe-Reuven Azman, one of Ukraine's two chief rabbis, proudly holds up a single sheet of paper which he explains is a copy of the letter from Yushchenko to Olexandr Omelchenko, instructing the mayor that he has five days to comply. The letter was sent by Yushchenko shortly before his trip to Washington, where he was feted by U.S. President George W. Bush for his role in "the Orange Revolution" and as a leader in the development of democratic rights worldwide.

Rabbi Azman, who was the featured speaker last week at a Toronto Jewish National Fund program, said Yushchenko has proven a steadfast friend of Ukraine's Jews. While others worry that he has awarded medals to the staff of the opposition newspaper, Silski Visti, which ran several anti-Semitic articles, Rabbi Azman points to other events that linked Yushchenko to the Jewish community.

As a high profile politician and opposition leader, Yushchenko participated in three Chanukah programs at the Brodsky synagogue over the past few years. His last visit took place during the Orange Revolution,which saw the streets of Kiev teeming with supporters of the democratizing Yushchenko, as well as backers of his presidential opponent, Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovich.

Other ties link Yushchenko to the Jewish community. One of the president's key aides is Evgeny Chernovenko, a Jew who now serves as minister of transportation and communication and who was Yushchenko's chief of security during the elections.

Chernovenko helped establish a good relationship between the president and the Jewish community and many rabbis and Jewish organizations backed Yushchenko's presidential bid. During the election, Rabbi Azman relates, Yushchenko was on the receiving end of hostile propaganda that made him out as some kind of fascist or anti-Semite.

"That's not true," Azman said. "I know him personally."

Azman points to a particularly poignant example of the president's connection to the Jewish experience.

At the community's most recent Chanukah celebration, Yushchenko brought with him a small piece of "holy land" from Auschwitz. His father, he explained, had been interned in the camp as a Soviet prisoner of war.

Yushchenko told the gathering, "'I pledge on this land that if I am president, it will be good for the Jews,'" Azman recounted.

During the Orange Revolution, Rabbi Azman related, the Brodsky synagogue increased its profile among non-Jews unfamiliar with the community by distributing food packages to demonstrators, whether supporters of Yushchenko or Yanukovich. The synagogue, only a short walk from Independence Square, was turned into a temporary refuge where 200 people slept every night. The community handed out warm clothes to many of the demonstrators, Rabbi Azman said.

Azman acknowledges that despite Yushchenko's favourable attitude to the community, there are anti-Semitic forces the community must contend with. Oleg Tyagnybok, a member of the Ukrainian parliament and head of the Freedom Party, has repeatedly made anti-Semitic speeches, he noted.

A report published in December by the Union of Councils for Jews in the Former Soviet Union (www.fsumonitor.com), "Chronicle of Anti-semitism in Ukraine: 2002-2004," describes a disturbing rise in anti-Semitism since 2002.

The report found that "Unlike the Soviet period, the central government of Ukraine does not have an official policy of state sponsored anti-Semitism, and has made gestures towards the Jewish community. Nevertheless, serious problems remain that leave Jews vulnerable."

Rabbi Azman, who was born in Leningrad, said only a trickle of Jews are currently leaving Ukraine. Most who have wanted to depart have done so, leaving a community that ranges in size from 300,000 to 500,000 people. (Other estimates put the number closer to 200,000.)

With the liberalization of Ukrainian society in recent years, the Jewish community has rebuilt a vibrant Jewish infrastructure. It has established five schools in Kiev alone, serving 3,000 youngsters. The community maintains clubs for seniors and young people and even sponsored a solidarity mission to Israel of 200 community leaders at the start of the Iraq war.

Rabbi Azman points to a mass bar mitzvah of 1,000 youths planned in the next few weeks at the plaza near the Western Wall in Jerusalem as another success story.

Community celebrations marking Chanukah, Purim and Passover remain popular – 12,000 participated in the 2004 Purim celebrations alone – but the challenge for the religious leadership is reaching the thousands of unaffiliated Jews, many of whom have only minimal awareness of their Jewish heritage, he said.

Orthodox rabbi stresses compassion towards gays

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Although homosexual practice is banned by the Torah and same-sex marriage is contrary to the traditional notion of Jewish marriage, we should be more compassionate toward gay people, says a leading Orthodox rabbi.

"I do not think the Jewish notion of marriage can in any way be applied to homosexuality," said British Rabbi Chaim Rapoport during a recent lecture at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

"But people do not choose their desires... and surely there is more need for compassion and empathy for [gay people]."

Rabbi Rapoport, author of Homosexuality: An Authentic Orthodox View, centred his discussion on an emotional meeting he once had with an Orthodox man who was torn by homosexual tendencies.

The main issues in that meeting included whether homosexuals should fulfil the mitzvah of marrying and having children, how the Torah views homosexuals and why God created homosexuals and yet did not provide them with a legitimate outlet for their sexual desires.

Rabbi Rapoport said the mitzvah "to be fruitful and multiply" would entail a homosexual marrying and having sex with someone of the opposite gender.

Since this is contrary to their desires, Rabbi Rapoport does not advocate traditional, heterosexual marriage for gays.

"It is not only a lack of obligation – it is unadvisable," he said.

In terms of same-sex marriage, the rabbi notes Judaism considers marriage to be "holy" and a "divine calling," features that he says do not apply to same- sex relationships.

"To put other [homosexual] relationships in the same bracket as divine calling would be wrong at best and would be giving a stamp of a sacrosanct nature to something that is far removed from divine calling," he said.

But Rabbi Rapport shunned those who criticize and demonize homosexuals, pointing to the Torah to make his point.

"Nowhere does the Torah in its broadest sense criticize a person who craves for homosexual intercourse," Rabbi Rapoport said, adding he strives to "save homosexuals from ridicule."

Rabbi Rapoport also spoke out against fellow rabbis who make hyperbolic comments about homosexuals.

"It is devastating that rabbis and others will often mould a stereotype of homosexuals," he said, noting such remarks could result in "emotional homicide" for gays and their loved ones.

With respect to why God would allow homosexuals to be plagued by no legitimate outlet for their sexual inclinations, the rabbi did not give a definitive answer.

"I admit that is an excruciating question," he said.

"The issue has turned many people into agnostics."

What the rabbi emphasized was the importance of keeping homosexuals in the faith and showing them compassion.

"My prayer is that when I come to stand before the throne of God Almighty, I would be able to say with a clear conscience that I for one have done nothing to alienate any of his children," he said.

Rabbi Chaim Rapoport

Rabbi Rapoport, adviser to the British chief rabbi on matters of Jewish medical ethics, touched on the nature versus nurture debate, primarily supporting the view that homosexuality is not a choice.

"I believe that very few people choose to be of a homosexual orientation," he said, noting research indicates some people are either born gay or develop homosexual inclinations in early life.

As for gay people who attempt to switch their sexual orientation through therapy, Rabbi Rapoport said he met with a psychologist who practices this form of "reparative therapy" and based on the research, therapy does not appear to be the ultimate answer.

"I think it's preposterous to suggest that [therapy] provides a solution to the problem," he said.

"Clearly, not all people are able to change... There are people of exclusive homosexual interest."

However, the rabbi said that if a gay person changes and develops firm heterosexual desires, then "marriage may be possible. But so long as the person does not have that degree of interest... then marriage is not in order."

Chabad establishes Jewish presence in Aurora

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Chabad Lubavitch has arrived in Aurora, or more precisely, Oak Ridges (the northern part of Richmond Hill, just south of Aurora).

In December, Rabbi Yossi Hecht and his wife Sara moved onto a quiet street in an Oak Ridges subdivision to set up Chabad of Aurora. Their modest home – its living room/dining room attractively furnished and dominated by a portrait of the late Lubavitcher rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson – serves as local headquarters for now, as well as home to the Hechts and their two sons, a one-year-old and a one-month-old.

According to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto statistics, Aurora has 1,215 Jews and a total population of 43,500. Until now, the closest Jewish resources (synagogues, shopping and Jewish schools) have been in Richmond Hill, about 10 minutes away. Also, there is a Reform congregation, Or Hadash, in Newmarket, which is just north of Aurora and has a Jewish population of 740.

Chabad Aurora's inaugural event took place on Yom Kippur – services at Aurora's Howard Johnson Hotel, followed by a breaking of the fast with refreshments supplied by the Hechts. Thirty people attended.

Since then, they have had a sukkah on wheels, a Chanukah menorah-lighting at the Aurora Shopping Centre, and a Chanukah party at the town hall, attended by 80 people. Most recently, they had a Purim program featuring a children's entertainer, with almost 100 people in attendance. They are working toward starting weekly Shabbat services and setting up a website.

Chabad Aurora now has a mailing list of 150 families, and the Hechts have found two Jewish families on their street.

The young couple – he is 26, she is 23 – aim, for the most part, to serve unaffiliated Jews in Aurora, Newmarket and Oak Ridges.

"My goal is to reach out to every single Jew in the area and cater to their needs," said the rabbi. "What we want is to build a full-fledged [Jewish] community centre for the northern area." Recently he began to volunteer his time as a chaplain at the South Lake Regional Hospital in Newmarket.

"We work as a couple," said the rabbi, who spent a year teaching at the United Lubavitcher Yeshiva (the Lubavitch high school in Brooklyn, N.Y.) before moving to Toronto last year. Before that, he was a Kolel student in New York, following his marriage in July 2002.

He has continued teaching here through Chabad, and is offering weekly classes in Talmud, the Tanya (much of which is based on kabbalistic writings) and Mishnayot. Sara is planning to start a monthly women's group.

Unlike her New York-born husband, Sara is a native of Thornhill, Ont. Her father, Rabbi Zalman Ahron Grosbaum, is executive vice-president of Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario.

Rabbi Yossi Hecht and his wife Sara.
[Frances Kraft photo]

Rabbi Hecht's maternal grandfather, Rabbi Chaim Gutnick, was chair of the rabbinical council of Victoria, Australia for some 30 years until his death in 2003. He also comes from a line of rabbis on his father's side.

"Today there are many emissaries – young couples like us – moving out to growing communities and catering to the families in those areas, bringing them the warmth, beauty and joy of Judaism in every way," said the rabbi. Their work is inspired by the late rebbe, he said. "That's what motivates us and keeps us going."

When Sara's father moved to Thornhill about 30 years ago, the Jewish population there was also sparse, she noted.

Now, Rabbi Hecht noted, Thornhill is served by three Lubavitch centres: on Bathurst Street at Chabad Gate and north at Chabad Flamingo, as well as Chabad Lubavitch of Markham. In addition, there is Chabad of Richmond Hill just to the north, and the area has Reform, Conservative and Orthodox congregations, as well as a wide variety of Jewish schools and shops.

In his new neighbourhood, Rabbi Hecht sees the biggest need as family programming and education "so the tradition will continue."

And what about the Hechts' own needs as observant Jews, in an area without established Jewish services? "It's hard in a way," said Rabbi Hecht. "It's a sacrifice to help another. Not always can I pray with a minyan, but down the line we hope that will all come together. In the long run [the new endeavour] could bring much more benefit to myself and the community."

Forgotten artist emerges from the mists of time

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For Howard Barr, Henryk (Henoch) Barczynski is no longer just a distant relative obscured by the mists of time.

Since his father's death three years ago, Barr has learned that his great-uncle was an up-and-coming painter, graphic artist and illustrator who was cut down in his prime during the Holocaust.

Having spent hundreds of hours on the Internet researching him, Barr has discovered that Barczynski, a Polish Jew, was an accomplished figure whose paintings and drawings were exhibited in Lodz, Warsaw, Berlin, Dresden, New York and Tel Aviv.

"He was part of a hip, edgy group of Expressionist artists known as Young Yiddish," said Barr, a 43-year old local hairdresser who owns two of his works.

Howard Barr

And as Barr pointed out, he was eulogized by Itzhak Katznelson in his immortal epic of the Holocaust, Poem of the Murdered Jewish People.

Katznelson (1886-1944), a poet, dramatist and educator who lived in Lodz, knew Barczynski well. Once, they posed for a photograph.

"He is much forgotten today," said Barr, referring to his great-uncle. "But I'd like to find out more about him."

Barr, who bears Barczynski's Hebrew name, originally learned about him from his father, Jacob Leopold, a clothing designer and artist whose parents hailed from Lodz, Poland.

"We never discussed him much, and now I regret it," said Barr, whose Polish surname was anglicized by his father in 1966. But after Jacob Leopold passed away, Barr delved into the family tree and fleshed out Barczynski's life.

Born in 1896 in Lodz, an industrial city with a substantial Jewish population, Barczynski was the son of Szmul – a tailor – and Sura.

After completing his education in Lodz and Warsaw, he studied at the Dresden Academy of Fine Arts and apprenticed with Otto Gusmann and Robert Steroa.

Also influenced by Marc Chagall and Oscar Kokoschka, Barczynski specialized in portraits, particularly of Polish Jews.

There are three versions of his untimely death, all unsubstantiated.

He was murdered by German soldiers in 1939, shortly after Germany's invasion of Poland.

He died in 1941.

He was killed in Auschwitz in 1944.

Whatever the circumstances of his demise, one fact remains undisputed – most of Barczynski's paintings and drawings were lost during the war.

Some may have been destroyed in February 1945, when American and British aircraft bombed Dresden in devastating air raids, Barr speculated.

Miraculously, a handful of his works survived and can be found in the Museum of Art in Lodz, which Barr has yet to visit; the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw; the Fine Art Museum in Ein Harod, and the Israel Museum in Jerusalem.

Barr has two – a painting, Blind Musicians, and a drawing, Portrait of a Woman, both finished in Dresden in the mid-1920s.

"It's amazing I have two pictures done by this man," he said with proprietary pride. "They're as fresh as a daisy."

They were acquired by his in-laws, Harvey and Cathy Strosberg, last October, for $5,000.

Barr, who has resided in Toronto for the past five years, is a native of London, England. Prior to settling in Canada, he lived in Los Angeles and New York City.

Portrait of a Woman

Barr's father, who personally knew Barczynski, was born in Darmstadt, Germany. Along with some 15,000 other Polish Jews in Nazi Germany, he was expelled in the autumn of 1938.

The expulsion is rife with historical significance.

In retaliation, a young German Jew of Polish extraction named Herschel Grynszpan assassinated the third secretary of the German Embassy in Paris.

The Nazis used the assassination as a pretext to launch Kristallnacht, a prelude to the Holocaust, on Nov. 9, 1938.

Barr's family managed to escape to Britain, but many Polish Jews were not so fortunate.

Barczynski was one of the unlucky ones.

Readers can contact Barr by e-mail at hbarr@howardbarr.com.

It's just around the corner, but it will show the world how far you've come.

Canadian puppies to aid the blind in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Golden Retrievers are an adaptable, friendly and gentle breed of dog, recognized as very people-oriented. Labrador Retrievers are affectionate, lovable and patient, known for their intelligence, loyalty and good-natured reliability. Bring them together under the right circumstances, ply them with drinks and puppy chow, and a few months later you have a mixed breed that is ideal for training as a guide dog for the blind.

Currently, in Toronto, two mixed-breed puppies are being cared for by Jewish families as the animals prepare to make aliyah to Israel. The two puppies are destined for the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind (www.israelguidedog.org) where, beginning at age one, they will undergo extensive training in Hebrew to develop them into reliable Seeing Eye dogs.

Unfortunately, Israel has more than its fair share of sight-impaired individuals. In addition to people who have lost their vision through disease or accident, or who were born blind, there are many who have lost their sight in terrorist attacks or while on military duty.

Noach Braun is director and one of the founders of the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind, a non-profit organization that is Israel's main supplier of Seeing Eye dogs. Since only eight per cent of the agency's $1 million (US) budget comes from the Israeli government, finding voluntary support from abroad is an important part of the organization's work. In this case, both of the puppies sojourning in Toronto were donated by the Ottawa-based Canadian Guide Dogs for the Blind.

The Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind, located in Beit Oved, a 20-minute drive south of Tel Aviv near Rishon LeZion, has provided guide dogs to more than 230 people since its inception in 1991, said Braun, 44, by phone from Israel.

Currently, 20 to 24 dogs are trained annually, but with the completion of new facilities expected soon, that number could jump to 60 a year. The Guide Dog Center includes a health and reproduction centre, funded by Charles and Andrea Bronfman, in which dogs are bred domestically, thereby reducing the need to import them from places like Canada, Braun said.

Canada is new as a supporter for the Beit Oved centre, as most of its foreign support originates in the United States and Britain. The centre employs a staff of 16 but relies in large part on the efforts of volunteers to raise public awareness for the need for guide dogs, Braun said.

Leah Charney and guide dog Lacie

Morris Samson, a Toronto-based veterinarian and a frequent visitor to Israel, is largely responsible for forging the link between Braun's facility and Canada.

Following a visit to Israel, he returned to Canada determined to establish a charitable foundation that could issue tax deductible receipts for donations to the Israeli Guide Dog Center. It took him a year and a half to do this, but recently the Foundation for Canine Companions to the Blind was registered in Ottawa.

The foundation is still in its early stages, Samson said, and "we're in desperate need of help, of networking and getting the name out there."

Samson believes Canadians will back the support group with relish. Working and companion dogs "become people's lives. They become people's eyes," he said.

"Jewish people don't know too much about how great dogs are for peoples' lives, and these dogs are phenomenal," he said.

Illustrating the point, Braun told the story about one of the people whose life was changed by a guide dog. Benjamin Kapag, a widower who lost his eyes to disease around the same time his wife died, was bereft until he received his dog.

Kapag now says, "When I walk with my dog, not only does he give me a pair of eyes, but a pair of wings, and I fly from street to street. Sometimes I don't feel I'm blind," Braun related.

Eli Rubenstein, who is instrumental in aiding the guide dog project in Canada, used his contacts in Toronto to find the two puppies temporary homes prior to their trip to Israel. Hundreds of families volunteered to help, he said.

Rubenstein, a UIA staffer who arranges March of the Living trips to Europe and Israel, suggests the origin of the Hebrew name for dog, kelev, may come from two words, kol lev, all heart. "That indicates the character of the dog," he said.

Rubenstein said guide dogs can be taught 40 to 50 commands in Hebrew. What's more, a fully trained guide dog makes its user feel independent, which is the highest form of tzedakah (charity).

"When you combine love of dogs with love of Israel and helping blind people, the [satisfaction] you get from that gives no better feeling," Samson added.

The delusion that Iran means no harm

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In its editorial, "Letting Iran get away with murder" (April 2), the National Post expressed outrage over new revelations about the torture and murder two years ago of Canadian photojournalist Zahra Kazemi at the hands of Iranian security forces and the subsequent Iranian cover-up of the crime. The paper called on Ottawa to impose sanctions on Iran and to "encourage our allies to do likewise."

The Post continued: "Toward that end, we should take full advantage of every opportunity to embarrass Iran at the UN and other international force... If nothing else, we should ensure that by the end of our efforts, other countries' policies on Iran are informed by their knowledge of just how barbarically it treated an innocent foreign journalist."

The Post's outrage was widely reflected in Canadian media circles, revealing a strong appreciation for the sort of regime that is firmly ensconced in Tehran – a regime apparently impervious to diplomatic suasion about the need to conform to the most elemental respect for human rights.

But this appreciation apparently was not shared by some senior bureaucrats in Ottawa.

On April 1, CBC Radio's Evan Dyer reported that an Iranian customs official, Nasser Najafi, had been granted the right to visit the computer site of Canada Customs a week after Canada had recalled its ambassador to Iran. Dyer said: "In dozens of [Department of Foreign Affairs] e-mails, there's no mention of Zahra Kazemi and no one questions why Canada should help a brutal police state improve its technology of control. Iran asked that Najafi be briefed on the workings of Canada's new Advanced Passenger Information database, designed to identify potential threats to civil aircraft before they board. Yet no one asked why a government with a known track record of sponsoring terrorist attacks might want such information."

What's revealed in these reports is the same problem faced by Israel as it confronts Iran's nuclear arms program – a realization by some that a real threat exists, and a total lack of such awareness by others.

A regime that has no compunction about torturing and murdering an Iranian-Canadian journalist and then denying a crime had ever been committed should be taken seriously when it openly promises a similar fate for Israelis, which it vilifies. Yet some Western journalists insist that Iran actually means no harm, that it is only acting to protect its national interests against "aggressor" nations such as the United States and Israel.

That, for instance, is the message of Stephen Kinzer, a correspondent for the New York Times, in his essay, "Clouds Over Iran" (New York Review of Books, March 29). Kinzer wrote: "Caught up in its contempt for the idea of negotiated compromise, the Bush administration seems unable to concede that Iran, like every other country, has legitimate concerns about threats to its economic and political security. Its most potent enemy in the world, the United States, and its most potent enemy in the Middle East, Israel, have larger nuclear arsenals."

It will certainly come as news to Israelis that their country, not Iran, is cast in the role of aggressor state. As this column recently argued, Israel can hardly be expected to sit idly by while Iran repeatedly – and without provocation – threatens to destroy it while pursing the capacity to do just that.

Kinzer, however, is determined to assure us that what Iran desires above all else is "stability in the Middle East." For evidence he offers simply this: "President Mohammed Khatami has publicly proclaimed that if Palestinians reach a settlement with Israel, Iran will support it."

This is the same Khatami who has denounced Israel on several occasions. More significantly, he's the very "moderate" president, who, in any event has been proved to be largely irrelevant as extremist, radical mullahs are now firmly in command.

Kinzer's sanguine view of Iran's aims and self-interest appears terribly misplaced, to say the least.

Hebrew never died as a written or spoken language

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Contrary to popular mythology, the renaissance of Hebrew into a modern spoken and written language, after being considered dead for more than 2,000 years, is not due only to the work of Eliezer Ben Yehuda, the first editor of the Hebrew dictionary, Zionism or nationalist sentiments, asserts Menachem Brinker.

In fact, he said, Hebrew never died as a written language, and was spoken by many until the fifth century at least.

Brinker is Henry Crown Professor of modern Hebrew language and literature in the department of Near Eastern languages and civilizations at the University of Chicago and professor emeritus at Hebrew University. In 2004, he was awarded the prestigious Israel Prize in Hebrew literature.

He recently gave the fourth annual Andrea and Charles Bronfman lecture in Israeli studies, at the Bahen Centre for Information Technology at the University of Toronto.

In the second and third centuries, Hebrew was spoken by thousands of Jews living in Palestine, Brinker said. That only changed around the seventh century, with the conquest of the land by Muslim forces.

Outside Palestine, Hebrew was spoken by the elite, especially in prayer and in the study of Torah and Talmud.

"There was never a single time that nothing was being written in Hebrew," said Brinker. This was not just in the religious sphere – there were speeches, letters, anecdotes, poems and romances.

The comparison that is often made between Hebrew and Latin or Greek is not necessarily correct, he went on. "All males knew something of Hebrew, and used it from the synagogue and house of study to the marketplace, even in jokes and puns."

Jewish merchants in places such as France, Germany, Holland and England used Hebrew when writing to other Jewish businessmen "so that they could hide their private affairs from others," Brinker said.

They often had to mingle Hebrew with other languages, especially Spanish and German, when the Hebrew language lacked a particular word. This was for things like vegetables, animals and household items. "They just wrote these words in Hebrew letters," he said.

With the Enlightenment of the 18th century, poets, essayists and novelists wanted to prove that everything that was being written in French, German and Russian could also be expressed in Hebrew. They felt, Brinker said, that if it was seen that their language was as rich as any other, they would be accepted by cultured Europeans.

There was a burst of creativity in Hebrew, including fables, epigrams, didactic plays, biographies, historical poems and psychological novels, Brinker said.

He said that 32 "Jewish languages" had developed, including Jewish Georgian, Ladino and Jewish Bukharian. But with the increasing immigration to Palestine, these languages were mostly lost as people realized the need for a common language to unite those from the more than 100 countries who settled there.

While Yehuda is credited with inventing many modern Hebrew words, Brinker said, many had already been invented and entrenched in everyday use, and many more were invented later, for such things as animals, trees, birds and furniture.

Still, he noted, the modern Hebrew speaker uses many ancient words from the Bible and the Talmud in everyday speech. For instance, he said, when giving a recipe for the ubiquitous Israeli breakfast salad, one uses words from 2,700 years ago together with those invented just a few years ago.

Even so, said Brinker, no one really believed that Hebrew would become the everyday language of the country. It was a conscious, deliberate choice to use it in schools, the postal service and in government.

Proposed implementing newborn gift

He has also proposed, and is working on implementing, something called a newborn gift, intended to create "a reinvigoration of the federations."

The idea, he explained, involves lay people visiting parents of newborns to give them baby gifts from the Jewish community, including a year's free tuition at a Jewish nursery school, and to familiarize them with Jewish resources in their areas. "It's in the offing, [but] this costs real money. I'm working on it."

In November 2003, at the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities in Jerusalem, Steinhardt proposed a $100 million (US) education fund for "transformative" projects.

He said the fund is about to get off the ground.

"I hope before the end of this year it will have some substance, but it will be a while before it has the funding that will make it the powerhouse that I hope it will be... The direction it seems to be heading is to co-ordinate intensively with individual communities toward creating broad-based matching grants, so there is a great deal of community involvement in the choice of projects."

Although he readily admits to having had "moments when my feelings toward [federations] have been less than warm and fuzzy," he said he's come to recognize that federations represent "the centrality of the American Jewish communal world."

By their nature, he said, federations move slowly and are bureaucratic. However, he noted, "within the confines of those constraints, much can be accomplished."

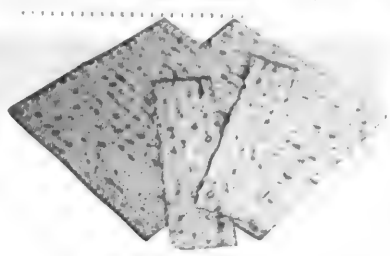
Passover Food Ideas



'Why is this night different from all other nights?'

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

Although I've been attending Passover dinners from the time I was knee-high to a scrupulously set seder table, I've never really thought about how all this storytelling relates to me.

Every year at our seder, we retell the story of Passover – how 5,000 years ago, Moses miraculously led the Jews to freedom from slavery in Pharaoh's Egypt. It's a wonderful story, with heroes to root for and bad guys to rail against. Each year, I cheer Moses on when he begs Pharaoh to "Let my people go." And when Pharaoh says, "no way," I enthusiastically flick 10 drops of wine on my plate and recite each of the horrifying plagues visited upon him in retaliation. I thrill that the Red Sea parts just long enough for the Jews to escape, then miraculously resumes its roar to drown Pharaoh's soldiers, who were hot on their heels to bring them back. And finally, I gloat when they arrive in the desert as free men, for what is more precious than freedom?

The food at Passover is, of course, central to the story. What better way to understand the bitterness of slavery than to taste a herb so harsh it brings tears to your eyes? Or how better to feel the deprivation and misery than to eat matzah, the bread of affliction? Or what about the sweetness of freedom? How better to savour it than with the fruit and honey mixture, charoset. It's all part of experiencing what our ancestors endured. It's all part of the story. But what's the link to my life?

In the Jewish religion, if we have a question, we ask a rabbi. I decided to ask Rabbi Daniel Bouskilla of the Sephardic Temple Tifereth Israel in Los Angeles. As is typical, he answered my question with a question.

"Did you know that by retelling the story of what happened thousands of years ago, it brings us closer together?"

"No," I answered. "How's that?"

As is also typical, he answered my second question with a story.

A friend of his attended a seder dinner that was being led by the patriarch of the family, a Holocaust survivor. Since it was such a sensitive subject, his family had been careful never to ask about his experiences. As he was reciting from the Haggadah, he came to a phrase that commanded fathers to tell their children about their lives, in order to better understand their heritage.

The man turned white, leaned back and was utterly silent for several minutes. Finally, he exclaimed, "I think I have been a bad Jew." Everyone was perplexed. How could this kind, generous, religious man, who was greatly beloved by his family, think he was bad? How was this possible? He heaved a heavy sigh.

"I have never told you what happened to me. I have never shared my experience." And so, on that Passover, he spent several hours relating his painful story, which his children, grandchildren and everyone in attendance would never forget.

Then, I finally realized what the telling of the Passover story means to me. If we liken the exodus from Egypt into the Promised Land – the trip that takes us from bondage to freedom – to our sometimes sweet, sometimes painful journey through life, we realize how similar our lives are to the experiences of our ancestors. So this Passover, I will encourage my parents to tell us their stories and maybe I will tell my children my story and maybe…

For if the point of the seder is to bring everyone closer together, then what more important story could everyone want to hear?

STRACCIATELLA REALE (SPRING SOUP)

From Evan Kleiman, Los Angeles restaurateur

2 leeks, white part only, thinly sliced into rings
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
½ head escarole, washed and thinly sliced
¼ pound baby spinach, well washed and stemmed
2 quarts chicken broth, or as needed
1 bunch small asparagus tips
2 tbsp. Italian parsley, coarsely chopped
4 eggs
4 tbsp. matzah meal
salt and coarsely ground black pepper to taste

In a heavy soup pot, sauté leeks in olive oil until they start to wilt. Add escarole and spinach and stir until coated with oil and beginning to wilt. Add chicken broth to cover. Bring to gentle simmer and cook until greens are tender. Add asparagus tips and half the parsley and continue to simmer.

In small bowl, beat together eggs, matzah meal and remaining parsley. Just before ready to serve, bring soup to rolling boil and pour egg mixture into pot stirring constantly. Adjust seasonings. Serve immediately. Serves 8.

TURKISH CHAROSET

There are as many variations on charoset as there are ways of retelling the Passover story.

2 sweet apples, peeled, cored and chopped
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 cup large golden raisins or sultanas
½ cup white figs, coarsely chopped

¼ cup dried cherries (optional)
½ cup walnuts, shelled and chopped fine
½ cup ground almonds
1 tbsp. lemon zest
1 tbsp. brown sugar or honey
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. ground ginger
pinch of cayenne pepper
2 to 3 tbsp. sweet red Passover wine or more, if necessary

Cover apples with lemon juice in bowl. Chop fruit and nuts by hand, or if you prefer, place in food processor. Stir in zest, sugar and spices, taste and adjust seasonings. Moisten with wine to make thick paste. Serves 6.

MATZAH LASAGNA WITH FRESH TOMATO-BASIL SAUCE
From Evan Kleiman

2 onions, peeled, and thinly sliced extra virgin olive oil for cooking
1 lb. mushrooms, stems trimmed, cut into quarters
4 garlic cloves, peeled and minced
1 bunch fresh Italian parsley, stemmed and coarsely chopped
2 bunches fresh basil, stemmed and coarsely chopped
2 bunches fresh spinach, washed and stemmed
1 box frozen artichoke hearts, defrosted coarse salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
2 boxes of Passover matzah

In large skillet, cook onions in oil until golden brown. Set aside. Sauté mushrooms over high heat, adding garlic, half the parsley and basil to taste. When done, set aside in small bowl. Braise spinach with garlic to taste in olive oil with just the water clinging to the leaves, in a covered pan. When finished, set aside in bowl. Cook artichokes with half the garlic, remaining herbs, oil to taste and a touch of water in small pan until tender. Set aside in bowl.

Fresh Tomato-Basil Sauce
¼ cup extra virgin olive oil
2 garlic cloves, peeled and minced
12 Roma tomatoes, stem end removed and cut into quarters or 1 28-oz. can pear tomatoes in juice
8 large fresh basil leaves
coarse salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste

Heat oil in large skillet over medium heat. Add garlic and sauté just until garlic gives off its characteristic aroma. Add tomatoes and cook over moderately high heat until tomatoes begin to break down and form a sauce. Stir frequently to help the tomatoes begin to break down. Add basil, season with salt and pepper. Continue cooking over moderately high heat, stirring occasionally, until sauce is thick and no longer watery. Remove from heat and put sauce through the medium disk of a food mill.

To Assemble Lasagna

Preheat oven to 375. Cover bottom of baking dish with a ladleful of sauce. Make a layer of matzah that completely covers bottom of pan. Spoon generous ladleful of sauce onto matzah. Using back of a spoon or rubber spatula, spread sauce evenly. Place layer of onions over sauce. Top with half the mushrooms. Again, drizzle with sauce. Make another layer of matzah. Continue layering with cooked vegetables, sauce and matzah until all ingredients are used. Finish with layer of matzah topped with layer of sauce. Cover casserole with aluminum foil. Place in preheated oven and cook 40 minutes or until bubbling hot.

MEDITERRANEAN SPINACH SALAD WITH DRIED APRICOTS AND OLIVES

1 lb. spinach, washed and stemmed
½ cup yellow bell pepper, chopped coarsely
½ cup red or orange bell pepper, chopped coarsely
½ cup Greek olives
½ cup naturally dried apricots (without sulfur) chopped coarsely
¼ cup pine nuts
2 tbsp. Italian parsley, chopped coarsely
2 tbsp. chives, chopped coarsely juice of ½ lemon
1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar

A sweet ending to the seder

3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 tsp. walnut oil
1 tsp. cumin
¼ tsp. cayenne
1 tsp. kosher salt or to taste

Place first 6 ingredients in salad bowl. Pour remaining ingredients in jar. Shake vigorously and pour over salad. Toss gently. Serves 4 to 6.

GATEAU AU CHOCOLAT

Adapted from The Book of Jewish Food and Simca's Cuisine, both Knopf.

½ lb. bittersweet chocolate
4 oz. best quality unsalted margarine
6 egg yolks
½ cup sugar
1 cup ground almonds
6 egg whites
matzah meal for cake pan

Glaze
½ cup slivered blanched almonds
3½ oz. sweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
2 tbsp. brewed strong coffee
3 tbsp. cold unsalted margarine, cut into bits

Preheat oven to 350. Melt chocolate and margarine together in double boiler or small pan placed in larger pan with boiling water. Beat egg yolks with sugar till pale. Add almonds and melted chocolate mixture and mix very well. In separate bowl, beat egg whites until stiff and fold them into mixture. Grease a nonstick 9-inch cake pan, dust with matzah meal. Pour mixture into pan; bake 45 minutes.

To make glaze, spread almonds on a small baking sheet and toast for 7 minutes, until fragrant, in a preheated 350-degree oven. In small saucepan, melt chocolate in coffee over low heat, stirring, just until smooth, about 3 minutes. Remove pan from heat, stir in margarine.

Invert cooled cake onto a serving plate. Using a metal spatula, spread chocolate glaze evenly over top and sides of cake. Arrange toasted nuts in a ring around top of cake and refrigerate for at least 30 minutes to set glaze. Serves 10 to 12.

Cooking can be a family affair

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ettie Benjamin Shuken, a food and tabletop stylist, and a recipe developer, grew up in the kitchen.

"I had a feminine upbringing. My mother had two sisters, and I have two sisters, and when we made a seder at my grandmother's house, I remember everyone cooking. Even my grandfather cooked. Our seders were big and noisy."

Shuken went into the food business professionally after a 20-year career as an interior designer. She took a chef's course at George Brown College and then did freelance foodstyling for several magazines including House and Home and Chatelaine, and with Kraft Foods.

When she was growing up in Brooklyn and then New Jersey, she says everything centred around food. "My mother is from Greece, and my father was originally from Spain and then lived Greece.

"They instilled in me a love of food, and insisted I try everything at least once. My father would make omelettes out of whatever was in the fridge, and have us guess the ingredients. This [passion] for food is ingrained in the Sephardi culture. My family would plan one meal while we were eating another.

"Vegetables were an integral part of our meals. I never knew I wasn't supposed to like them. It's part of the Mediterranean diet. When I visited Spain, I could feel my roots."

Seder meals often consisted of lamb, and there was always a fish course, she says. "We also ate egg and lemon soup. I didn't know about chicken soup and matzah balls until I was much older."

Another favourite dish was eggs cooked with onion skins and coffee grinds. "This hard boiled egg, which is softer than a regular hard boiled egg comes out a beautiful mahogany colour, and it has a lovely taste. This was often served for Shabbat breakfast as well."

Candied fruits, or spoon sweets, were a favourite treat, she says. "They were called spoon sweets because we ate them with a spoon that was dipped in ice water. They could be made of candied orange peel, or prune and walnuts."

Passover Food Ideas

Hard boiled eggs are taken up a notch

Dipping mixture
2 eggs
2 tsp. water

Topping
1 tbsp. Parmesan cheese

Preheat oven to 350. Generously oil an 8- or 9-in. sq. pan. In a medium size bowl, mix spinach, parsley, green onion, cottage cheese, dill, eggs, half the Parmesan cheese, matzah meal and pepper. Set aside.

Prepare two pans: in one put plain warm water, and in the other the two eggs beaten with the water. Dip one or two matzot at a time (depending on the size of the pans) in the water bath. Leave them in for one minute, to soften, then blot on a towel.

Dip softened matzah into the egg wash and place one on the bottom of the prepared baking pan. The second one should be split into three and pressed to sides of the pan. Another piece will also need to be dipped in the same way for the fourth and last side. Empty the spinach mixture into the pan, smoothing the top flat. Cover the pie with another matzah that has been softened and dipped into the egg mixture.

Brush a little oil on the top matzah crust. Bake for 30 minutes. Then sprinkle with the remaining Parmesan cheese. Bake for another 15 to 20 minutes, until the top is brown and the filling looks set. If top is browning too quickly, cover loosely with aluminum foil. It will continue to firm up as it cools. Serve warm. Can be cut when cooled and reheated. Serves 6.

HUEVOS HAMMIMIDOS OVEN EGGS

These are found on the tables of Sephardi and Romaniote Jews (Jews who lived in Greece before Christianity was introduced there). The eggs are included for Sabbath meals and appear on other holidays as well. They are usually made in large quantities and are eaten during the week in salads and garnishes. Originally they were made in an oven, but now they are done on the top of the stove. I loved them so much as a child, that after a Shabbat kiddush in synagogue, I slipped one into my tiny purse. I forgot about it, and weeks later, my mother wondered where this rotten smell was coming from. The purse and the egg were promptly thrown away.

eggs – as many as you want outer skins of red or brown onions, (about 5 handfuls)
1 tbsp. vinegar, red or white
3 tbsp. oil, regular or olive used coffee grounds (about 3 tbsp. to colour the eggs darker – optional)

Have the eggs at room temperature to avoid cracking. Put them into a deep pot (a stock pot is good) with a lid. Add the onion skins and enough water to cover the eggs. Add the vinegar and oil and the grounds if you are using them. Bring to a gentle boil, then lower heat to a simmer. Cover and cook for 5-6 hours.

Check the water level and add water as needed. Cool eggs in cold running water till no longer warm. Polish with a soft cloth and refrigerate. They will be a beautiful mahogany colour and we serve them unpeeled at the table in a bowl. If any crack, they are perfectly edible but should be eaten before the others.

SPINACH LACHAN

This is a custardy-textured pudding that I make all year round. It is a take on the Avgolemono soup (egg-lemon) that the Greeks love.

2 10-oz. packages of frozen chopped spinach, defrosted and squeezed dry or 20 oz. fresh spinach, blanched and chopped
4 cups chicken or turkey broth, well seasoned, and with some of the fat left in the soup
6 large eggs
1/3 cup matzah meal
2 large lemons juiced

Preheat oven to 300. Oil a shallow casserole. Combine spinach and broth in a medium saucepan and cook for a few minutes. In a medium bowl, combine eggs and juice. Add a cup of the warm broth to the mixture to heat the eggs (this prevents the eggs curdling) then add the remaining broth. Stir in the matzah meal and transfer to the casserole.

Bake 45-60 minutes. The edges should look brown and the centre should look set and slightly puffy. Test by inserting a knife in the middle to see if it comes out clean. This can be made earlier in the day and reheated in the oven or microwave.

AUNT JULIE'S CANDIED PRUNES STUFFED WITH WALNUTS

This is one of those confections known as "spoon-sweets."

1 lb. large prunes, pitted walnut halves (1 per prune)
2/3 cup honey
1/3 cup water
3 tbsp. sugar

Stuff prunes with nuts. In a wide saucepan, cook honey, water and sugar. Cook till slightly thickened. Add prunes and simmer gently, spooning the liquid over the prunes. Using two spoons turn prunes carefully. Don't worry about cooking the prunes. When nuts start looking toasted and brown (about 10-15 minutes) remove carefully to a piece of foil or parchment paper. The prunes should look glazed. Let cool before handling.

If you want to use your non-Passover recipes…

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

At some point during Passover, we have all tried to convert a "mainstream" recipe into a Pesach one. I've added some great new substitutions this year, thanks to readers who have sent in their own ingenious creations. If anyone has any other substitutions they would like to share, please let me know at eztlog@hotmail.com and I'll add them to the list for next year.

1 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened chocolate) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1 tbsp. oil or melted margarine

16 oz. semi-sweet chocolate = 6 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1/4 cup oil and 7 tbsp. granulated sugar

14 oz. sweet chocolate (German-type) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 2 2/3 tbsp. oil and 4 1/2 tbsp. granulated sugar

1 cup confectioners' sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar minus 1 tbsp. sugar plus 1 tbsp. potato starch pulsed in a food processor or blender

1 cup sour milk or buttermilk for dairy baking = 1 tbsp. lemon juice in a 1-cup measure, then fill to 1 cup with Passover non-dairy creamer. Stir and steep 5 minutes butter in baking or cooking – use pareve Passover margarine in equal amounts. Use a bit less salt

1 cup honey = 1 1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/4 cup water

1 cup corn syrup = 1 1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/3 cup water, boiled until syrupy

1 cup vanilla sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar with 1 split vanilla bean-left for at least 24 hours in a tightly covered jar

1 cup of flour – substitute 5/8 cup matzah cake meal or potato starch, or a combination sifted together

1 tbsp. flour = 1/2 tbsp. potato starch

1 cup corn starch = 7/8 cup potato starch

1 tsp. cream of tartar= 1 1/2 tsp. lemon juice or 1 1/2 tsp. vinegar

1 cup graham cracker crumbs = 1 cup ground cookies or soup nuts plus 1 tsp. cinnamon

1 cup bread crumbs = 1 cup matzah meal

1 cup matzah meal = 3 matzot ground in a food processor

1 cup matzah cake meal = 1 cup plus 2 tbsp. matzah meal finely ground in a blender or food processor and sifted

3 crumbled matzah = 2 cups matzah farfel

1 cup (8 oz.) cream cheese = 1 cup cottage cheese pureed with 1/2 stick butter or margarine chicken fat or gribenes = 2 caramelized onions. Saute 2 sliced onions in 2 tbsp. oil and 2 tbsp. sugar. Cook until the onions are soft. Puree the onions once they are golden.

1 cup milk (for baking) = 1 cup water plus 2 tbsp. margarine, or 1/2 cup fruit juice plus 1/2 cup water

1 1/4 cup sweetened condensed milk =1 cup instant nonfat dry milk, 2/3 cup sugar, 1/3 cup boiling water and 3 tbsp. margarine. Blend all the ingredients until smooth. To thicken, let set in the refrigerator for 24 hours.

1 cup wine= 13 tbsp. water, 3 tbsp. lemon juice and 1 tbsp. sugar. Mix together and let set for 10 minutes.

for frying: Instead of chicken fat, use combination of olive oil or vegetable oil and 1 to 2 tbsp. pareve Passover margarine.

eggs: Passover egg substitutes don't work quite as well as the chametz egg substitutes. For kugels, matzah balls, fried matzah and some cakes, the recipes will probably be OK. However, if you want to avoid them, you can add one extra egg white and 1/2 tsp. of vegetable oil for each yolk eliminated when baking. Use only egg whites as the dipping to coat and fry meats.

Italian seasoning = 1/4 tsp. each dried oregano leaves, dried marjoram leaves and dried basil leaves plus 1/4 tsp. rubbed dried sage. This can be substituted for 1 1/2 tsp. Italian seasoning.

curry powder = 2 tbsp. ground coriander, 1 tbsp. black pepper, 2 tbsp. red pepper, 2 tbsp. turmeric, 2 tbsp. ground ginger. Makes 2/3 cup.

pancake syrup – use fruit jelly, not jam, and add a little water to thin. I always like to combine the jelly and water in a microwave-safe bowl and heat it gently before I serve it.

seasoned rice wine vinegar = 3 tbsp. white vinegar, plus 1 tbsp. white wine, 1 tbsp. sugar, 1/2 tsp. salt. Mix to combine. Makes 1/4 cup.

flavoured vinegar = lemon juice in cooking or salad, grapefruit juice in salads, wine in marinades water chestnuts – substitute raw jicama orange liqueur – substitute an equal amount of frozen orange juice concentrate

If anyone has any other substitutions they would like to share, please let me know at eztlog@hotmail.com

CHAROSET: Delicious mixture however you make it.

Pan-pals share a virtual feast of sweets for Pesach

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Each year, I ask my foodie friends what they are planning to make for Passover and ask if they would share their favourite Passover dishes with me so that I can share them with you! I believe that sharing recipes with friends from all over the world is a wonderful way to stay connected. I hope you agree. Enjoy this virtual feast of sweets at your Passover table!

My foodie friend Maxine Wolfson lives in Rhode Island and although we are culinarily connected through our love of good recipes, we've only "met" through the Jewish Food list, which has over 1,700 members from all over the world. Wolfson is one of the moderators for this fabulous list and I always enjoy her recipes and stories. (If you don't belong yet, you should – visit their recipe archives at www.jewishfood-list.com)

When I asked Wolfson to share one of her favourite "tried and true" Passover recipes along with a special food memory for our virtual dessert feast, here is what she wrote: "This is the recipe that says 'Passover' to me. Watching my Mom make these macaroons when I was little, helping her when I got older and eating them (and eating them and eating them) were compensation for not being able to eat my favourite candy for a week!

"I've never seen another recipe exactly like these, and when I learned that some folks won't eat matzah that has been dampened during the first seven days of Passover, I substituted potato starch for the matzah cake meal, and found that the texture, while different, was still very good."

She continues, "Before I started making mayonnaise, I never knew what to make with the leftover egg yolks. When my daughter was small, we found a book (only one year, and never again!) with an almond macaroon recipe that uses only egg yolks. It doubles well, so the eight yolks from the first recipe are used in the second recipe. Waste not, want not!"

MAXINE WOLFSON'S COCONUT MACAROONS
Source: her mom

1 lb. coconut
8 egg whites
scant cup sugar
½ cup potato starch (or ¼ cup cake meal and 1/4 cup potato starch) juice and zest of 1 lemon
maraschino cherries or blanched almonds

Brown coconut in 350-degree oven. Stir occasionally so that it does not burn and browns evenly, about 8 to 10 minutes.

Beat egg whites until firm, but not dry. Add the sugar, juice and zest from the lemon. Mix on medium speed until glossy and well-blended.

Fold in cake meal and/or potato starch. Fold in browned coconut. (This just about fills a 4½-qt. bowl).

Drop by the teaspoon onto a well-greased baking sheet. Top with ½ maraschino cherry or blanched almond (see note below). Bake at 400 about 12 minutes, or until lightly browned. Yield: 6 dozen cookies.

Note: To blanch the almonds, pour boiling water over them, wait a few minutes, and then you can just slip them out of the brown skins.

MAXINE WOLFSON'S ALMOND MACAROONS
Source: herself

4 egg yolks
1 cup sugar
2 cups ground almonds (see notes below)

Preheat oven to 350. Beat egg yolks well. Add sugar, and beat until mixture is lemon coloured. Add the ground almonds and mix thoroughly. Chill for one hour in the refrigerator.

Take small pieces of the mixture and shape into small balls. (I used a melon baller, for a ¾-¾-inch diameter cookie). Place the macaroons on a greased baking sheet, 1 inch apart. Top with half an almond. Bake in the oven for 10 minutes. Yield: 50 cookies.

Notes: These cookies spread. You can make up to a triple batch with good results.

Maxine likes to use a hand grinder to powder the almonds because she finds that a food processor seems to turn the nuts into almond butter, rather than a flour-like consistency. (Norene's suggestion: Just add some of the sugar called for in the recipe to the nuts. Then you can grind/chop them as fine as you want without making nut butter! Use on/off turns to start, then process for 20 to 30 seconds, until desired texture is reached.)

Devorah Stone of Victoria, B.C., is an active mom with three children. She is also descended from a long line of great women home cooks. She has published her food articles and recipes in Amateur Chef and Holiday and Seasonal Celebrations. Currently she is working on a cookbook called Who's Afraid of the Kitchen?

Stone wrote, "Passover is a wonderful time to experiment and try new culinary challenges. Who doesn't love ice cream? Here is a simple, delicious recipe for my mother's non-dairy ice cream. It is a wonderful make-ahead dish and is perfect for snacks for the kids."

DEVY STONE'S NON-DAIRY ICE CREAM
Source: her Mom

8 eggs
1 large carton (2 cups) non-dairy whipping cream substitute
2 packages of the pudding of your choice
½ cup Passover pancake syrup

Separate the eggs. Place the egg yolks in a large mixing bowl. Don't stir them. Set the egg whites aside.

Whip up the non-dairy whipping cream at low speed; add one egg yolk at a time, blending well. Stir in pudding and syrup.

Whip up the egg whites until stiff peaks appear. Gently fold in egg yolk-pudding mixture. Place mixture in a large container and freeze. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Note: This recipe uses raw eggs and should not be eaten by people with a compromised immune system.

Last stop on the "virtual feast of sweets" is at my kitchen in Toronto. Chocolate Matzah Bark is one of my very favourite Passover recipes. This is absolutely addictive and definitely not for those following a low-carb or low-fat diet!

Matzah Bark has become the newest signature recipe for Passover for many families. The original recipe was made using either graham wafers or soda crackers. I know that you will love this Passover version – matzah never tasted so good! I have often made this recipe for my Passover cooking demonstrations and it is gobbled up in moments.

Note: If you have family members with nut allergies, you can substitute Passover cheerio-style cereal for the pecans or almonds. This substitution is also ideal for a nut-free version of charoset. Enjoy…

NORENE'S CHOCOLATE MATZAH BARK
Source: The Food Processor Bible (Whitecap)

6 matzahs
1 cup pecans or almonds
12 oz. bittersweet chocolate (or 2 cups chocolate chips)
1 cup unsalted butter or margarine
1¼ cups brown sugar, firmly packed

Preheat oven to 350. Line a 12 x 18-inch jelly roll pan completely with aluminum foil. Spray foil very well with nonstick spray. Arrange matzahs in a single layer, breaking pieces to fit.

Steel Blade: Process nuts with several quick on/off pulses, until coarsely chopped. Remove from bowl and set aside. If using bittersweet chocolate, chop with quick on/off pulses, then let processor run until chopped, 25 to 30 seconds. (Omit this step if using chocolate chips.)

Melt butter or margarine in a 2-quart saucepan. Stir in brown sugar and bring to a boil. Reduce heat to medium and boil 2 to 3 minutes, stirring constantly. Carefully pour mixture over matzahs.

Bake for 10 minutes. Remove from oven and sprinkle evenly with chocolate. Return pan to oven for 3 to 4 minutes to melt chocolate. Remove from oven and spread chocolate evenly over matzahs with a spatula. Sprinkle with nuts.

When cool, place in freezer or refrigerator until chocolate has set. Cut or break into pieces. Store in airtight container in refrigerator.

Makes 25 to 30 servings, or probably less, because once you taste this, you can't stop! Freezes well (if you are fast enough).

Passover Food Ideas

An alternative to gefilte fish

By JOSIE AARONSON-GELB
Special to The CJN

There is nothing some American children dread more during the seder meal than the moment when the gefilte fish, slimy jelly clinging to it, is brought to the table.

Perhaps this isn't true in a home where a nice bubbie has spent all day turning pulverized pike into savoury gefilte fish balls. Perhaps in a household like that there is a standing ovation when the fish appears on the plate.

Most of us, however, find our gefilte fish in jars stacked in kosher food aisles across the country. To compound the matter, modern American children raised on fish sticks are not interested in eating anything that tastes like it once (gasp) lived in water. Thus the Passover dilemma: how to keep culinary complaints down to a bare minimum during the traditional seder, when, let's face it, there are already a lot of strange new foods being passed around.

Gefilte fish used to be a treat, a rare delicacy. It was created when the Jews first migrated to eastern Europe and found that fresh fish was expensive and not easily accessible.

Because the Talmud suggests that eating fish for Sabbath dinner and on holidays is a good idea, Jewish families had to scramble to make a single fish stretch enough for everyone to enjoy. Always resourceful, Jewish mothers did what Jewish mothers have been doing for centuries: they made do. Mash-mash went the pike (or cod or whitefish). Blend-blend went the matzah crumbs, crack-crack went the eggs and, as Emeril would say, "Bam," gefilte fish was born.

If you still want to eat fish during the Passover holiday and you're dealing with children and reluctant adults, I suggest deception. Serve up these Pesach "fish 'n' chips." You'll be the most popular cook in the kitchen.

PESACH 'FISH 'N' CHIPS' WITH HORSERADISH SOUR CREAM

½ lb. centre-cut skinless boneless salt cod (available in the frozen section of your local grocery)
1 cup matzah meal
1 lb. russet potatoes (about 1 large potato)
black pepper
½+ cup oil
½ cup sour cream
2 tsp. prepared horseradish
1 tbsp. lemon juice

Two days before you want to cook, defrost the salt cod and cut into ½-in. pieces. Cover the salt cod with cold water, wrap in plastic wrap and soak in the refrigerator. Change the water 2 times during the course of the soaking. This process removes some of the salt from the fish.

When ready to cook, drain the water from the cod. Toss the cod in a bowl with ¼ cups of matzah meal. Each piece of cod should be completely coated with meal. Peel the russet potato(es) and shred through the large round holes of a cheese grater. Immediately remove all extra water from the potatoes by grabbing handfuls of the shredded potatoes and squeezing them in a colander placed in the sink.

In a mixing bowl, beat one egg with a fork. Fold in the shredded potatoes and stir to coat. Add black pepper to taste and ¼ cup of the remaining matzah meal. Gently fold the matzah-coated cod into the shredded potatoes. Do NOT add any additional salt to the potatoes – the salt-cod is salty enough on its own.

Heat a large 12-in. skillet and add oil. When oil is very hot, add ¼-cup portions of potato mixture to the pan and press down lightly with a spatula to make a thick, round pancake. Cook undisturbed for 3-4 minutes until the bottom of the pancakes turn a deep golden brown. Flip the pancakes and cook an additional 2-3 minutes. As the oil gets hotter, the pancakes will cook more quickly so keep a constant eye on the stove. Working in batches, fry up all the Fish N' Chip mixture, adding oil as needed.

To make the horseradish sour cream sauce, whisk together sour cream, horseradish and lemon juice. Serves 5 as an appetizer.

COR products and recipes

The following products and services are under Passover supervision of the rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth of Toronto when bearing a COR "Kosher for Passover" label.

The Kashruth Council of Canada would like to advise that its policy is not to use any ingredients for Pesach that are made from kitnyos shanishtana (corn-based). However, many of the acceptable kashrut agencies do allow its use. Some of those that allow its use include the CRC (Chicago) and the OU (Orthodox Union). The following organizations do not use kitnyos shanishtana: KOF-K; KAJ (only the Migdal, HaOlam and Glicks retail labels); Star-K, CRC (Hisachdus Harabonim); MK (except in Diet Coke); OK Labs (except as indicated on product labels); and products supervised by the Nirbater Rav and the Volover Rav.

Baked goods — Hermes Bakery; Sobeys (Clark store); Sweet York Desserts; The Real Canadian Superstore (Dufferin and Steeles).

Soft drinks — Coca-Cola Classic. Note: The Kashruth Ontario Sephardim (KOS) has approved Diet Coke, which contains aspartame (kitnyos derived), for use by the Sephardi community.

Fruit salad, frozen ice desserts — Marcee's Sweets: Sorbets, Cholev Yisroel Ice Cream.

Honey and sugar — Billy Bee Honey Products Ltd.; Redpath Sugar.

Nuts, dried fruit, fresh vegetables — Parnoosh Dates; Royal Nuts, variety of nuts.

Salt — The Canadian Salt Company Ltd. (Windsor Salt); Sifto Canada Inc.

Dairy products — Cheese Lovers Hard Cheeses; Great Canadian Hard Cheeses; Kofman-Barenholtz Foods: Galilee Hard Cheeses; Lana Brand: Cream Cheese, Cottage Cheeses; Mandels Brand: Light Cream Cheese; Neilson: Milk; Western Creamery: Maslanka Buttermilk, Pressed Cottage Cheeses; Cream Cheeses: (Regular, with green onions, Light and Bakers); Sour Cream, Yoggi, Yogurt.

Pickled and marinated products — Feature Foods International Inc.; Harry's Herring; Strub Brothers Ltd.

Fish products — Central Epicure: Chopped Fish, all regular fresh and smoked fish; Feature Foods International Inc.; Kol Yam Fisheries; Niagara Smoked Fish; Strub Brothers Ltd.

Fish markets — Friedmans Fresh Fish, 3019 Bathurst St.; Sobeys (Clark), 441 Clark Ave. W.

Caterers and take-out foods — Beth Sholom, GMB Culinary Productions; Beth Tzedec, Caterers York Ltd.; Lodzer Holocaust Congregation, Rose Lazar Catering; Ely's Fine Foods; Hartman's Kosher Meats; Perl's Meat Products Ltd.; L'Echaim Caterers; Sobeys (Clark store); The Real Canadian Superstore (Dufferin and Steeles); Toronto Kosher; Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers, 1895 Leslie St.

Butcher shops, poultry and delicatessen products — The butcher shops listed below conform with the rigid specifications and kashrut requirements set by the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth. The Kashruth Council is the only supervisory organization to extend its services to chain store supermarkets. This provides additional sources of meat supply for the consumer.

Hartman's Kosher Meats, 5988 Bathurst St.; Perl's Meat Products, 3015 Bathurst St.; Perl's Meat Products, 7700 Bathurst St.; Sobeys (Clark), 441 Clark Ave. W.; The Real Canadian Superstore, Dufferin and Steeles; Toronto Kosher, 3459 Bathurst St.

Meat/poultry wholesale services — Chai Kosher Poultry Inc., COR; Fleisch Meat Processors Inc., COR; Lazar Yitzchok, COR; Shefa Meats and Delicatessan, COR; Empire Frozen Poultry.

Poultry must undergo shchitah and inspection before the metal tag – kosher symbol (plombe), is attached to each bird. This required seal of ritual slaughter, as well as a kashrut certificate, guarantees the observance of the laws of Kashruth.

Kosher food and novelty stores — Balloon Bash, 7241 Bathurst St.; Baskets n Stuf, 6237 Bathurst St.; Baskets 'n Sweets, 2807 Bathurst St.; Chocolate Charm, 3541 Bathurst St.; Kosher & Natural The Candy Man, 3413 Bathurst St.; Kosher City Plus, 3468 Bathurst St.; Kosher Food Warehouse, 75 Doncaster Ave.; Praline Chocolate Creations, 1118 Centre St. #5; The Chocolate Moose, 2839 Bathurst St.; The Kosher Grocer, 3041 Bathurst St.

Airline meals — All meals served on the airlines during Pesach are specially sealed and stamped "COR Kosher L'Pesach." Kosher for Passover meals must be requested by your travel agent or airline in advance. Cara Operations; Zuchter Creative Caterers.

Canada a leader in fighting Internet hate: SWC

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Canada is at the forefront of the fight against hate sites on the Web, and the vigilance of Internet service providers here is a key reason, the associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC) says.

"We have held out, and continue to hold out, Canada as a role model… because the Internet community here has been involved in addressing this issue almost from the beginning. Canada is ahead of the curve," Rabbi Abraham Cooper told an April 5 press conference in Ottawa, where the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center released its seventh annual interactive CD ROM "Report on Digital Terrorism and Hate."

"When we identify a problem to one of the companies up here, it doesn't take very long for it to be bumped," the rabbi said. "The Canadian Association of Internet Providers [CAIP] has very strong rules and won't allow this kind of hate material to stay on a Canadian server."

The Friends recognized CAIP president Tom Copeland for his ongoing assistance in finding hate sites and helping to shut them down.

"CAIP and our members are dedicated to combating those abuses… we want to see the Internet used as a vehicle for peace, understanding and tolerance," Copeland told reporters.

Rabbi Cooper noted some differences between Canadian and American approaches to offensive material online.

"When it comes to free speech, Canada and the U.S. have different traditions about where the line is drawn, but in the United States since 9/11, we do get better co-operation [from the authorities] when a website is more directly related to terrorism."

Leo Adler, the Friends' Toronto-based national director, added that "there are very few Canadian-based sites, but we are still a target because there is no frontier for the Internet."

In his demonstration of the CD ROM, Rabbi Cooper noted that in 2004, there was a 25 per cent increase in Internet hate sites.

The SWC electronic report is based on a review of more than 5,000 websites – from every continent and in many languages – that aid and abet terrorism, or promote racial violence, anti-Semitism and xenophobia.

The SWC's task force against hate and terrorism operates in six countries to monitor the Internet for problematic websites and, where possible, shut them down.

"While we don't advocate censorship, we do advocate vigilance," Adler said. "It is important to understand that while the hate groups have not yet succeeded in forming a unified and even more potent international force, this type of propaganda inspires marginal individuals to commit acts they might not otherwise commit."

Ahenakew paints himself as victim during trial

Charged with promoting hatred of Jews

The hate crime trial of David Ahenakew wrapped up in Saskatoon last week, with the former native leader claiming he was the real victim in the case.

Ahenakew also blamed his anti-Semitic outburst in 2002 on the combined effects of diabetes and wine, and he said Canadians should be on trial for their hatred of Indians.

Ahenakew, a former head of the Assembly of First Nations and a member of the Order of Canada, is charged with promoting hatred of Jews. He could face up to six months in jail if convicted.

During his four-day trial Ahenakew did not deny his statements to a meeting of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations and his subsequent clarification to Saskatoon StarPhoenix reporter James Parker.

At the December 2002 meeting, Ahenakew praised Hitler and when asked by Parker to clarify his remarks, he called Jews "a disease" and said, "That's how Hitler came in. He was going to make damn sure the Jews didn't take over Germany and Europe. That's why he fried six million of those guys, you know. Jews would have owned the goddamned world."

Ahenakew said in hindsight he should never have made the comments he did about Jews.

"I'm sorry for what I said. I won't do it again unless I am absolutely forced to," he told Saskatchewan Provincial Court under questioning from his lawyer Doug Christie.

Ahenakew, 71, said he did not intend to promote hate – an essential element in the crime – and that he made the comments because he was tired, angry and had recently changed his diabetes medication. That effect was compounded by two glasses of wine he drank the night before, he said.

Nevertheless, he also told the court that he continued to stand behind his view about Jews. He said Germans and Canadian soldiers returning from Europe told him Jews had started World War II and that they would eventually own the world. "I didn't think I said anything wrong in my speech," he stated.

When questioned further by Christie on his statement, he said he didn't really know what he believed any more.

Later, under cross-examination by Crown prosecutor Brent Klause, Ahenakew was asked whether he was sorry Holocaust survivors may have been offended by his remarks.

"I am a holocaust victim," Ahenakew snapped back. "We lost over 100 million people over the last 500 years."

He also told the court that "thousands of other Canadians should be on trial for similar charges because of their hatred toward Indians."

At another point in the trial, Ahenakew said he never thought his comments to 300 native leaders would be distributed beyond the meeting.

Christie, who has represented Holocaust-deniers Ernst Zundel and Jim Keegstra, argued the reporter's tape of the interview should be inadmissible as Ahenakew's remarks were delivered in a private setting.

Judge Marty Irwin rejected that argument and allowed the videotape of Ahenakew's speech and the reporter's audio tape to be played in court.

During a sometimes tense cross-examination of Parker, Christie suggested the reporter was trying to become famous by publishing Ahenakew's remarks.

"I was gathering news," Parker responded. "I wanted people to know that Ahenakew endorsed the Holocaust. These are exceptional comments. These are extreme comments."

Judge Irwin is expected to announce a decision on June 1.

Ancient Jewish texts full of detail

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Despite the apparently popular belief that ancient Jewish printed books are simple, there are plenty of neat, aesthetic details, and interesting designs to appreciate, an internationally celebrated bibliographer and historian recently said.

Brad Sabin Hill, dean and senior research librarian, YIVO Institute for Jewish Research, New York, and the former curator (1979 to 1989) of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection of rare Hebraica and Judaica, spoke to 100 people gathered at the National Library of Canada.

He guided listeners through the centuries after the introduction of Hebrew typography in Italy in 1470, and highlighted key elements in the books, such as the lack of pictures. In a prepared speech, he said many 18th and 19th century Jewish books are also printed on bluish colour pages, with, as an odd colour clash, red ink for the characters.

"By using red ink, it enhanced the aesthetic look of the book," Sabine Hill told The CJN in an exclusive interview following his speech. "Bluish paper was low quality made from bits of rags."

However, regardless of the colour of the pages or the ink, he said Jewish people loved to read. "It was the text of the book that seemed to be of most interest to people who acquired them," he said, perhaps as a reason why there were no pictures in ancient Jewish books.

Sabin Hill, a former graduate student at McGill University, who speaks five languages (Hebrew, German, Yiddish, English and French), shared personal stories from his travels through eastern Europe where he has collected and researched his craft.

In Slovakia, he said, he met one of the last Jews in Bardjov, the city where by coincidence, Jacob M. Lowy was born.

The man was a butcher, and told Sabine Hill that he had seen a book printed on animal skin.

"I had never met someone who recognized a book printed on vellum [animal skin], purely because he was a butcher," Sabine Hill said with a laugh.

Following his remarks, Sabine Hill displayed dozens of slides on a large screen. All the images offered visual examples of the books he had referenced.

One slide showed one of the first printed Hebrew books with the Hebrew letters arranged in the shape of a goblet. Others images showed books with a "censor stamp" on them, meaning that they were approved by the local government at the time.

"It was lovely to have him back in Ottawa and was quite the moving experience," said current Jacob M. Lowy Collection curator Cheryl Jaffee.

This lecture was sponsored by the Council of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection and Library and Archives of Canada. The Lowy collection consists of old and rare Hebraica and Judaica comprising 4000 volumes from the 15th to the 20th century, including 34 Hebrew and Latin incunabula.

Israel, Canada firm up industrial ties

In Ottawa, Olmert and David Emerson, Canada's industry minister, signed a joint declaration at a ceremony on Parliament Hill recommitting both governments to support the mandate of CIIRDF for another five years.

Jim Peterson, minister of international trade, will co-sign the agreement at a later date.

It was the second time Ottawa and Jerusalem renewed their obligations to the foundation, which promotes joint business-led research and development partnerships between the nations.

Started up for $1 million a year over its first three years, CIIRDF represents a major success story in bilateral relations between Canada and Israel, on par with the free trade deal between the two countries that came into force in 1997.

Two-way trade between Israel and Canada now stands at about $1 billion a year.

In its decade of operation, CIIRDF has considered more than 70 project applications, of which nearly 40 have been approved for funding, resulting in a commitment of about $15 million.

Of the 15 completed projects, 10 have resulted in commercialization. Seven of these have returned royalty payments to CIIRDF totalling almost $1 million.

The joint projects centre mainly on biotechnology, drug research, telecommunications and other high-tech sectors.

Ephraim Shoham, Israel's trade commissioner in Canada, told The CJN that research done by Canada shows Canadian companies have benefited from the foundation to the tune of $700 million.

In a statement, Olmert said CIIRDF is "an excellent example of how two countries, while geographically distant, can work together to achieve shared objectives."

In an attempt to branch out, Israeli officials are now seeking side agreements with provinces, Shoham said.

Now that Ontario is on board, "we are looking at Quebec and its specialty in nanotechnology, and [at] biotechnology in British Columbia."

The deal with Ontario, funded by $1 million from each side, is expected to generate programs worth up to $1 million a year for both parties, Shoham said. The goal is to establish four new projects a year over the life of the commitment.

A seven-person Ontario-Israel Monitoring Committee will keep track of progress and strategy.

"The objective is to increase levels of R&D with Israeli companies and to put emphasis on whatever Ontario and Israel have in common," Shoham said.

While in Ottawa, Olmert, a former mayor of Jerusalem, met with several key cabinet members, including Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler and Senator Jack Austin, leader of the government in the Senate.

According to Shoham, Pettigrew "expressed his support for Israel very clearly and said he would do everything he can to support [Israel's] disengagement [from Gaza]."

Emerson agreed to visit Israel later this year with representatives of Canadian industry, Shoham added.

Also while in Toronto, Olmert was the keynote speaker at an event to help raise funds for the construction of Aleh Negev, a new rehabilitative centre in Israel for adults with special needs.

As well, he was guest speaker at a book launch at a Chapter's store, where he appeared alongside Heather Reisman, CEO of Indigo Books, Marc Gold, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, and Mark Waldman, who heads the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy public affairs committee (CIJA-PAC).

The reception marked the launch of Israel in the World: Changing Lives Through Innovation by Israeli journalists Helen Davis and Douglas Davis.

ON THE SLOPES: Aubrey Kauffman, left, Ryan Kornblum, centre, and Lee Grunberg were among the more than 120 participants who enjoyed "On the Slopes," a fun-filled day at Alpine Ski Club in Collingwood, Ont. The 8th annual event, which benefited the Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Israel, netted a record-breaking $45,000 in support of the hospital's Wilf Woman and Infant Center. The event, put on by the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, was sponsored by long-time contributors BMO Bank of Montreal and Fabricland Canada.

CBC host leads Nobel effort for Cohen

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – What began as "a bit of a joke" – the nomination of Leonard Cohen for the Nobel Prize in literature – is starting to look like a serious campaign after the Blue Metropolis International Literary Festival.

Paul Kennedy, host of the CBC Radio program Ideas, formally launched what he hopes will become a groundswell of support for the Montreal-born poet, songwriter, novelist and singer-songwriter taking his place besides the likes of Rudyard Kipling, William Butler Yeats and T.S. Eliot.

Support for Cohen's nomination was declared unanimous by Kennedy after a show of hands among the large audience at a April 2 evening session at the festival titled "A Nobel for Leonard."

Kennedy said he has not spoken to Cohen, but that won't stop him from making a submission to the Nobel committee in Stockholm.

Obituary

Bronfman remembered as a philanthropist

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Edward Maurice Bronfman – along with his late brother Peter – built one of Canada's greatest business empires, with holdings that, at one time or another, included Labatt Breweries, the Montreal Canadiens, Trizec Corp., MacMillan Bloedel, London Life and Noranda Inc.

But at his funeral last week at the Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal, Bronfman family and friends recalled him as a shy and endearing man who would be remembered far more for his innate decency and devotion to family than for any formidable prowess as a financier.

He died in his Toronto home at age 77, following a five-year battle with colon cancer.

"The Edward I knew was quiet, unassuming, kind, gentle and self-effacing," said Toronto lawyer Donald Carr, a good friend.

Despite his wealth, "he was never motivated by greed," Carr said. He noted that Bronfman, one of the country's leading philanthropists, often gave financial support to "non-glamorous" causes discreetly, out of his sense of tikkun olam – saving the world.

Those causes included supporting the work of Carr's wife, Judy Feld Carr, who over 25 years starting in 1970, got some 3,000 Jews out of Syria.

Bronfman's eldest son, Paul – one of several children and grandchildren who spoke at the funeral – summed up his late father as "a gentleman and a mensch" and as a "people person."

His family, he and others said, was Bronfman's only real concern. He died just days after the bar mitzvah of Andrew, one of his seven beloved grandchildren.

Hundreds gathered in the congregation's sanctuary to bid farewell and pay tribute to Bronfman.

Among them were his first cousins, Edgar, the president of World Jewish Congress, and Charles, head of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies. Both were pallbearers.

During the 1960s, Edward and Peter left the liquor-distilling "Seagram side" of the family business run by Edgar and Charles' father, Samuel, who was the brother of Edward and Peter's father, Allan. Edward and Peter then formed their own company named after themselves and set up by their father – Edper Investments Ltd. – and built a vast business empire of 100 companies worth $100 billion in 1992, 10 per cent of the Toronto Stock Exchange's value.

An avid outdoorsman and hockey fan, Bronfman owned the Montreal Canadiens for seven years during the 1970s, when the team won four Stanley Cup championships.

Later, Bronfman financially supported construction of the Canada Centre in Metulla, Israel, which houses Israel's national hockey team. That was but one of the many philanthropic endeavours Bronfman focused on increasingly, starting in the late 1980s.

He was also a long-standing supporter of the Maccabi sports movement, noted Maccabi Canada vice-president Sidney Greenberg. "He loved sports, he loved Israel and he was always a supporter of Maccabi Canada because we brought kids to Israel through sports."

He supported the Jewish General Hospital – founded by his father Allan in 1934 – and founded the Edward Bronfman Family Foundation, which financed construction of a facility for multiple sclerosis research at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital (Paul Bronfman has MS).

Bronfman also served as director of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and supported numerous other Jewish and non-Jewish causes.

The senior rabbi of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto, Baruch Friedman-Kohl, described Bronfman as a "good, gracious and gentle soul" who did not fear his imminent demise.

Bronfman was survived by wife Marsha, sons Paul, David and Brian, stepdaughter Lisa and seven grandchildren.

Wilde, wonderful, and Kosher for Passover: new pure juices take market by storm

In response to the growing demand for healthy natural fresh fruit juices, Wilde has raised the bar on quality, taste and nutritional value to unprecedented new heights.

What heights? Consider this: Wilde fruit juices are unique. They're not from concentrate. They're not from puree. No water. No added sugar. No preservatives. They're 100% natural pure juice made with nothing but the pure pressed fruit.

Nothing added, nothing removed

And what fruit! Wilde juices are produced from fruit grown in some of the world's best orchards, located in the lush fruit-growing area of Western Cape in South Africa.

Take the best-selling mango flavour, for example. Imagine picking fresh ripe mangos and pressing your own thick and delicious mango juice, retaining many of the natural vitamins and minerals of the fruit. Unlike other popular juice brands which are diluted with water, apple or other juices, this is 100 percent pure mango juice. Nothing added, nothing removed.

Wilde's top quality fruit is pressed at the peak of ripeness. The juice is then flash pasteurized and sealed in an aseptic package to preserve the nutrients and freshness. Wilde fruit juices do not require refrigeration until they are opened.

To produce a juice of such high quality and great taste at an affordable price, many elements are required:

- an abundant supply of high quality fruits grown close to the plant;
- an artisanal expertise with each different fruit;
- modern and high volume pressing and packing equipment; and
- stringent standards of quality control.

Pacmar, the manufacturer, produces Wilde juices in an HACCP certified plant, the highest standard recognized worldwide for total quality control. Wilde juices exceed all the quality standards set by Agriculture Canada.

Wilde's spectacular range of flavours includes Pear, Peach, Tropical Fruit Blend, Cranberry Apple Ginger, Wild Berry, and Apple / Granny Smith & Golden Delicious, with three more flavours to be added in the near future.

Highest standards of quality

Wilde fruit juices are imported and marketed in North America by Twynz Inc. in partnership with Pacmar.

According to importer and distributor Jack Berkovits of Twynz, the product has been "flying off the shelves" since its recent introduction, and is now available at better supermarkets, specialty and heath food stores across Canada, including selected Dominion and A&P Stores, selected Longo's stores, Pusateri's, Ambrosia, Noah's, The Big Carrot, Whole Foods, and many others.

So confident is Berkovits in the superiority of Wilde that he encourages you to taste any of their competitors' fruit juices and compare!

Pure, natural, delicious, and Kosher for Passover: a win-win situation if ever there was one, both for your Seder table and for your daily enjoyment!

Happy Passover

READ THE LABEL

Many juices have almost no nutritional value unless the manufacturer adds vitamin C, despite pictures of beautiful fruit and references to "100% pure juice" or "100% pure juice blend."

The best juice is the liquid that was contained in the fruit: nothing added, nothing removed, i.e. PURE PRESSED juice (not from concentrate).

Students' model UN attracts 120 delegates

By AMY BELASEN
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Jewish students from across Canada and the United States gathered in Montreal recently to participate in the Jewish-Canadian Youth Model United Nations.

This marks the fourth year of the conference, organized by a group of bright, ambitious Jewish University students from Montreal.

The conference opened with keynote speaker Albert Moses, the consulate general of the Netherlands and one of the organizers of the International Criminal Court.

J-CYMUN is the only Jewish model United Nations conference in Canada. It was modelled after the Yeshiva University's Model United Nations conference (YUNMUN) in New York.

After attending the YUNMUN conference as delegates, students Matthew Amsel, Cindy Luterman and Corey Olishansky organized the Jewish-Canadian conference in association with Montreal Hillel.

The first J-CYMUN conference was held in 2002 with the help of a grant from the United Nations Association of Canada. The conference targets students from Jewish high schools across Canada and the U.S., BBYO and CEGEPs (community colleges), and is respectful of Shabbat.

The conference has grown significantly over the years. It began with 60 delegates and it was twice that size this year.

In its first three years, J-CYMUN was held at Camp B'nai Brith in St-Sauveur. This year, it took place at the Ramada Airport Hotel in Côte-de-Liesse to accommodate the large number of participants, which also included 21 staff members. Kosher food was served at the event.

J-CYMUN is not only unique in its status as the only Jewish conference UN Secretariat members Luterman, Amsel, Alison Beck and Adam Rush help new delegates prepare for the conference. That may include offering guidance in drafting position papers; helping delegates understand foreign policy issues and the rules of parliamentary procedure; and preparing students for debate. J-CYMUN is recognized for its high level of debate.

This year, five UN committees were simulated: the Security Council, World Health Organization (WHO), Disarmament and International Security (DISEC), Office of Drugs and Crime (ODC) and International Labour Organization (ILO), with two chairs moderating each committee.

For more information about J-CYMUN, visit www.jcymun.ca.tt.

Tensions simmer in Israel

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — On the eve of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's diplomatic mission to the United States, Israel managed to keep a tight lid on tensions that threatened to boil over and ruin the Gaza Strip withdrawal.

Despite a weekend that saw the killing of three Palestinian youths by Israeli troops and scuffles on the Temple Mount, Sharon left Sunday for a meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush.

Most observers said they did not expect recent differences involving Israel's plan to add 3,500 new homes to the West Bank settlement of Ma'aleh Adumim to get in the way of the main topic: the withdrawal from Gaza, which is slated to take place this summer.

"I have the impression that the United States has decided unequivocally to ensure that the Gaza evacuation is carried out, and not to allow any other matter to overshadow, sideline or interfere with the issue," Vice-Premier Shimon Peres told Israel Radio.

But while it was expected that Bush would support Sharon's policies at their parley in Crawford, Texas, Monday, violence broke out over the weekend.

A lull in Israeli-Palestinian violence ended with the killing of the three youths, who were reportedly trying to smuggle arms from Egypt into Gaza. Palestinian terror groups responded by firing rockets and mortar bombs at Israeli settlements, though the only fatality was a horse.

But there was no declaration of a full return to violence, although a leader of a Palestinian terrorist group hinted that such a declaration might not be far away.

"So far, Palestinian factions have not declared an end to the calm," an Islamic Jihad leader told reporters. "They are studying the issue anew because of ongoing Zionist aggression."

Then on Sunday, a right-wing Israeli group Revava, or Multitude, threatened to take a demonstration to the Temple Mount, and Muslims vowed to answer with violence.

Fearing a flare-up in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, police deployed in force, with thousands of paramilitary officers blocking non-Palestinians from reaching the Temple Mount or even the Old City.

Several hundred Revava supporters who made it to the Western Wall were incensed at their exclusion from Judaism's holiest site. Some scuffled with police. Twenty-two were arrested.

"It is absolutely insufferable that year after year, the Israel authorities yield to the threat of violence from Muslims and do not allow Jews onto the Temple Mount," said Arieh Eldar, a lawmaker with the right-wing National Union bloc. "Without this site, there is not the State of Israel."

On the mount, meanwhile, a Palestinian cleric had managed to slip past police – Hassan Youssef, Hamas' West Bank leader, who was released from an Israeli prison last year.

"We are calling on Muslims everywhere to defend Al-Aqsa," Youssef said in a sermon broadcast by Al-Jazeera, referring to the main mosque on the mount.

A Palestinian was arrested outside the Old City during scuffles with Israeli police, although the violence was far tamer than that seen previously at the site. Youssef was arrested by Israeli police while travelling back to the West Bank.

In a separate incident, Israeli right-wingers blocked the main highway outside Tel Aviv for several minutes before they were dispersed by police. Authorities credited the quick response to the protest on the Ayalon Freeway to intelligence warnings about efforts to mount spontaneous civil protests.

Observers see more violence brewing in West Bank

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

Israelis and Palestinians may appear to be on the verge of a new peace process, but Israeli army generals and seasoned observers of the Palestinian scene predict a new round of fighting, perhaps as early as next fall, after Israel completes its withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and northern West Bank.

The generals point to continued weapons smuggling and other military preparations by Palestinians in both Gaza and the West Bank, while the Palestinian watchers see signs of growing discontent and radicalization among the Palestinian public.

According to military intelligence, if there is a new eruption of terrorism, it will come from the West Bank and could include Qassam rockets being fired at towns and cities inside Israel proper.

Writing in the newspaper Yediot Achronot, military analyst Alex Fishman says the Israel Defence Forces' central command, which is responsible for the West Bank, is already gearing up for a renewal of the intifadah.

The thinking in army circles is that after the Israeli withdrawal, the Palestinians will see Gaza as "liberated" but will view the West Bank, which will still have a strong Israeli military and settler presence, as "occupied," Fishman writes.

According to the army assessment, the Palestinians will have an interest in keeping the peace in Gaza to show they can run their own affairs. But the West Bank will be an entirely different story.

With dozens of Israeli settlements and army camps still in place, the Palestinians will argue they are fighting to end the occupation there, just as, in their view, they did in Gaza. And they will adopt the same model – firing rockets at both military and civilian targets.

According to military intelligence, the Palestinians are making a major effort to obtain the materials they need to produce rockets in the West Bank, something that until now they have been able to do only in the Gaza Strip.

West Bank-based militias reportedly have placed large orders for weapons and explosives for the rockets from Bedouin smugglers. One of the routes to the West Bank would be from Egypt through Gaza. Another would be directly from Jordan.

Moreover, army sources say, once the IDF withdraws from all West Bank cities, as it is set to do under the terms of the current lull, the Palestinians will be able to set up workshops and manufacture the rockets unhindered.

Fishman writes that the army sees the arms smuggling as a major threat and is doing all it can to block smugglers' routes. He says it has established a special unit to this end and has taken steps to enhance intelligence-gathering capabilities among the Bedouin.

Appearing before the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee in late March, military intelligence chief Maj.-Gen. Aharon Ze'evi-Farkash confirmed that the Palestinian militias are trying to export technological know-how from Gaza to facilitate the manufacture of Qassam rockets in the West Bank.

Hamas supporters last week in Gaza demonstrated their disdain for Israel's disengagement plan. [Israel photo]

Farkash added that despite a steep decline in current terrorist operations, the militias are enhancing their capabilities for future attacks.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz expressed a similar concern. During a visit to Washington, Mofaz said that Palestinians had smuggled Strela anti-aircraft rockets into Gaza, which he said "crosses a red line" for Israel. The Israeli fear is that if the Strelas are smuggled into the West Bank, they could be used against passenger planes leaving Ben-Gurion Airport.

In addition, observers of the Palestinian scene report growing grassroots frustration with the way the nascent peace process is developing. Israeli academics and western diplomats whose work takes them to the West Bank note mounting popular discontent because ending the armed struggle so far has failed to change people's everyday lives, as they had hoped it would.

Menachem Klein, a Bar Ilan University expert on the Palestinians, see signs of growing radicalization, which he believes could soon erupt in violence. Klein notes that twice within two weeks in March, jailed Palestinian militia leader Marwan Barghouti smuggled out letters calling for a return to armed struggle.

Three months ago, Barghouti backed Mahmoud Abbas' candidacy for Palestinian Authority president, though Abbas' entire campaign was based on ending the armed struggle. Klein argues that Barghouti, with his sharp political sense, would not have written the new letters unless he felt there was considerable support for the views expressed.

"The fact that Barghouti is calling for a return to the armed struggle shows that something very profound is happening on the Palestinian street," Klein says.

Klein sees another expression of Palestinian radicalization in the way the secular Fatah Party and the fundamentalist Hamas movement, once divided by a huge ideological gulf, are growing closer. He notes that Hamas leaders are even calling for a "joint political program" – which might tame Hamas, but more likely would radicalize the entire Palestinian movement.

The bottom line for Klein is that he believes there is no way Israel and the Palestinians will be able to conduct a successful peace process. In his view, Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon are already conducting a "dialogue of the deaf."

Abbas, he says, is only interested in negotiating a final peace deal, whereas Sharon – who believes the sides are too far apart on basic issues to strike a lasting deal – insists on long-term interim arrangements instead.

There is no possible meeting point, Klein says.

"I see a great danger of a blow-up. I don't know when it will happen, but it's almost inevitable. It's in the DNA of the process," he told JTA.

Not all observers agree the process is doomed to failure. But if there is to be any chance of success, the two sides must solve a more fundamental problem: how to synchronize the rhythm of mutual concessions even before peace negotiations begin.

For now, Israel is reluctant to hand additional West Bank cities to PA control until the Palestinians carry out promised security reforms, while the Palestinians are reluctant to make the reforms until Israel hands over the cities. As well, the Palestinians have not moved on promises to take weapons from wanted terrorists in cities already in their control.

In a editorial, the left-leaning newspaper Ha'aretz suggests that Israel take the initiative. Israel, it says, "must, to the best of its ability, contribute to the process that [Abbas] is having difficulty in carrying out, even if such assistance often entails security risks."

In the meantime, leaders on both sides see no alternative but to contemplate the possibility of failure – a state of mind, pundits warn, that could become a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Indian tribe accepted as Jews

Israel's chief Sephardi rabbi has recognized a community living along the India-Myanmar border as Jewish. Shlomo Amar's ruling sets the stage for the wholesale immigration to Israel of the 7,000-strong B'nei Menashe community, part of the larger Kuki-Chin-Mizo tribe. Much of the tribe converted to Christianity, but in recent decades some have returned to Judaism, forming the B'nei Menashe community. Some 800 members have formally converted and moved to Israel in recent years.

Pullback to be co-ordinated

Israel and the Palestinians agreed to co-ordinate the Israeli withdrawal this summer from the Gaza Strip. Officials from both sides attending a Washington conference hosted by the Aspen Institute think tank shut themselves in a conference room for two hours last week and came up with a formula, setting up co-ordination committees to handle border crossings, transportation, trade and ports.

Sharon, settlers mend fences

Ariel Sharon held a conciliatory meeting with representatives of Israeli settlers slated for evacuation. The prime minister received nine leading Gaza Strip settlers in his office, the first such meeting since December 2003 when he announced the disengagement plan. The visitors presented him with a proposal whereby the government would create a new town on Israel's southern coast and locate Gaza's settlers there. Environmentalists have protested, noting the area includes a nature reserve, but Sharon said he'll examine the idea.

Call to convert

The Israeli government is urging non-Jewish immigrants to consider conversion. An advocacy campaign launched by the Absorption Ministry and the Prime Minister's Office targets some 300,000 citizens from the former Soviet Union who are not Jewish. Potential converts are informed of the study options available, including university credit for time spent in yeshiva. Special attention is paid to ensure that unmarried women are informed that unless they convert, their children will not be considered Jewish. "The Nation Begins With You" is one Russian slogan intended for this audience.

Israel growing less Jewish

The Israeli population is growing, but with relatively fewer Jews, the government said. According to Central Bureau of Statistics data released last week, in 20 years there will be 9.3 million Israelis, an increase of 45 per cent. But while Jews constitute some 78 per cent of the population today, that will drop to 70 per cent in 2025 due to the higher birthrate among Israeli Arabs.

Canadian aliyah increases

Some 312 people from Canada emigrated to Israel in 2004 up from 208 in 2003.

Katsav, Assad, Khatami talk

President Moshe Katsav, who was at the Vatican as part of Israel's delegation to the funeral of Pope John Paul II, twice shook hands with Syrian President Bashar Assad last Friday. The two men were in close proximity to one another throughout the procession, because the Israeli and Syrian delegations to the funeral were positioned next to one another. At the conclusion of funeral services, the Iranian-born Katsav also shook hands with President Mohammad Khatami. The two spoke for almost an hour in Farsi.

Hebrew U setting up a 'science hotel'

By ELI STUTZ

JERUSALEM — How can Israel encourage its young people to pursue careers in science? Hebrew University's Prof. Itzchak Parnas is trying to answer this question with a program that brings Israeli kids to some of the university's most advanced laboratories, while they stay in a five-star hotel.

Parnas, a professor of neurobiology, visited schools across the country and concluded that scientific knowledge among Israeli high school students was sorely lacking. "Science develops so rapidly that the teachers are never up to date. Also, the schools have very simple labs that don't have enough equipment for the students. In addition, the time allotted for lab work is extremely short," he says.

Parnas decided to improve the situation. The question was how.

"The knowledge of cutting-edge science exists only in universities, research institutes and, in some cases, hi-tech industry," Parnas says. "The trick was to convey this knowledge to the students through their teachers. The answer is to bring the high school class to the university."

Thus the idea for the Belmonte Science Laboratories for Youth was born.

"First, we bring the teachers to the lab where they are taught how to conduct experiments using our advanced equipment. The teachers then return to their class, where they teach the theory. Finally, students and teacher go to the Belmonte Lab where they spend half a day performing the experiments."

For the purpose of the program, Hebrew U has made available a number of sophisticated labs for physics, chemistry, life sciences, environmental studies, biotechnology and electro-optics. The labs have enough equipment for a class of 40 students. Everything is computerized and the experiments are at the level of those of a third-year university student.

Parnas is proud of the experiments themselves. "We're working with more than just guinea pigs. The children perform experiments using atomic absorption, spectrophotometers, lasers, genetic engineering and more."

The Belmonte Lab's half-day program for Jerusalem high school students has been running for years, but Parnas says that half a day is not enough. "I realized that we had to bring children from all over the country to stay for a week. But I needed a place for them to live like 'princes of science.' That's why Hebrew U has now built a hotel attached to the lab."

Parnas describes the hotel as if he were a travel agent. "It has a stunning dining hall and kitchen. In the basement, there's a disco. Each of the spacious 18 rooms has four beds with all the facilities of a five-star hotel – six stars, I should say."

The week's events are no less spectacular. "Every day, the kids will have four hours of science at the lab. Then they'll be taken on a tour of Jerusalem, visiting science-related sites with experts in each field. In the evening, the students will enjoy themselves at the disco or go out for a night on the town. The idea is to combine fun and science."

It's important to Parnas that kids from various economic and religious sectors take part in the Belmonte project. "The composition of the student population in Jerusalem is a complex one. We have the [haredi], the Muslims, the secular. I want to bring all of them to the lab."

Parnas has larger plans for the future. "I suggested to the government that it build 15 such centres around the country: in Eilat, Be'er Sheva, Kiryat Shmona, Haifa, etc."

The centres won't all be exactly the same. "Around the core curriculum, I'd like to see an Eilat underwater lab focusing on marine biology, a lab in Be'er Sheva that focuses on mines, minerals and desert. The Haifa lab can focus on heavy industry."

Parnas hopes to see exchange programs over the summer, with students from one city travelling to another, expanding their learning experience.

It doesn't end there. Parnas is convinced that the same model could be used to teach other disciplines, including music, computers, art and economy.

"The idea is to use central facilities, time-sharing and university knowledge taught by the regular high school teachers."

While the half-day lab excursions are already up and running for Jerusalem kids, the hotel plan is set to start shortly, after some administrative red tape is dealt with.

Parnas is excited. "I have schools waiting in line," he says, "and this is just the beginning."

McGill University biochemist wins Killam Prize

MONTREAL – McGill University biochemist Nahum Sonenberg is one of the five prominent scholars receiving 2005 Killam Prizes, Canada's most distinguished annual awards for outstanding career achievement in various academic disciplines.

Sonenberg was awarded the prize, worth $100,000, in the category of health sciences.

In an announcement from the Canada Council for the Arts, which administers the Killam program, Sonenberg is cited for his "enormous contributions" in the field of molecular and cellular biology.

"His ground-breaking research has led to a better understanding of basic biological processes in normal and cancer cells," the announcement said, "and this research is now playing a major role in the creation of new cancer treatments," which include gene therapies and new anti-cancer drugs.

Sonenberg joined McGill University in 1979 and is currently the James McGill professor in the department of biochemistry and the McGill Cancer Centre.

He received his BSc and MSc in microbiology and immunology from Tel Aviv University. Upon completing his PhD in biochemistry at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel, he joined the Roche Institute of Molecular Biology in New Jersey with a Chaim Weizmann postdoctoral fellowship.

His primary research interest has been protein synthesis, the mechanism by which the information in the genes creates the proteins that make up the body.

"Too much of some proteins can lead to diseases like cancer. Not enough of other proteins results in diseases like diabetes," he explained. Sonenberg made a significant discovery in this area in 1978.

In addition to his main focus on cancer, Sonenberg is also concerned with virology, and studies poliovirus, rhinoviruses, HIV and the hepatitis C virus. His laboratory's scope extends even to obesity and neurology, making use of the latest techniques in molecular biology and biochemistry.

In 2002, Sonenberg was awarded the Robert L. Noble Prize from the National Cancer Institute of Canada. He is an International Research Scholar of the Howard Hughes Medical Institute and has been a fellow of the Royal Society of Canada since 1992. He is also a Canadian Institutes of Health Research Distinguished Scientist.

Nahum Sonenberg

The Killam Prizes will be awarded in Montreal April 25.

In congratulating Sonenberg and the other two McGill Killam recipients, computer scientist Luc Devroye and medical anthropologist Margaret Lock, principal Heather Munroe-Blum said the awards "recognize the magnificent accomplishments of three of our most productive colleagues and are richly deserved.

"Individually, professors Devroye, Lock and Sonenberg are international leaders in their fields and have made enormous contributions to research, teaching and, more generally, to society," Munroe-Blum said.

Howard Engel's sleuth develops a rare brain disorder

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

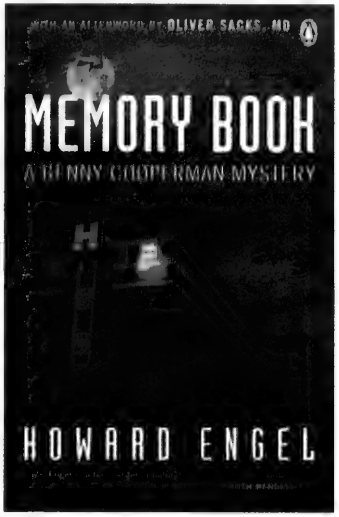
Howard Engel, creator of the popular Jewish literary detective Benny Cooperman, was perplexed to discover one morning about four years ago that the pages of his morning newspaper seemed filled with an unfamiliar foreign typescript resembling Serbo-Croatian.

Actually, an overnight stroke had left him with alexia sine agraphia, a rare mental condition that had deprived him of the ability to read but had left his writing ability largely intact.

Although initially he couldn't tell one alphabet letter from another, a diligent course of learning therapy has restored his reading ability to a Grade 3 level. Although he can't keep pace with movie subtitles and it takes him weeks to finish reading a novel, he can now read back his own manuscript pages, an essential part of the creative process.

In March, Engel's long-term publisher, Penguin Books of Canada, released Memory Book, his 12th Benny Cooperman mystery. The book appears at an auspicious moment, precisely 25 years since his now-famous gumshoe debuted in The Suicide Murders.

"I seem to be hard-wired for writing," the 74-year-old Toronto resident remarked in a recent interview at Dooney's, a coffee shop in Toronto's Annex area where he is a regular. "And I can't stop myself from reading, even though it's very difficult. So I've had to transform my whole life."



Engel achieved another important career milestone in March when the Writer's Trust of Canada named him recipient of the $20,000 Matt Cohen memorial award for lifetime achievement. As the citation noted, he is credited with creating Canada's first popular private eye in fiction who operates in an identifiably Canadian setting and has a solid international following.

The magnitude of the prize took the unsuspecting crime writer by surprise. "They tell you about the award just to make sure you'll get there," he said. "But I assumed it was a minor award at the start of the evening, before the biggies. I was so surprised when they saved me for the last – it was the big award of the evening, both monetarily and in its placement on the program. I was really knocked out by the applause and by the standing ovation. It was really more than I bargained for."

In Memory Book, Engel's soft-boiled sleuth also gets more than he bargains for. After spending weeks in a coma, Benny awakens in a hospital room to discover he has acquired a rare mental condition – alexia sine agraphia – that has fogged his short-term memory and wiped out his ability to read, much as it did to Engel.

Shortly after the stroke, Engel contacted Oliver Sacks, the noted author-neurologist, and was invited to meet him in New York. Sacks became intrigued with the case and ultimately wrote a 10-page afterword to Memory Book in which he noted the "special personal dimension" that links Engel and Cooperman.

The novel "has a unique depth and authenticity, because Howard Engel has known and traversed all that he writes about," Sacks writes. "He has, as Bertrand Russell would say, 'knowledge by experience,' and no knowledge by description can ever match this."

Unlike his creator, however, Benny was knocked over the head and left in a Dumpster, along with the corpse of a murder victim. Although he keeps forgetting things such as what city he is in, the name of his favourite nurse and how to use a telephone, he turns to crime-solving from his hospital bed much the way other patients play chess and do crossword puzzles.

Engel, who said he wanted to describe a mental disability from the inside out, acknowledged that Benny has entered a slightly darker realm where mysteries loom larger and his sleuthing powers are possibly reduced. In a sense, the whole world has become a veiled mystery for Benny. Just as vandals trash his office in Grantham, a parallel internal havoc causes his mental faculties to become scrambled and unreliable.

The book "is a bit of an experiment in dealing with a narrator who is not entirely dependable, who is apt to forget things or repeat things altogether," Engel said. "In that way, it's approaching modern fiction. One of the charms of the crime novel is the fact that you've got a solid narrator – a storyteller [who] tells the story with drive: he moves the story forward and you can lean on him; he's trustworthy.

Show about Franz Kafka and his overbearing father revived

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

"He was a genius, and in many respects he was the canary in the coal mine that sensed impending fascism that would overtake the early 20th century," says Alon Nashman, a Toronto actor who has been performing for the past 15 years.

This statement is usually applied to politicians or philosophers who called for change in the early 1900s, but Nashman is speaking about Franz Kafka, a Jewish writer whose societal contributions are less well-known.

Nashman and director Mark Cassidy are bringing back their 2002 adaptation of Kafka's Letter to His Father in Kafka and Son, which runs from April 14 to 16 at the Harbourfront Centre as part of the World Stage: Flying Solo theatre festival.

This one-hander follows 35-year-old Kafka through mental anguish and frustration as he recounts episodes in which his father demoralized him. Nashman says he plays both Kafka Jr. and Kafka Sr. in roles that he enjoyed researching.

Alon Nashman

"I'm overwhelmed by his honesty," Nashman says of the 50-page letter Kafka wrote detailing his father's efforts to belittle him but never sent. "He experienced a father who was overbearing, but he is still brilliant enough to have written his father's rebuttal in the letter."

Kafka's writing flair has notably infused his two most popular works. The Metamorphosis relates the frightening story of a man who turns into a cockroach and is reviled by his family. The Trial revolves around a man accused of a crime by faceless and nameless bureaucrats. As Nashman says, Kafka witnessed society stripped of its humanity and chronicled that melancholic turn for the worst.

In Kafka and Son, Nashman plays a smart, shy and gangly man with an impassioned soul and low self-esteem. Implicit in the play is Kafka's relationship with a father who "created him as an artist as well as destroyed him," notes Nashman. After all doesn't all great art spring from hardship? So if Kafka had had a different father, would he have become such a legendary writer?

"That's for the audience to decide," Nashman says tactfully. "It's a big question, of whether art depends on adversity or whether it depends on quiet repose and confidence."

Kafka faced verbal abuse that acted as a parallel to the anti-Semitism of the era. Reading through the letter, Nashman noticed Kafka Sr.'s insults parroted the hate-filled slurs usually aimed at Jews. Kafka's friends were called "vermin" or "dirty rats," and Nashman believes Kafka created The Metamorphosis as a response to hearing his father label him and his friends as vile creatures.

Diving under the skin of Kafka is following a pattern for Nashman, who has previously played brainy Jews such as Albert Einstein, Rabbi Akiva ben Yosef, Arthur Miller and Allen Ginsberg. But playing Kafka is a more identifiable experience.

"This play is extremely personal because I am a Jewish artist, and I feel that Kafka articulates my hopes and nightmares every eloquently," Nashman says.

Also enjoyable is performing a one-man show as "there is a unique thrill in developing a relationship with an audience that is symbiotic," he explains.

With this reprise of a show that was staged at Toronto's Ashkenaz Festival and Harbourfront's Studio Centre three years ago, Nashman hopes to deepen the show's elements so audiences (past or new) can enjoy a more powerful production.

New to the show is a piece of music that Nashman calls "brilliant and perfect for the play." American composer Osvaldo Golijov's Yiddishbuk is inspired by one of Kafka's psalms and played by the St. Lawrence String Quartet.

One line from a psalm could be the play's extended subtitle: "No one sings as purely as those who are in the deepest hell. Theirs is the song which we confused with that of the angels."

Kafka and Son runs April 14 to 16 at 7 p.m. at Harbourfront, with an additional April 16 show at 2 p.m. The April 14 show includes a question and answer session afterward. For tickets ($15), call 416-973-4000.

Novelist migrating towards 'literary school' of detective fiction

"But in modern fiction the narrator is not always reliable."

It's possible Engel is migrating toward a more literary school of detective fiction typified by works such as Peter Ackroyd's 1993 novel Hawksmoor, in which the protagonist responds to the persistent problem of evil by losing his mind. "The same thing happens in modern French detective literature, in which the crime is unsolved on the last page and the detective is dead," the author added.

Born into a Jewish family in St. Catharines, Ont., in 1931, Engel used his boyhood home as a model for the fictitional southern Ontario town of Grantham where Benny lives and works. A former CBC reporter, he wrote the first detective novel at the encouragement of his late first wife, novelist Marian Engel.

"I wrote that first book [The Suicide Murders] very quickly and it was short for a book. But I showed it to a publisher, John Pearce, and he decided to take it. And in the editing process I did a major rewrite of the whole book." The book was one of two Benny Cooperman novels that were later made into movies, both starring actor Saul Rubinek.

Benny's popularity may rest in part on his unassuming, somewhat comic persona as an antithetical, happenstance hero who goes against the grain, orders chopped-egg sandwiches in restaurants, and has a pair of unsophisticated Jewish parents.

"Benny was everything that didn't exist in the detective realm when I started," Engel said. "He was Canadian, not American; he was Jewish, not Christian; he wasn't a tough guy; he didn't carry arms. He didn't get all the good cases automatically – he would get a case recommended by someone's cleaning woman – and he was sick at the sight of blood: all of the things that the conventional detectives didn't do."

He does not dispute the perception that Benny is, well, a bit of a schlemiel. "Yes, he does appear to be a schlemiel, and his manner helps him become a better detective because people open up to him. They tell him things they wouldn't tell a regular policeman and they wouldn't tell Sam Spade. He's not threatening in the least."

Despite Benny's greatly reduced sphere of operations in Memory Book, which is mostly set in a hospital ward, he's about to tread far beyond his usual stomping grounds of southern Ontario. Engel is now drafting a new Benny Cooperman adventure set in Miranam, a fictional country in southeast Asia.

A large part of the manuscript was written before last December's tsunami, so Engel went back and inserted the catastrophic ocean wave into the story. If anything, the tsunami only adds to the imagery of disorder and chaos that has crept into his post-stroke work.

In Memory Book, a dreamlike train wreck is a central motif, while according to Engel an equally dramatic image of upheaval is at the centre of his latest novel-in-progress. "I had to think what might be left two years after the tsunami hit, so I put a large freighter in the middle of the main street, which is being slowly whittled down by acetelyne torches," he said.

He is also writing a memoir dealing with his stroke and its aftermath. He began, he explained, by comparing how alexia sine agraphia affects Benny Cooperman in fiction versus how it affects him in real life.

A blunt message about the anti-Israel Jewish left

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

You've probably seen them at a recent Walk for Israel or at Israel Day festivities on campus. Groups of people calling Israel an apartheid or fascist state, waving Palestinian flags and chanting anti-Israel slogans.

But shockingly you come to realize that these people aren't Arab radicals or socialist protesters – they're Jews.

These people – so-called "self-hating Jews" – are the subject of Igal Hecht and Talia Klein of Chutzpah Productions' latest documentary Not In My Name, premiering at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, May 13 at 1 p.m.

In his previous efforts, such as last year's Chosen People (about so-called Messianic Jews), Hecht has hidden his personal feelings, letting the subjects tell their story. This time, Hecht brings his opinion to the forefront, arguing that the radical Jewish left has hijacked the mainstream Jewish left's agenda and is legitimizing the anti-Israel crusade.

Hecht and Klein do this with the use of a narrative voice-over to promote their own message above that of the protagonists.

Their message is blunt.

"The activists of the Jewish left stand shoulder to shoulder with those who demonize Israel and actively regurgitate the call for the end of the State of Israel," Klein says midway through the 100-minute documentary.

"This is the first time I've used a voice-over," Hecht says in an interview. "In my other films, my viewpoint was subtle. This time around, I wanted to make my viewpoint clear."

The impetus for Not In My Name came when Hecht was documenting left-wing activism at York University in Toronto and was shocked by what he saw. "So many of the Jews on the left believe Israel has no right to exist."

Another revealing moment for Hecht came when he was filming a group of young adults for the documentary at Camp Shomria, a socialist Zionist summer camp in Ontario run by Hashomer Hatzair.

"I wanted to show a positive side to the Jewish left," Hecht says. Instead he found a group of people equating Zionism with colonialism and racism. One young man is seen in the film doodling a swastika into a Star of David.

"I was shocked," Hecht says.

Equally shocking to some viewers will be scenes shot at an Israel Day Parade in New York. Heckling the paraders from the sidewalk are members of Neturei Karta, haredi Jews with black hats and beards, waving Palestinian flags and carrying banners decrying the State of Israel.

The group opposes Israel's existence on religious grounds. As Klein says in a voice-over: "They stand side by side with anyone who would help them destroy the Jewish state. When outright lies, the propagation of Jewish anti-Semitic stereotypes and using God as their personal spokesperson are not enough, Neturei Karta uses the suffering of Jews to legitimize their position."

Another controversial figure in the film is Norman Finkelstein, a professor and author of the book The Holocaust Industry, who argues that "because of the 'Holocaust card,' Jews have become immune to criticism."

"When Talia Klein and I were interviewing him, we were shocked by what he said. He blames Jews for a lot of things. It was like hearing the Protocols of Zion," Hecht says, referring to the 19th-century czarist forgery.

Hecht juxtaposes Finkelstein's comments with those of Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz, author of The Case for Israel, and a vocal opponent of Finkelstein.

When Finkelstein calls Dershowitz a "fraud and a plagiarist," Dershowitz counters that it is Finkelstein who makes things up.

"I'm telling the truth, he's lying. I would tell him 'You stop lying about me, and I'll stop telling the truth about you.'"

In the midst of all the radical voices, Dershowitz, a supporter of a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, is a voice of reason.

"When you point out only Israel's faults and imperfections and fail to point out the gross violation of human rights that exists in most Arab countries, you lose your credibility," Dershowitz says in the film.

Hecht, who considers himself a moderate leftist, says he and Klein made the film for two main reasons.

"Israel has a right to decide what is good for Israel [before Diaspora Jews do]," he says. "And the Diaspora Jewish left needs to take a hard look at itself."

He says that in the past five years, the mainstream Jewish left has allowed the radical left to make Israel's right to exist a legitimate subject for discussion among Jews.

"If we don't counter this with the truth, by the next generation, [the radical left] may become the established Jewish community. That scares me. I don't want them speaking in my name."

As Klein says in the closing voice-over. "Where are the voices of the moderate left? The voice of reason sits idly by while the hordes of this radical, anarchic, left-wing movement have hijacked this debate and are speaking in our name."

Film times are subject to change. Visit www.tjff.com for up-to-date information.

REMEMBERING 'GREAT BUT FORGOTTEN' CZECH COMPOSER ERWIN SCHULHOFF

The Art of Time Ensemble performs the music of Erwin Schulhoff in tribute to a great jazz- and ragtime-influenced composer who died in the Holocaust. The ensemble's "portrait concert" features Schulhoff's work from the '20s and early '30s in commemoration of Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Memorial Day) and the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the camps.

Born in 1894 to a prosperous German-speaking Jewish family in Prague, Schulhoff was recognized as a child prodigy by Antonin Dvorak and studied piano with Claude Debussy and others. Despite his classical training, he plunged headlong into the 20th century by embracing the new currents in popular music and championing the avant-garde music of his time.

Increasingly drawn to American ragtime and jazz, he working as a jazz pianist in the Hot Jazz clubs of Europe in the 1920s and moved into radio in the 1930s as the pianist for the Prague Radio Orchestra. With the rise of fascism, he turned to communism and became a Soviet citizen, but hesitated to move to the U.S.S.R. He was arrested by the Nazis in 1941 and died in the Wulzburg concentration camp in 1942.

Glenn Gould Studio, 250 Front St. W. $35-$25. Sunday, May 8, 8 p.m. 416-205-5555.

Out of Town: In "The Medium is the Matzo," a Passover installation by New York-based artist Melissa Shiff, formerly of Toronto, the viewer becomes a critical part of the interactive video he is watching as his image is superimposed onto the Red Sea scene from Cecil B. De Mille's The Ten Commandments. Other components include the Elijah Lounge, the Miriam Bar and the "Crush Oppression" pillows that are sold in aid of Mazon's Jewish response to hunger campaign.

"I think the Passover ritual has for the most part become rote and meaningless, the mere transmission of an ancient story," Shiff comments. "With my work, I try to reactivate the original message of the seder and reactivate the social ideals of Judaism by playful artistic means."

Sponsored by the Bronfman Center for Jewish Student Life at New York University, on view April 14 to May 2. Website, www.melissashiff.com.

"Spring time – a time for Romance" Who am I?

Live, laugh and love with this refined, thoughtful, sincere, caring, affectionate, generous, successful, self-employed, self-made success, real estate builder and renovator. A very handsome, stunning, 38 years young, single conservative Jewish affiliation, a non-smoking, immaculate, university graduate, fluent in 3 languages, standing 5'10½" with dark brown hair and eyes (people say I look like I'm 30 and that I look like a younger brother of the famous movie actor ROBERT DE NIRO)? Who are you? A mature, marriage-minded, very, very attractive, sensuous, non-smoking Jewish woman, 28-38, standing 5'3" to 5'5", a voluptuous Brunette with some knowledge of basic Judaism; a kind, caring, affectionate, intelligent, easy-going nature; so that we can be each others best friend and lover to eternity. It would be wonderful to be loving friends and friendly lovers forever. Send a photo of yourself, and a telephone number and best time to phone you. I'm sincere and am the nicest gentleman you will ever meet. It really requires mazal-good luck to meet. So let's create that mazal together. Reply to CJN Box # 5027.

Diamondbacks are Green's third Major League team

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — As the baseball season opens, a number of Jewish players are once again plying their trade in the majors and fantasizing about playing in the World Series.

"Batting fifth, and playing right field for the Arizona Diamondbacks, number 15 Shawn Green." No, the announcer is not making an error. After seven years with the Toronto Blue Jays and five years with the Los Angeles Dodgers, the 32-year-old Green, who has a .281 lifetime average and has smacked 281 taters, was swapped in late winter and hopes to show that his power outage over the past two campaigns is just a blip.

After seasons of 49 and 42 homers, Green managed only 19 in 2003 and and 28 in '04. The chances are good he will supply the big bat the Diamondbacks traded for, since as a visiting player, he always hit well at Bank One Ballpark. As well, the 6-4 Green may not face the same pressure he did in Los Angeles, where he was a member of the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame and a recipient of the American Jewish Historical Society's Hank Greenberg Sportsmanship Award.

A notoriously slow starter, Green, who is working on the latter half of a six-year $84-million (US) contract he signed with the Dodgers, came on in the second half last year after being benched at times, and he upgraded his stats to .266 with 86 RBI.

Catcher Brad Ausmus, 36, is back with the Houston Astros. The Dartmouth College grad isn't entering his 14th year in the majors as a catcher because of his lifetime .255 batting average. Rather, he is regarded as a fine defensive backstop and a master at calling a game. Pitchers, including future Hall of Famer Roger Clemens, regard him highly. His plate numbers last year were only .248-5-31.

Boston Red Sox third basemen Kevin Youkilis is coming off a .260-7-35 campaign in only 208 at bats. The Red Sox are relying on him to back up veteran Bill Mueller at the hot corner and to come off the bench in pinch-hitting situations. The 25-year-old Youkilis is a good hitter who knows the strike zone and uses the whole field.

Jason Marquis, 26, is the number 4 starter in the St. Louis Cardinals' rotation. St. Louis management hopes the right-hander can duplicate his 2004 season, when he went 15-7 with an ERA of 3.71. He was acquired last season from the Braves, who may have given up too soon on their pitching prospect.

Right-handed reliever Mike Koplove, 28, of the Diamondbacks is coming off a 4-4 season with an ERA of 4.05 in 76 games. In January, he signed a two-year, $2-million (US) pact with Arizona to avoid going to salary arbitration. He has impressive career numbers, with a 13-6 won-lost record and an ERA of 3.44 in 171 appearances.

John Grabow, 26, will pitch in relief with Pittsburgh in his second season with the Pirates. The Arcadia, Calif., lefthander went 2-5 last season with an ERA of 5.11 – a bloated number, but he did strike out 64 batters in 61 innings. His 68 appearances on the mound last year set a Pirates rookie record.

You won't find outfielder Gabe Kapler, 28, in the Red Sox outfield this season. Kapler, who played in 136 games last season but started only 73, hit a respectable .272 with six homers and 33 RBI. World Series ring and all, he has bolted to Japan to play for the Yomiuri Giants.

Reliever Al Levine had a 3-4 record and 4.58 ERA with the Tigers last year, but Detroit declined to exercise its 2005 contract option on the tall right-hander. The 36-year-old was a non-roster invitee with the San Francisco Giants this spring, but was released on the third-last day of training camp. Hopefully, his agent will soon find work for the 10-year veteran.

And now, it's time to cheer on minor leaguers Brian Rose, Frank Charles, Tony Cogan, Adam Unger, Brian Horwitz, and Adam Greenberg – but remember, only two per cent of players drafted ever make it to the majors.

EDITOR'S NOTE:

In the off season, the Blue Jays signed veteran pitcher Scott Schoenweis. Three years ago, The CJN interviewed Schoenweis when he visited Toronto as a member of the Anaheim Angels. At the time, The CJN intended to run a story on the pitcher, but Schoenweis told us, "My mom's Jewish, I'm not.

"My birth certificate says I'm Jewish, but I don't practise and my kids won't be raised that way.

"It's a misconception."

We decided not to run the article.

Maccabi hoops squad adds Grunwald

Former Toronto Raptors general manager Glen Grunwald has agreed to serve as one of the coaches of the Canadian men's basketball team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel this summer.

Grunwald will assist head coach John Dore of Concordia University. He takes over for Atlanta Hawks assistant coach Herb Brown, who had agreed to help Canada, but who will take over as head coach of the U.S. squad instead.

Grunwald was fired by the Raptors last year and is now president and CEO of the Toronto Board of Trade.

The 17th Maccabiah Games will run July 11-21.

Netivot Panthers win boys junior high b-ball

For only the second time in nine years, the Netivot Panthers are the champions of the Boys Junior High Day School Basketball League.

The victory ended a dry spell for the team, which made the playoffs seven of the past eight years and advanced as far as the finals on three occasions – twice against teams from Bialik Hebrew Day School – only to come up short.

This time, the Panthers got the better of their old nemeses, jumping to a 10-2 lead before the Bialik Blizzard narrowed the margin to two points at the end of the first quarter. Bialik took a 25-18 lead into halftime after dominating the second quarter.

The third quarter was fairly even, and the Panthers entered the final frame still trailing by seven, by a score of 36-29.

In the fourth, Bialik extended its lead to 42-30 with only five minutes left. Panthers head coach E.J. Glatt and assistant Zev Steinfeld made some adjustments and the Panthers came roaring back to close the game with an 18-2 run to win 48-44.

Rafi Rosenberg, Eli Wolynetz and Eli Herskovitz were the Panthers' best players that day, said Alan Steinfeld, Netivot HaTorah Day School's executive director.

In a semi-final versus a team from United Synagogue Day School's Bathurst campus, the Panthers edged out the Lightning by a 47-44 margin. Unlike the final, the Panthers led 43-30 after three quarters and held off a strong charge by the Lightning to earn a spot in the final.

Netivot has been in the league since 1994 and also fields a girls team in the day school league, which has won the championship twice, in 2001-02 and 2002-03.

Dance, sing, paint

"If you knew you could not fail, what would you do? If you were absolutely certain of success, what activities would you pursue, what actions would you take?"

The quote is from Anthony Robbins' book Unlimited Power and it is something I often ask others and myself. This inspiring book was given to me as a gift when I was 19 years old from someone who believed in my potential to succeed at anything I desired.

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

Every few years I take it off the bookshelf, dust it off and reread certain chapters. The week before I moved to Hollywood in the late 1990s to pursue an acting career I skimmed through it. After I had been living there for two years and needed to be re-inspired, I read the book again. I copied various inspirational quotes down on paper and taped them to my already crowded walls. Robbins' quotes nestled nicely in between a photo of Steven Spielberg, a man who followed his dreams and never gave up, and Jonathan Livingston Seagull, the inspirational bird (created by author Richard Bach) who didn't let anything stand in the way of his success and always pushed and challenged himself to fly higher.

I learned at an early age that the only limits in life are the ones we put on ourselves. Over time I created my own definition of the term "success" – as long as I did my best and aspired to learn, grow and reach my personal goals, I could never fail. If I am not pursuing life with a relentless ambition, it is time to dust off the book again. I still refer to it when I feel I am not reaching my full potential or in some way stopping myself from going after an activity, project or dream.

I recently painted my first picture. Although I am quite certain the white feathery seagull soaring high above the indigo blue ocean in my painting resembles something at a grade school level – at least I did it!

But without someone encouraging me, I may never have painted. And now it is undeniably something I want to learn, research and pursue as a hobby. The moment I put oil to canvas I knew I could not fail. My goal was to create art – not to exhibit my work in a gallery (Not yet anyway).

Some of the most sought-after artists, writers, painters, sculptors, poets, actors, swimmers, gymnasts, ballerinas, teachers and entrepreneurs required encouragement at some point in their lives. Perhaps someone's belief in them ignited the strength and courage for them to believe in themselves.

It only takes one person to encourage another and make a significant difference in their lives. Two years ago, a published author encouraged me to write – and now it is my career.

I am certain there are many people in the world with unbelievable talents or dreams they are not pursuing. Think of the effect you could have on another person by simply supporting and encouraging him or her to have faith and not be afraid of failure. It's a beautiful mitzvah to help someone reach his or her full potential without expecting anything in return.

Perhaps we should all look a little closer at our neighbour with the piano she never plays anymore; or the homeless man who is always reading a book yet never writing; or the child who dances to dazzling music but stops self- consciously when someone enters the room; or the teenage boy in the youth shelter who furtively dreams of being a doctor; or the clerk behind the counter who timidly shows you her remarkable photographs; or the elderly woman with the voice of an angel who secretly wants to sing – it is never too late to persuade someone to follow his or her dream.

And what about you – what would you do if you knew you could not fail?

Miriam can be reached at Miriam@jtvproductions.net.

APPLE-CINNAMON FARFEL KUGEL

1 cup matzo farfel
1 cup hot water
1/2 cup white sugar
3 egg whites, stiffly beaten
2 large apples, grated cinnamon

Preheat oven to 375°. Combine the water and farfel. Let sit a few minutes. Add sugar, spices, and apple. Fold in the egg whites. Pour into square baking dish greased well with oil or spray coating; dust with a bit more cinnamon or cinnamon-sugar. Bake for 45 minutes. Let cool before slicing into squares. Freezes well.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

As promised in my last column, I will continue to write about expanding the concept of Jewish education beyond the parameters of Hebrew school. In March, I wrote about the many ages of Jewish learning. While we usually think of schoolchildren as the primary target of our work, there are other times in life when Jewish study is especially meaningful, such as university, the early parenting years, and retirement.

Another sphere where we can expand the envelope is the informal arena. Until recently, when we spoke of formal study, the primary goal was literacy, while the basic aim of informal activity was identity. To simplify, a good school taught you how to read Hebrew, while an engaging summer camp brought you closer to the Jewish people and its values. Programs such as camping, youth groups, March of the Living, Birthright Israel and other Israel experiences were meant to create identity.

It's obvious, though, that literacy and identity are linked, and that the Jewish future can continue to flourish creatively only if both become the "products" of our educational efforts. Not all Jewish schools are equally successful at teaching the basics of Jewish literacy (language, history, mitzvah/values, literature, etc.), but even those that excel in this arena do not necessarily give sufficient attention to identification with God, land and peoplehood. And while, many times, informal programs create short-term identity (with much youthful passion), they can easily create Jews who are excited about a culture and civilization they know nothing about.

A comprehensive approach to Jewish education is one that not only encompasses both the formal and the informal, but deliberately breaks down these old barriers and mixes worlds. Let schools work with families to enhance curricular moments that promote identity. Family study evenings, shabbatonim, and chesed projects are examples of what schools can do to go beyond mere literacy. Conversely, text study, debates, and Hebrew content are welcome additions to camps and youth groups, in order to enhance identity with knowledge.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

God: are we here?

Grappling with the existence and meaning of God has mostly become a collegiate venture. This compelling age-old pursuit, now an uncommon pastime, might be heard in a university dormitory frequented by students of philosophy or thinkers of a spiritual ilk, but rarely among older folk sitting around ensconced in the practice of conversation.

URBAN WRITER

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Indeed, there are organizations that deal with questions of divinity, such as proofs of God's existence, but these courses are often for newcomers to spirituality and meant to hastily convince the cerebral-wonderer that God is the designer, prior to investigating the design itself.

Within Orthodox Judaism, challenging the idea of God as the Glorious Majesty, or considering that Earth is the caboose of time, is commonly dismissed as blasphemy and sacrilege. Orthodox dogma states that Divine omnipotence is absolute, and only tinkered with by those with time to squander and lacking appreciation of the true metaphysical exploration – that is, how best to fear and love God.

Other denominations rarely offer classes that include debate and dispute about confrontations to God as the architect of being, despite the fact some of them accept Jewish atheism – the idea that one can be a Jew without believing in God – as a viable ideology.

Why is this? Walt Whitman, arguably America's most influential and innovative poet, said, "In the faces of men and women I see God." This may have been so, but over time our countenance seems to have paled and our tongues thwarted so that God is less evident, and far less pondered.

Where has the profound truth-seeking gone? What of the following questions:

One of the Ten Commandments is, "I am the Lord your God." It would seem that the author of this law codified God's existence knowing the difficult theological challenges even staunch religious thinkers would face in referring to God and his management and control of life. Is it possible that believing in God is not natural and, therefore, needed to be a law?

We all know individuals who on their deathbed did not recite the Shema (the prayer recognizing God as one), dying with no need for, or belief in, heaven. Yet believers often refuse to accept this skepticism, and instead say, "There are no atheists in a foxhole" – a classic statement against atheism in a time of crisis. Why do we so vociferously doubt the atheist when clearly people have passed on with the belief that "This is the end"?

Why does the very question of "Is there a God?" so often prompt fury and rage in the souls of God-fearing folks, a rage that has regularly compelled them throughout history to persecute or even execute the inquisitive. Why does this challenge, not strengthen, the believer?

Are atheists, agnostics, wonderers, and questioners bad, and why do they threaten you?

If I don't believe in the "Almighty equals truth" paradigm, why do I cause you such anxiety, as if your next step would land you in a cavernous puddle, as opposed to the terra firma you were expecting?

God forbid. God willing. In God we trust. No need in life seems more prevalent than surrounding ourselves with God and determining the appropriate level of responsibility of service required to ensure a place in heaven. Isn't it curious, however, that such little time is spent on grappling with what or who God is or isn't and such little tolerance is displayed to those who question the existence of an omnipotent entity.

Is there a God? And listen closely this time, because I don't think you understood my earlier point.

Resilience and recurring stark beauty

Editorial

Even before spring has arrived in Israel, the red, white and purple calaniot (anemones) cover the hills like a feathery carpet of enchanting colour.

It is no wonder, therefore, that children, like the two youngsters in the accompanying photo, enjoy losing themselves in the rich red playground under the deep blue sky and the warm sun high above.

During the dry summer and then the abating heat of autumn, the calaniot lie dormant beneath the weather-beaten earth. Their bulbous roots store what little water and nutrition the hot Mediterranean climate allows.

Then, as if by a miracle, with the advent of the rainy season, they burst each year into their emphatically bright flowers.

By mid-March they are in full bloom, a euphoric reminder that in a matter of days, spring, and then Pesach, will be here.

Calaniot lift the heart. They are, therefore, the most perfect harbingers of Pesach. Their inherent resilience and recurring stark beauty affirm with certainty the purposeful mystery of our life on earth.

As does Pesach.

The story of the Exodus, the remembering and retelling of which are the reasons for the festival, is considered by many to be the pivotal event in the Bible.

In his illuminating book Exploring Exodus, renowned biblical scholar Nahum Sarna points out that the Exodus theme is referred to about 120 times in the Bible.

"It was never just seen as a historical event of the past," Sarna says, "but became a permanent symbol in the Israelite national consciousness. Continually being re-enacted, it was ever new, ever imposing itself afresh upon the collective mind and memory, so that the epic of the Exodus nurtured the culture and the religion over the millennia."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Mayors Visit Israel

TORONTO — Edmonton Mayor Stephen Mandel and St. Catharines Mayor Tim Rigby were among 70 mayors from 32 countries, including Germany, Great Britain, India and the United States, who attended last week's 23rd annual Jerusalem Conference of Mayors. The event, hosted in Israel by Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupolianski, focused on multiculturalism, security and development. The mayors also met figures such as Israeli President Moshe Katsav.

WORLD

MP 'Tired' of Shoah

AUCKLAND — A New Zealand politician was placed on "temporary leave" by his party after insensitive remarks about the Holocaust. Labour Party MP John Tamihere did not take part in party activities last week after he was quoted in an interview saying, "I am sick and tired of hearing how many Jews got gassed." Prime Minister Helen Clark called the remarks deeply offensive.

Shoah Rescuer Dies

BUDAPEST — Kalman Ferenczfalvi, who saved some 2,000 Jews during the Holocaust, died last April 8 at 84. During World War II, Ferenczfalvi ignored orders and designated Jewish workers to guard the Budapest headquarters of the International Red Cross, saving them from deportation. He also forged papers for Jews and other persecuted people. In 1988, he was named a Righteous Gentile by Yad Vashem.

No More Baptisms?

SALT LAKE CITY — Mormon church leaders have again agreed to end the church's practice of posthumously baptizing Holocaust victims and other Jews. The pledge came at a meeting last week in Salt Lake City, when a delegation of five Jews also agreed with a group of church leaders to set up a committee to explore issues related to the practice, known as proxy baptism. In 1995, the church agreed to end the practice, but some members resumed it.

Resolution Fails

CHICAGO — A resolution to investigate Israel's use of Caterpillar bulldozers to demolish Palestinian homes failed last week in a vote at a Caterpillar shareholders' meeting in Peoria, Ill. The resolution drew three per cent support, below the six per cent threshold needed to have it reintroduced next year. Israel uses the bulldozers to destroy homes of suspected Palestinian terrorists.

Liberations Marked

BERLIN — Survivors remembered the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Buchenwald and the Mittelbau-Dora concentration camps last week in Germany. Speakers at the Buchenwald event urged youth to remember the Shoah and fight the rise of anti-Semitism in Europe, while a museum was opened on the site of the Mittelbau-Dora camp to mark its liberation.

Citizenship Revoked

DES MOINES — A U.S. court has revoked the citizenship of ex-Nazi concentration camp guard John Hansl. The court ruled April 8 that Hansl, 80, a Des Moines resident who came to America in 1955 and gained citizenship in 1960, persecuted inmates while in the SS Death's Head battalion at Natzweiler and Sachsenhausen. The U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations brought the case.

Record Bank Award

NEW YORK — A U.S. judge awarded two Jewish families $21.8 million, the largest award to date from the Swiss banks fund. The judgment came last week in a claim regarding the Nazi takeover of a sugar refinery in Austria that was owned by the Bloch-Bauer and Pick families. The claim was filed by Maria Altmann, Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer's niece, and 24 unnamed heirs. The award will come from the $1.25 billion (US) 1998 deal Swiss banks agreed to pay out dormant Holocaust-era accounts.

Neo-Nazis Banned

BERLIN — The eastern German state of Brandenburg banned two neo-Nazi organizations last week, Kameradschaft Hauptvolk and Sturm 27. Some 300 police raided 40 homes in and near the town of Rathenow, close to the state capital Potsdam. The groups have about 60 members.

Group Seeks Status in Passport Case

TORONTO.— A largely Arab group calling itself Canadians for Jerusalem announced last week that it's seeking intervenor status in a court case challenging Ottawa's policy of not allowing "Jerusalem, Israel" to appear as a place of birth on Canadian passports.

The group wants Ottawa to maintain its policy of not recognizing Israeli sovereignty over any part of Jerusalem.

"Canadians for Jerusalem's intervention will ask the court to respect the historic religious interests of Christians and Muslims in the Holy City of Jerusalem, to respect Palestinian claims of sovereignty over Jerusalem, and to respect international law, which does not recognize Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem," the group's lawyer, Douglas Elliott, said.

The case before the Federal Court of Canada involves 17-year-old Eliyahu Yehoshua Veffer, a dual Israeli and Canadian high school student in Toronto. In January, the Jerusalem-born teen and B'nai Brith Canada jointly filed a lawsuit seeking a judicial review of the passport policy.

Ottawa recently contacted some 100 Canadians with "Jerusalem, Israel" listed as their birthplace in their passports and asked them to turn in the documents. A spokesperson for Passport Canada told The CJN last month that the notation is an "administrative error," since Jerusalem's status "can only be resolved as part of a general [peace] settlement."

Canadians for Jerusalem calls itself "a national coalition" of more than 30 groups representing more than one million Canadian Arabs, Christians, Muslims and Druze, as well as Canadian Palestinians and an unnamed Jewish group.

Family fights battles for ABA-based education

BY ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Carly Fleishmann's education is once again in limbo.

Over the past few years, Carly's parents, Tammy Starr and Arthur Fleishmann have been doing everything they can to ensure that their 10-year-old daughter receives an education based on applied behavioural analysis (ABA), also known as intensive behavioural intervention (IBI) at home and at school. It has been a battle every step of the way.

"It is important that there be consistency for children with autism," Starr said in an interview. "Otherwise, the children regress."

Last year, Carly's parents were forced to go to court to get an injunction to ensure that Yifat Barmapov, an ABA-trained assistant, would be retained by the Toronto District School Board as the special needs assistant in Carly's special education class at Summit Heights Public School.

In January 2004, Ontario Superior Court Judge Jean MacFarland found that when considering the question of irreparable harm, "the evidence before this Court is uncontroverted that Carly does not handle change well and that she regresses in the school setting when ABA is not used…"

"In such circumstances, I am satisfied that the harm that would occur in the event Ms. Barmapov is replaced by another without appropriate ABA training is irreparable. The setback that Carly would suffer is incapable of being quantified in dollar amounts."

Starr and Fleishmann are also part of a group of 29 parents who earlier this month won a lawsuit, also in Ontario Superior Court, that claimed the province violated the constitutional rights of schoolchildren with autism by refusing them ABA-based treatment past the age of six.

Attorney General Michael Bryant responded to the recent ruling by saying that governments, not courts, should determine what programs autistic children get in schools.

"We'll continue to try and ensure that we're providing the best treatment [in the schools]… The legal issue is who should be deciding it. We feel the elected should."

The province has already announced it will appeal the decision.

Carly Fleishmann

"It's as if there is a policy barrier against ABA every step of the way," Starr said.

The therapy, which is based on the work of psychology professor O. Ivar Lovass, uses an intensive system based on rewards, which teaches children with autism to modify certain behaviours. Therapists, consultants, parents and educators work one-on-one with the children so that small skills can be mastered a little bit at a time. Although the therapy costs about $50,000 per child annually, Starr believes it can be more cost-effective if it is offered within a school environment as it is in the United States.

"There is a lot of wasted money in the system right now," she said, adding that without proper administration, many non-qualified ABA instructors are currently providing inappropriate therapy.

In the meantime, Carly has spent the past few years learning how to use a voice output device that allows her to communicate her needs. Through constant repetition, Carly has learned which button on her laptop-like gadget will get her a cookie, a salad or a trip to the bathroom.

"She has vocabulary, but no speech," Starr explained. "[So] people think she has no innate intelligence."

Starr said that ABA has enabled Carly to go to camp at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre with her therapist in December and March and love it there.

"And they loved her," Starr added.

Making Passover memories

Rabbi Benjamin Blech is a renowned teacher of Talmud at Yeshiva University in New York and a successful explicator of Judaism and Jewish culture to the curious and questioning of North Americans Jewish and non-Jewish.

He has written many books on Jewish themes, including Understanding Judaism: The Basics of Deed and Creed; writes frequently for the media, Jewish and non-Jewish, and has even appeared even in modern television's holy of holies, as it were, the Oprah Winfrey Show.

From the editor's desk

Rabbi Blech tells a story of a certain seder plate that he saw one day in an antique store in lower New York. He recognized the plate immediately as the same one he had once spoken about at the eulogy of a friend of his, Sam, a survivor of Auschwitz.

Before Sam was taken away by the Nazis, he had managed to hide the seder plate in his backyard. After the war, he retrieved the plate and brought it with him to America, where he rebuilt his life. The plate, of course, was a symbol of the heritage and the will to live that the Nazis could not destroy.

When Rabbi Blech saw that same plate in the store, it made him weep. "Where was it from?" I inquired. "How did the owner come to have it?"

The shopkeeper provides the answer.

The plate was part of a sale of the contents of an estate. "You see, the deceased was religious but his descendants aren't – so they don't really have any need for items like these."

That singularly sad discovery by the rabbi so moved him that he felt compelled to write a work that links the meaning and the mechanics of memory directly to the celebration of the holiday of Pesach.

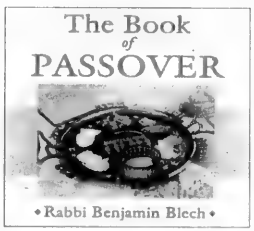
The result is The Book of Passover (Citadel Press, Kensington Publishing Corp.), a little gem of some 180 pages.

"What you will find in these pages is a prescription for memories," Rabbi Blech writes. "It will get you to think about your connection with the past and it will let you record the image you want to leave of yourself for the future."

The book is not a Haggadah. Rather, it is meant to be read as a companion to the Haggadah during the seder or in preparation for the seder.

Rabbi Blech refers to "record[ing] the image you want to leave of yourself," because in almost all of the book's 10 chapters there are many places that ask the reader to leave his or her own entries in response to specific questions.

For example, in the chapter entitled Passover Round the Globe, the author invites the reader to record an entry into the book in response to the following: "It's important to know our roots. These are the countries from which our ancestors came:"



To borrow from the field of high-tech communication, the book strives to be interactive with the reader. Indeed, the invitation to the reader to write in the book is a clever device because it engages the reader to think about and act upon the many anecdotal and midrashic insights that Rabbi Blech brings to the work.

Not only does he invite personal annotations into the work, but Rabbi Blech pleads with the reader to pass it on. "Please pass this book over to the next generation, so that they'll not only remember what you look like from your photos but truly know what you are like from your comments."

Though it is an endearing aspect of the work, the need perceived by the rabbi for the inclusion of an interactive component in a Haggadah companion is also a melancholy testament to the state of the Jewish condition in much of North America.

The Book of Passover is really a primer of information about the holiday for individuals unfamiliar with the core fundamentals of the occasion. But it is also much more. Its 10 chapters cover a range of subjects: biblical highlights, folklore, rituals, songs, trivia and even recipes.

The essential beauty of Rabbi Blech's book, however, is that it covers every single aspect of the Passover seder. It even has what I would describe as almost the tenderly loving tone of a parent who is concerned only with providing information and perhaps understanding for his child. Rabbi Blech explains, elaborates and expands upon the entire Haggadah.

His commentary is mostly from traditional midrashic sources. But in a wise and realistic concession to the varied backgrounds of his readers, he also includes maxims and aphoristic quotations from a wide, international array of writers, philosophers and statesmen.

The Book of Passover is a source book, a commentary and a primer. But if as Rabbi Blech hopes, it becomes a keepsake as well, then – as he writes in the book – "Passover will really have fulfilled its purpose – to create a link of love and understanding between the generations."

The Book of Passover is a worthwhile glue for those in need of help for intergenerational cementing.

Manitoba native leader's remarks condemned

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish and Indian leaders have condemned a statement by a Manitoba chief that alleged Jewish-controlled media ignore violence against natives while warning of a rise of hatred of Jews by Indians.

In a faxed letter to the Winnipeg Free Press that was subsequently confirmed orally, Roseau River First Nation Chief Terrance Nelson said coverage of the David Ahenakew hate trial in Saskatoon would dramatically increase natives' hatred of Jews and lead to Indians "killing police officers on a regular basis," the Free Press reported.

David Ahenakew

Nelson went on to say he did not agree with Ahenakew's views about Jews – Ahenakew called Jews a disease and said Hitler "fried" six million because they were attempting to take over Germany – but he said prosecuting the Saskatchewan native leader made it appear his views about Jews were correct.

In a statement sent to the National Post by the Assembly of First Nations, national chief Phil Fontaine rejected Nelson's views.

"We completely disagree with the comments made about the potential for increased violence due to media coverage and categorically reject any suggestion that problems should be resolved through violent means," Fontaine stated. "I have spoken to Chief Nelson to convey our concerns and I am encouraging him to do everything he can to foster constructive and positive relationships."

Bernie Farber

Fontaine acknowledged the need for greater public education about the Holocaust, but he also said "we need public education about the history of First Peoples in Canada and the cultural genocide perpetrated by the Indian residential schools."

In Ontario, Maurice Switzer, director of communications for the Union of Ontario Indians, echoed a similar theme. He said native groups condemn Nelson's statement as well as Ahenakew's rant, but at the same time many Indians wonder why the media focus on one or two incidents involving natives while ignoring repeated violations of aboriginal treaty rights.

"People ask why the media and the general public don't get as incensed about that," he said. "They wonder how a really isolated example can become a cause celebre for human rights when every day the rights of aboriginal people are ignored."

Switzer also offered a suggestion for the Asper family of Winnipeg, which run the CanWest media empire. Speculating that Nelson may have been responding to National Post editorial policy, he said, "I hope the Asper family looks at not only how their media properties defend the rights of Jews around the world, but also the rights of aboriginal people and first nations right here in Canada."

In Toronto, Bernie Farber, national executive-director of Canadian Jewish Congress, said Jewish community organizations maintain good relations with native Canadians groups and native leaders he has spoken to are embarrassed by Nelson's statement.

"It saddens us as a community when these kinds of things happen," he said.

Farber pointed out that Jewish and Indian groups have joined forces in the past to confront racist incidents in Canada.

JIAS makes submission on immigration policy

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The federal government should improve two key areas of its immigration policy: family reunification for newcomers, especially with parents; and the plight of immigrant professionals, suggests Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS).

JIAS recommended the changes in two briefs presented this month to the House of Commons' standing committee on citizenship and immigration, which is hearing submissions on changes to the Citizenship Act.

The committee is seeking public input on how Canada recognizes the work experience and professional credentials of immigrants, and how current immigration rules provide for the reunification of families.

In her submission, JIAS board member Mira Thow noted that Canadian citizens and permanent residents are entitled to sponsor their spouses and partners, children, parents and grandparents.

However, parents and grandparents "are given a low priority," with local processing taking approximately two years. Processing in the former Soviet Union can take an additional three to five years, and an added two to three years in Buenos Aires, a major source of Jewish immigration over the past decade.

The result, JIAS said, is "significant hardship" for many JIAS clients.

The agency added that families are not only prevented from reuniting permanently with their parents in Canada, but in many cases, cannot visit parents during the processing.

More money to lessen processing times is one solution. Others are:

• Issuing visitor visas for parents. Currently, officials tend to deny visitor visas to parents who are eligible for sponsorship, fearing they would stay in Canada permanently.

The agency suggested that parents undergo medical exams before coming to Canada and submit proof of private health coverage to cover their period of stay.

If parents were to go on social assistance while in this country, "they would be subject to removal."

• Creation of an Inland Parent Class: This class of immigrant would allow parents who are in Canada to apply for permanent residency, similar to the existing Spousal or Common-Law Partner in Canada Class.

• Allowing Family Class co-sponsorships: Current rules do not permit siblings to co-sign sponsorship for their parents. JIAS suggests the rules be amended to allow siblings or their spouses to co-sign sponsorships.

• Boosting immigration levels: JIAS noted that previous governments have recommended Canada's annual immigrant flow should represent one percent of the total population.

That would mean that given the population of nearly 32 million, immigration targets should be closer to 320,000 rather than the current target range of 225,000-240,000, JIAS said.

Given the traditional 60-40 split between economic and family immigrants, by increasing the target to 320,000, an additional 38,000 family class applicants could be processed annually, which would "substantially" decrease the backlog of parent applications, the agency pointed out.

On the matter of foreign credentialed professionals who are chronically underemployed or unemployed, JIAS noted that the "majority" of those it assists are skilled workers primarily from former Soviet republics and Argentina, and that many here are often under-employed.

JIAS recommended the following:

• Establishing a national organization that would assess education levels and provide information and advice on the comparability of overseas qualifications.

It would also provide financial incentives and services to employers, professional associations, licensing bodies and academic institutions to encourage and assist them in setting up customized programs to evaluate foreign credentials.

• Setting up or subsidizing training programs in occupations where immigrant skills are lacking or need upgrading.

• Promoting workplace internships by providing subsidies to employers to encourage more on-the-job training and mentoring opportunities.

Liberal MP Andrew Telegdi, who chairs the committee, said it's "a tragedy" that many foreign-trained doctors can't practice here.

Mazon seeks greater profile through Pesach program

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Though Mazon Canada has been operating since 1986, Shira Lester-Cohen, its new executive director, believes there's room to improve the organization's brand.

Outside of Toronto and Montreal, Mazon's profile among Jewish communities is not particularly strong and even in the two major Jewish centres, people may not be fully aware that the organization is not simply "a Jewish response to Jewish hunger, it's a Jewish response to Canadian hunger," she said.

Organization aims to educate Jews about the nature of hunger

With Passover fast approaching, Mazon has launched a new fundraising effort that involved sale of colourful laminated placemats with a Passover theme, for both children and adults. The move more closely links Mazon with the Passover Haggadah's injunction that is the organization's motto – Let all who are hungry come and eat, she said.

Lester-Cohen, who took over the reins of Mazon last August, said the placemat campaign is proving popular and is a good way to remind people that at a time when they are enjoying a good meal there are others who are less fortunate.

"Mazon has a fantastic message that not enough people know about," Lester-Cohen said. "I'd like Mazon to become a household name."

Lester-Cohen, who moved to Mazon from a position with the Toronto office of UJA Federation, said the agency aims to "educate people about pervasive hunger in Canada."

"Our obvious goal is to fight hunger but we also feel responsible to educate Jews in Canada about the nature of hunger," said Mazon national president Ralph Berger.

Mazon's Pesach 2005 newsletter states that "until there is sufficient public anger to construct the political will to end poverty and hunger, we still have a job to do, funds to be raised, allocations to be made, public education efforts to be designed.

"Pesach asks us to look up from the well-set table to the empty plates of those outside the room. It celebrates many freedoms, perhaps none more important than the freedom from hunger on which the promised land of the truly civil society must be predicated."

An estimated 20 per cent of the Jewish community lives below the poverty line and some Jewish kids attending day schools are known to come to school without the benefit of breakfast, Lester-Cohen said.

Citing Jewish Family & Child Service statistics, she said 50,000 Canadian Jews live in poverty and 20,000 in Toronto live below the poverty line.

Food banks that serve the Jewish community are among the recipients of Mazon allocations but Mazon distributes funds on a non-denominational basis, she added.

Last year Mazon distributed $500,000 in all, $300,000 in its fall round of allocations. Beneficiaries organizations spanned the geographic breadth of Canada and included the Food Bank Network of the Bay Islands in Newfoundland ($3,000) and the Cranbrook Food Bank in British Columbia ($2,500).

Among the more than 150 organizations to receive aid from Mazon were: JF & CS Calgary ($1,500), Jewish Women International of B.C. ($6,000), St. Matthew's Maryland Community, Manitoba ($2,000), Beth Sholom Synagogue Out of the Cold program, Ontario ($4,000), Flemington Public School, Ontario ($1,500), Mada Community Centre, Quebec ($3,000), the Chai Center, Quebec ($3,100).

While Mazon relies on a variety of sources for its funds, the bulk is raised at Kosher Gourmet Food Galas in Montreal and Toronto. These contributed more than $300,000 to Mazon's allocation budget, Lester-Cohen said.

Other sources of income include the sale of holiday greeting cards as well as contributions to Mazon's "three per cent program," which encourages those planning simchas to donate three per cent of their food costs to the organization. In exchange, participants receive personalized place cards.

White supremacist killed in shooting

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Wolfgang Droege, founder of the white supremacist Heritage Front, was killed last week in a shooting incident at his east-end apartment near the Beaches.

Droege, 55, was found in the hallway outside his apartment dressed only in boxer shorts. Police said a suspect barricaded himself inside an apartment, claiming to have taken a hostage. After negotiations with police, the suspect surrendered and revealed he had no hostage. Charged with second degree murder in connection with the incident is Keith John DeRoux, 43.

The killing was "not related in any way whatsoever to the victim's political activities," police said in a statement.

A native of Germany, Droege had a checkered past highlighted by numerous brushes with the law. Convicted of numerous weapons and drug offences, he gained international notoriety about 20 years ago when he and confederates planned a coup to take over the Caribbean island of Dominica and turn it into a base for drug dealing to support white supremacists. He spent two years in a U.S. jail for the conspiracy. Prior to that, he joined the Ku Klux Klan, then headed by David Duke, and attempted to start a Canadian branch.

During the early 1990s, Droege was instrumental in founding and leading the Heritage Front, which espoused white supremacy and hatred of Jews. The Heritage Front's popularity, high profile and apparent success in recruiting young people caused consternation within the Jewish community.

A report prepared by the Security Intelligence Review Committee found that in October 1993, a member of the Heritage Front had planned to enter a Jewish communal building and "take out some people." The plot was averted when the individual and associates instead held up a doughnut shop and stole some money.

The Heritage Front also compiled a "hit list" that included Jewish community leaders, including at its top Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber.

Farber, Congress' national executive-director, said Droege was "without question Canada's most notorious recruiter, leader and organizer of Canada's racist right. Before him, the racist right was a ragtag group that could never get their act together."

Wolfgang Droege [Paul Lungen photo]

Droege had them remove their swastikas and change their language to make them more palatable to Canadian sensibilities, Farber said.

His first major event, a 1990 "Martyr's Day Rally" honouring American racist Robert Matthews of the group the Order, attracted almost 300 young people, Farber noted.

The Grant Bristow affair, which revealed that Bristow, a CSIS mole, had become one of the Heritage Front's senior spokesperson, plunged the organization and the white supremacy movement into disarray.

In recent years Droege kept a low profile, though he had told the National Post he continued to stand by his views on race and the values of Nazi Germany.

It's just around the corner, but it will show the world how far you've come.

Reinforce all the pillars

But as we prepare to greet the Pesach holiday this year, we do so with an accompanying deep worry for the stresses and strains on that national consciousness in Israel.

In a powerful, tightly written article published in the Spring issue of Azure (Shalem Center, Jerusalem), Yossi Klein Halevi observes that the impending "withdrawal of Israel's civilian presence from the Gaza Strip presents one of the most severe domestic crises in Israeli history.

"Regardless of whether one supports disengagement as the correction of a historical error or opposes it as the betrayal of founding principles, disengagement should be recognized as a critical moment for the Zionist enterprise as a whole."

Though the main thrust of his article is to plead for moderation from the religious Zionist camp within Israel, he urges "both sides of the debate [to] consider steps that will help the Jewish people emerge from this ordeal with its basic sense of commonality intact."

It is to the strengthening of this "basic sense of commonality" within the Jewish people, to use Klein Halevi's phrase, that we must dedicate Pesach this year.

The Haggadah, of course – as it has always done, down through the ages and for all generations – shows us how, through the paradigm of the four children around the seder table. Despite their differences in nature and outlook, all the children are invited to the seder. Not only are they invited, indeed, they are, more importantly, involved in the memory-building ritual and included among the entirety of the intergenerational gathering around the table.

Israel's parliament has voted and the cabinet has approved the relocation of the Jews of Gaza and of four communities in the northern West Bank.

The decision was momentous, divisive and historic. But it will not be reversed. Now, surely, is the time for all Jews to sit together at the table of our unfolding history, much as the four children sit together at the seder table – not with differences denied, but with differences set aside.

Now, surely, is the time to reinforce all the pillars that underpin our "national consciousness." To be sure, it is no easy task; but to be equally sure, it is the most important of tasks this Pesach.

The calaniot grow strong each year on even the least likely of hills because they nurture their strength for the moment they must emerge to bring their bold and bright beauty into the world.

The strength of the Jewish people has always been our unshakeable sense of peoplehood and purpose, our belief in God's millennial mission for the Jewish people – our "basic sense of commonality" to use Klein Halevi's phrase.

We pray that we will be able to sit this year, all of us, at the seder table of peoplehood and find our resilience and collective strength renewed in the Haggadah's example, much as the calaniot find in the earth. And then, again like the blooming calaniot, the bold and bright beauty of our sense of peoplehood will affirm, with equal certainty, the purposeful mystery of our lives on earth. Chag Samayach.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Respected Pope for reconciling with Jews

As a God-believing Jew, I felt a sad loss upon hearing of the passing of Pope John Paul II ("When he touched the stones," CJN, April 7).

I admired him as a spiritual leader who emanated faith, humility, loving-kindness, courage and morality in action. I admired his stand against oppression and for justice and human rights. He was a light in the world, despite some unpopular convictions. And being a Jew, I respected his actions to reconcile with the Jewish people.

But I can't forget the extraordinary impact the Pope had on young people during World Youth Day in Toronto in 2002. There seemed to be a pure love flowing between him and youth. I felt deeply touched as I watched John Paul's loving-kindness fill the deepest of human needs – the need to be loved. In response, thousands of young people emanated a great love back to him. I can only imagine how valued and loved the youth felt.

It brought forth a great sense of hope that in spite of secularism, consumerism and a "me-ism" culture, great spiritual leadership and love can still ignite a spiritual quest.

Jews forbidden to stare at crucifixes

It is indeed most appropriate to journalistically publish an extensive tribute honouring the memory of the late bishop of Rome, Pope John Paul II, who by all accounts was a righteous Noachide and a moral human being.

At the same time, the publication of images of the various crucifixes that commonly accompanied the Pope is fundamentally incompatible with Jewish values. It is strictly forbidden for a Jew to stare at a crucifix – or any physical image purporting to represent a deity or the son thereof – and therefore a crucifix is bereft of any place in the home of a Jew.

I would encourage any reader possessing graven images to liquidate them together with his or her leavened carbohydrate products prior to Passover. As committed Jews, we must balance our sincere respect toward the late John Paul II with our determination to see monotheism reign supreme.

Filipino nannies

Although I have the greatest respect for the Filipino people, their values and their work ethic, I think that describing them as partners who share "our values and parenting methods" and describing them as am influence on "the Jewish way of life" is ridiculous ("Some praise for Filipino nannies," CJN, March 24).

Our parents' and grandparents' generation raised larger families than most of those being raised today – without nannies, in times of great economic hardship and without modern-day conveniences. Yet they instilled in them strong Jewish values and ethics, which are not taught to some of today's children. Many parents have no choice but to have caregivers for their children, but some families, with one parent at home, employ nannies simply to make their lives easier.

Let's be realistic: a nanny doesn't come here "to share her gift of child rearing with us"– she comes here to make money. Some of the values nannies impart to Jewish families may be positive, but they are not "in sync" with Jewish values. Filipino nannies are not Jewish, and Jewish values can only be imparted to Jewish children by Jewish parents.

I wouldn't give up seeing the big smiles and hearing the loud "Hi, Mom" when I pick up my children from school, for anything. How sad for the parents who miss out on experiences like that because they are busy doing something more important. Perhaps it's time for couples who decide to have children to take responsibility for raising them themselves.

Misleading headline

I want to congratulate Ottawa's Jewish students at the University of Ottawa and Carleton University for their hard work and success this year. As stated in the April 7 CJN article, there is much to be proud of. Ottawa Hillel students hosted Israel-related speakers and trainers such as Irshad Manji, Yisrael Neeman and David Olesker. Tal Kita, the Jewish Agency's shlichah to Ottawa universities, launched a number of new classes and initiatives.

Ottawa's AEPi chapter hosted Israel advocacy events this year. In 2004, three students from Ottawa schools were selected to participate in a national Israel advocacy training program in Israel. Ottawa students participated in the Democracy in Action conference in the fall, the ONE conference in January 2005, and carried out Israel Week programming at Carleton and U of O.

It is thus with great puzzlement and some confusion that I read the misleading title of the article, "Israel advocacy in Ottawa is in trouble." We certainly shouldn't expect Israel's detractors to be quiet. Neither should we downplay the successes of our students and staff in delivering a positive and informative view of Israel on their campuses.

"An Madu Kunne Suli" - My Passover in Panama

By ARIELLA ORBACH

Last year at this time, I was basking on the beach in Panama, the small Central American country known for its giant canal and a hat actually made in Ecuador. In truth, the beach was just my weekend pastime. I was in Panama to complete my undergraduate degree in anthropology at McGill University by taking field courses and working on an internship.

Luckily for me, these courses were offered in the winter semester, and so while my friends were writing me nasty e-mails about the brutally cold temperatures back in Montreal, I was doing much of my homework while swinging in a hammock in front of our house in Panama City.

Better yet, my internship took me to Kuna Yala, a remote and isolated archipelago on the Caribbean coast of Panama endowed with all the clichés: swaying palm trees, coral islands and calm turquoise waters. These tiny islands are the territory of the Kuna, an indigenous nation of fisherman and farmers. In the village of Ukupseni, where I worked on ecotourism development with a local non-governmental organization,

I met beautiful, happy people who embody many of the clichés we associate with indigenous people. The women wear colourful and intricate traditional clothing and jewelry. The Kuna language, widely spoken in place of Spanish, is rich and lyrical. Best of all, the people have a wonderfully casual sense of time, spending afternoons relaxing in their hammocks and nights chatting and wandering the dusty streets of the village.

Being in Panama for the winter university semester also meant that I was in Panama during the week of Passover. Coincidentally, Passover fell during the time off we were given to work on our internships. And so I began making plans to spend the two seders with the Jewish community in Panama City, and the rest of Passover in Ukupseni with my host family.

In Panama City, I found whole wheat matzah and crumbly Elite chocolate bars at a store that bills itself as the largest kosher supermarket in the world outside of Israel. I packed these provisions up with my hammock and water filtration kit and headed out to catch the 6:30 a.m. Twin Otter plane that would take me to my internship village. Since I was arriving at the beginning of a new day, my host family was waiting for me with an offer of breakfast. As quickly as it took to cross the bridge from the tiny landing strip to the village, I had to face the task of explaining my alien customs to my Kuna family.

Scenes of Kuna Yala and its people photographed by the author.

Malba, the wizened but still-beautiful grandmother and household matriarch, was fully in charge of the cooking hut. She spoke little more than two words of Spanish and she was the one who served me my meals. The task thus fell to me to somehow communicate to her why I could not accept many of her offerings that week. I searched through the scraps of Kuna language and grammar that I had picked up, and with the help of a small Spanish-Kuna dictionary purchased in Panama City, I came up with this gem: "An madu kunne suli," meaning "I do not eat bread."

Malba appeared rather perplexed, probably because during every other visit to her household, I had eaten my fair share of bread. But there was little more that I could do but let her watch me munch my dry "crackers" in confusion. I imagine she was pondering just how strange we merguis – white people – really are.

Funny cultural miscommunications aside, Passover in Kuna Yala was about finding myself in a completely exotic environment and still being able to maintain the traditions that link me to my people. This in itself helped strengthen my Jewish identity more than any family gathering around the seder table could. But Passover in Kuna Yala was also about building bridges toward a shared understanding with those very people whom we consider so "exotic" before actually getting to know them.

The Kuna people and the Jewish people are as different as can be, right? They are an indigenous nation, grounded in place and living off the land and the sea. We Jews are expert wanderers, a culture of close-knit communities adept at being a minority, until recently, wherever we go. Yet scratch the surface of Kuna history and you learn that they do not in fact originate from the island territory they now occupy. They, too, were chased off their indigenous lands in the Colombian jungle by enemy tribes, forced to take up residence in what is now Kuna Yala only a few centuries ago.

Today, the Kuna have an admirable degree of control over their lives and their lands. Yet before 1925, the Kuna people were oppressed by the Panamanian government, which forced them to give up their traditional dress, religion and customs. So the Kuna rose up and killed or expelled by force all Panamanian police from their lands, taking back their freedom and their dignity.

During Passover, Jews across the world remember our own oppression at the hands of the Egyptians, the freedom we gained after the plagues and the dignity of being our own masters again. We not only remember but re-enact, through song and story, the process of slavery and freedom our people underwent. Similarly, the anniversary of the Kuna Revolution is a time of remembering both oppression and freedom, as the story of the revolution is re-enacted through street theatre and role-playing over the course of a full week. We Jews emphasize the re-telling of the Passover story especially for the children, so that they do not forget their historical legacy. The Kuna act out the revolution for their children as well, so that they grow up proud of their people's resistance to the forces of colonialism.

The author enjoys a moment with two new friends af her Kuna family.

All these amazing similarities emerged from a long discussion I had with Johnny, my host father, as we sat on plastic chairs at the entrance of the family's hut. I had just arrived that morning with my supply of matzah, and felt the need to not only tell the family that I couldn't eat much of their food this week, but to really explain why. Yet as I was summarizing the Passover story for Johnny, I kept on running into similarities with the Kunas' own experiences.

Our discussion stretched on for hours, as I explained what a Jew is and Johnny told me a bit about the Kunas' own religious traditions. I may have been in a completely exotic environment for Passover, but through the medium of that holiday, I learned that people are not so different from each other after all.

And today I can claim with confidence that Johnny, Malvita, Malba, Johnny Jr., Digindidili, Sogdidili and Anayaguili are surely the only Kunas to have ever tasted, and liked, matzah.

Ariella Orbach lives in Montreal. She recently completed her undergraduate degree at McGill University and will be pursuing post-graduate studies in rural planning and development at the University of Guelph.

Mixed feelings at Yad Vashem

Not since the funeral of Yitzchak Rabin almost a decade ago had so many foreign dignitaries come to Israel. The occasion was last month's dedication of the new Yad Vashem Museum in Jerusalem. Dead Jews – whether a murdered prime minister or the six million – seem to attract the world's respectful attention.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

It has taken many decades for world leaders to pay full homage to the victims of the Holocaust. But even skeptics such as myself must admit that this gathering was also a way of expressing appreciation to living Jews, in the Jewish state and in the Diaspora. The government of Israel responded with grace and fulsome hospitality.

Israeli officials used the event to remind visitors that the Holocaust is evidence of the legitimacy and necessity of the State of Israel. The frequent references to the upsurge of anti-Semitism in many of the countries that the guests represented implied that not enough had changed there and that live Jews still need full acceptance wherever they may reside.

But Israel does not need the Holocaust to justify itself. For the Holocaust is evidence of the demise of the old paradigm: Jews as victims. Israel is the beginning of something new: Jews as a sovereign nation responsible for their own destiny – just like all other free nations and subject to the same critique as others, from within and from without. Israel is for the living.

The fact that the people and the faith of Israel are linked to the land of Israel makes for the strength and persistence of Judaism. Its roots are in the biblical covenant between God and the people. Yad Vashem is a memorial and a tribute to the victims of the old paradigm. It is the site of neither a new Sinai nor a new Zion.

Jews who link Israel, the fruit of the Zionist endeavour that started long ago, to the Holocaust may play into the hands of those who cannot bear the intrinsic merits of Jewish sovereignty and only tolerate it as a consolation prize for Jewish suffering.

The presence of the dignitaries may have been not only a belated, but also a final effort to remember the Holocaust. As the memory of the tragedy begins to fade with the death of survivors, so will it be easier for the non-Jewish world to forget it and lose any inhibitions it may still have when it attacks Israel by dispatching censorious condemnations instead of sending friendly delegations.

Hence my mixed feelings. On the one hand, it was good to see all the visitors in Jerusalem, even when their convoys brought traffic to a standstill. On the other, I can't keep wondering what was really behind their measured statements.

First full-time shaliach in Vancouver

Rounds of "Shaliach!" greet him when he arrives at Hillel House at the University of British Columbia or at Simon Fraser University with a box of the Israeli snack foods Bissli and Bamba, as well as condoms reading: "Israel – it's still safe to come," for distribution during Israel Week.

Jessica Apter in Vancouver

Shaliach is the Hebrew word for emissary, and Elad Guberman is ours. I state that with unabashed possessiveness, for I have just had the immense pleasure of announcing to the most active student executive board members of the SFU Jewish Students Association and Israel Advocacy Committee that Guberman will be the first-ever full-time staff member for the Jewish student community here, based in our brand new Hillel House to be opened for student use this September.

Guberman has been living here and working for Vancouver Hillel as part of what began in September as a one-year Jewish Agency and Canada Israel Experience program that places Israelis in Hillels around the country. Two others work in Ottawa and at the University of Western Ontario in London, Ont. The three make up a strong and diverse team that has contributed significantly to both the local communities in which they were placed by National Jewish Campus Life and to the national Jewish student community at two Canadian Federation of Jewish Students conferences in Montreal and Calgary.

Having Guberman in Vancouver this year has been a major factor in the huge steps we have taken in Israel activism and in creating dialogue on campus. One of the major barriers to free speech and constructive political dialogue has been the deeply rooted assumptions by anti-Israel activists that all Israelis are violent and enthusiastic participants in what they allege is state terrorism. Having our shaliach at our Israel week events on campus this year meant that many of these people were intrigued to meet an Israeli who can be critical of some of his government's policies but still maintain an unwavering pride in his country.

Guberman shatters stereotypes when he introduces himself as a former medic in the Israeli army, having served in Gaza, the West Bank and Lebanon, because it is impossible not to realize immediately that he is laid back, kind, compassionate and peace-loving. His wealth of experience, including his army service both as a medic and as a teacher in medic school, his travels in Central America and Europe, and his year spent selling popcorn in Los Angeles all contribute to his well-rounded knowledge and open-minded perspective, which is admired by our supporters and respected by all but the fiercest of our campus opponents. Guberman also helps to open their minds to the reality of his having grown up in a country that is constantly victimized by terrorism.

Our shaliach also provides us with much comedic entertainment. For all his worldliness, his ineptitude at sandwich making was evident when he spent 1½ days at peanut butter and jam-a-thons on Vancouver campuses making jelly sandwiches for the homeless. His shocked reaction when a student finally realized why the jam was running out before the peanut butter and pointed out his mistake to him has had us laughing for weeks.

Having a shaliach on campus has helped us in more ways than with Israel activism. By acting as a resource to the Israel advocacy committees at SFU and at UBC in our efforts to create a sense of pride in and a sensitive and realistic understanding of Israel among Jewish students in Vancouver, he has helped us to build our membership to record numbers. Also, by helping students form an Israeli Students Club at UBC, he has drawn in the large number of Israeli students in Vancouver who previously viewed Hillel as a phenomenon of and for Diaspora Jews. That club is now highly active and adds a new dynamic to campus life, both socially and by helping to educate and share their culture with the rest of the Hillel membership.

Having a shaliach all to ourselves to go along with our brand new Hillel House, brings much promise for the future of SFU Hillel. Guberman's creativity, progressive outlook and unique commitment to student empowerment will make him the perfect friend and resource to the Jewish students at SFU at this turning point for our campus community.

What exactly was I defending?

A number of weeks ago, I defended my honours thesis. Called into a room before three of my professors, I had to summarize my research and respond to the onslaught of questions they had devised for me.

As I have mentioned in a previous column, my thesis offered a reading of the Akedah, the biblical story of the Binding of Isaac, in light of interpretations of it by philosophers Søren Kierkegaard, Emmanuel Levinas and Jacques Derrida.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

To briefly summarize 25 pages of distilled critical theory, my thesis argued that Levinas' conception of "the ethical," formulated in the image of the paradigmatic relationship between man and God, most successfully addresses the story of the Binding of Isaac, because it captures the ethical significance of Abraham's actions without extricating them from their properly religious context.

While I genuinely enjoyed the process of writing my thesis, there was something about my oral defence that left an extremely bad taste in my mouth.

The first question threw me off guard: "Given the Jewish foundation of Levinas' ethics, are we to conclude that only Jews can be ethical?"

While a more laid-back individual would have sat with a pensive look for at least a few seconds, my instincts kicked in and a less-than-reserved "No" immediately came out of my mouth. I proceeded to explain that while the figure of God offers the paradigm through which Levinas' conception of the ethical can be understood, this in no way means that only Jews (or only Jews who believe in God) can be ethical.

And so the course of my oral examination continued. My thesis advisor, clearly making an effort to put some more viable questions on the table, raised a fact I had previously told him – that Levinas used separate publishers for his "Jewish" works and for his more properly "philosophical" pieces – and asked for my thoughts on the matter.

I proceeded to explain that while some people see what I consider to be an artificial dichotomy between Levinas' religious and secular thought, it is apparent to most thoughtful readers that Jewish themes and the foundations of Jewish thought pervade all of his work. Thus, one has to ask why the attempt would be made to separate philosophy from religious thought.

As I began to take my answer a step further, and listened to the words coming out of my mouth, I realized that my attempt to explain Levinas' choice of publishers wasn't simply an explanation of Levinas.

I suggested to the professors that it's often difficult to broach the subject of religion in an academic realm. In our contemporary age, religion is viewed by far too many people as antiquated dogma in which critical thinking yields to doctrine. Even at the University of King's College, a school with a strong Anglican heritage, this mentality becomes more apparent with each passing year, as its increasingly famous Foundation Year Program, dedicated to the reading of "great books" in the western canon, moves farther and farther away from the religious basis of the western tradition (and one must suspect this has something to do with both the students and the faculty's tolerance for religious content).

Unfortunately, it seems to be generally accepted that while one can assume a critical approach to philosophy and cultural theory, one cannot be both critical and respectful of religious faith.

My paper was constructed on a tradition of Jewish philosophy ranging from Franz Rosenzweig to Martin Buber to Levinas. This was explicitly stated from the outset, and an appendix was provided to further explain the foundation of Jewish thought that my argument was based on.

But from the moment that first question was posed during my defence, the problem seemed clear: the possibility of me speaking as an individual within a context of religious belief and thought was automatically rejected in favour of the certainty that in speaking about religious convictions, I was necessarily speaking for them. Once I appealed to "religious sources," I had exposed myself as a person educated in the Jewish tradition, and as a result, I was assumed to be speaking on behalf of it rather than on behalf of myself, as if it is not possible to incorporate aspects of a religious tradition without resorting to dogma.

The Kirshner File

As withdrawal looms, Israel's mood turns darker

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The atmosphere in Israel is growing increasingly divisive as Prime Minister Ariel Sharon nudges his unilateral disengagement plan forward. Some observers have compared the current mood to the summer and autumn of 1995, when Israelis quarrelled bitterly over the Oslo peace process and mourned the murder of their leader, Yitzhak Rabin.

Ten years after the shock of Rabin's assassination, Israelis are squaring off yet again, even though Sharon's phased withdrawal plan from the Gaza Strip and four isolated settlements in the northern West Bank already seems like a fait accompli.

The plan, which takes effect on July 20, cleared its last two legislative hurdles on March 28 and 29, when the Knesset rejected a bill for a national referendum on the pullout and passed the 2005 state budget.

As a result, Sharon is now free to pursue his grand strategy of sacrificing dispensable settlements while keeping far more important territorial assets – namely key settlement blocs in the West Bank, where the vast majority of settlers live.

Alluding to this on April 11, following Sharon's meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush at his Texas ranch, Sharon said, "The settlement blocs will remain in Israel's hands in any final-status agreement, no matter the repercussions."

Sharon sounded an identical theme on April 5 during his first meeting with settlers in many months. "I'm trying to save the land of Israel," he declared in a statement clearly designed to ease their fears over his intentions and to facilitate their departure from their homes peacefully.

But to diehards and extremists from the national religious camp, the notion of territorial compromise is completely unacceptable, an abomination that must be fought tooth and nail.

Indeed, after the Knesset overwhelmingly rejected the referendum bill, which was supported by some of Sharon's key allies, Yesha – the well-oiled organization that represents the settlers – issued an inflammatory statement raising the spectre of civil war.

It was a deliberate tactic, aimed at sowing fear that the planned withdrawal will do more harm than good. But about 70 per cent of Israelis do not buy this argument, support the disengagement and deem it in Israel's interests.

The settlers, ranging from law-abiding citizens to vigilantes with a bent for violence, have not been discouraged or deterred by the forces arrayed against them.

As they have done from the moment Sharon announced his intention to vacate 21 settlements in Gaza and four in the West Bank, the settlers and their sympathizers have mounted a concerted public relations campaign to demonize the disengagement as a betrayal and a disaster.

Some have urged their followers to "disengage from the State of Israel." Still others, such as Rabbi Dov Lior, chair of the Council of Rabbis of Judea, Samaria and Gaza, have voiced "understanding" for those who would sacrifice their lives on behalf of the cause.

Noam Livnat, the brother of Education Minister Limor Livnat – who only reluctantly supports the withdrawal – has formed Defensive Shield, a group whose goal is to convince 10,000 soldiers to sign a petition pledging not to evacuate settlements. Defensive Shield, whose objectives are opposed by the chief of staff, has collected 3,000 signatures, and plans to take civil action against officers who participate in the evacuation.

In a similar development, settlers in Gush Katif, the main bloc of settlements in Gaza, have circulated a petition on the Internet calling on Israelis to refrain from serving in the armed forces if the withdrawal goes through.

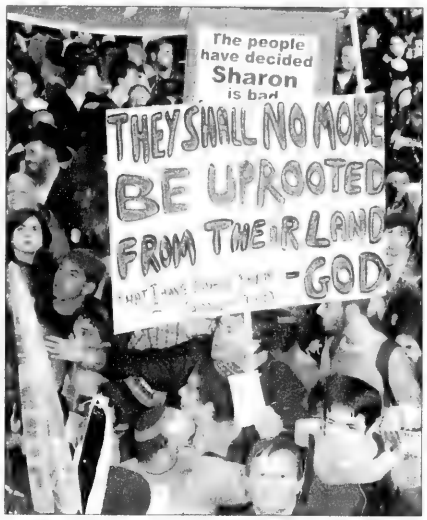
Meanwhile, religious army officers, including the Israel Defence Forces' chief rabbi, Brig. Gen. Yisrael Weiss, have come under pressure to disassociate themselves from the disengagement.

Settlers hope that if sufficient numbers of religious soldiers disobey orders, the army's ability to implement the withdrawal will be hampered. But the concept of "mass refusal" they are promoting simply is not working, and the army has every intention of completing the evacuation within a month, if not actually sooner.

In addition, anti-disengagement protesters have taken to blocking major roads near Tel Aviv, Netanya and Jerusalem during the rush hour to register their disapproval of the government's policy.

Police believe that these protests will increase as summer approaches. The tactic reminds observers of the road blockages the far-right Zo Artzeinu movement, headed by Moshe Feiglin, organized in the summer of 1995 to stymie Oslo.

Having been given advance warning that settlements slated for extinction will soon be off-limits to non-residents, hundreds of Israelis have reportedly moved to Gaza and the West Bank in a gesture of solidarity with the settlers.



Demonstrators protest Israel's forthcoming withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and four West Bank settlements. [Israel Sun photo]

Israel Radio has reported that 600 families have streamed into Gaza, joining the existing 1,700 families that have been ordered to leave. Effi Eitam, the former leader of the National Religious Party, has promised to settle in Gush Katif by Passover.

There are no concrete figures as to how many Israelis intend to move to the West Bank settlements affected by the disengagement. But recently, Arieh Eldad of the National Union, which quit Sharon's coalition in protest over his policy, said he would move to Sa Nur, one of the settlements whose fate has been sealed.

Opponents of withdrawal also have fallen back on another familiar ploy. They are trying to blacken Sharon's name and reputation by comparing him to Hitler. Harping on a related theme, Chabad rabbis have claimed that he is leading Israel toward a second Holocaust.

Photomontages of Sharon wearing Joseph Stalin's uniform have popped up on walls, just as photographs of Rabin as an SS officer were brazenly carried on placards in rowdy demonstrations.

Stickers reading "Rabin is waiting for Arik" – Sharon's nickname – have appeared as well.

On perhaps a more visceral level, vandals have defaced Rabin's grave on Mount Herzl, spray painting the words "murderous dog" on his headstone, and threatened to deface the gravestone of Sharon's beloved wife.

Like-minded extremists have written threatening letters to a few cabinet ministers, including Sharon. Since then, their security details have been beefed up.

As a last resort, ideologues have threatened to attack the Temple Mount, a site holy to Jews and Muslims alike, to stop the disengagement. Moshe Katsav, Israel's president, has warned that such an attack would cause incalculable damage. Cognizant of the potential dangers, police have banned anti-disengagement activists from the grounds of the Temple Mount.

Minister of Internal Security Gidon Ezra and Attorney General Menachem Mazuz have also made it known that illegal activities will not be tolerated.

Dangerous people will be placed under administrative detention. Israelis engaging in incitement will be charged. Weapons will be confiscated. Road blockers will be arrested.

The government is taking no chances, but violence is bound to erupt when push comes to shove later this year.

The withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the West Bank will be a gut-wrenching experience for Israel.

Passover food drive falls short of goal

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Volunteers for the National Council of Jewish Women's 22nd annual Passover food drive felt conflicting emotions at the close of this year's campaign.

On the one hand, said Sheila Mostyn, who co-ordinated the drive with Paula Frisch, "delivery day [on Sunday] was the most incredible heartwarming experience.

"People came through with a smile on their face. The outpouring was unbelievable."

On the other hand, however, the drive has fallen short of its goal.

"It's been slow with food coming in, and cash donations aren't coming in as quickly as we'd like," Mostyn said.

"Last year, we were done packing the food a couple of days before. This year we were still packing on Friday afternoon [before Sunday's delivery], because the food was not coming in fast enough."

As well, she said, volunteers had to purchase food on Friday to fill the boxes.

The shortfall is due to a combination of fewer donations and more people needing help, Mostyn said.

"The situation has become desperate. Even though we're not a food depot, people are coming to our doors to get food. [The food drive] is a band-aid solution for the most expensive holiday of the year."

Mostyn said that one woman phoned her on Sunday afternoon in tears, because she had waited all day and her delivery did not come.

"Somehow, her name had dropped off our list. We found it, and I delivered her box personally. She was dressed up, wearing pearls and make-up, waiting for someone to come. We both cried. It is devastating to see people suffer."

The National Council of Jewish Women's annual Passover food drive was held last Sunday.

At this point, monetary donations would be the most useful, because the main food delivery is done, Mostyn said.

Jewish Toronto

Jewish life thriving south of St.Clair

Downtown offers something for everyone

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

The demographics of the Jewish population in the Toronto downtown core have seen major shifts and changes since the first Jews made it their home in the late 1800s. According to a 2001 census poll, 20,060 Jews reside downtown, a growth of 23% since 1991. As Jewish immigrants once made it their goal to move up and out of the downtown area, young Jewish couples are now making it their ambition to move back downtown and reclaim a piece of their history.

Lainie Rapp and Gary Cilevitz are newly married and purposely chose the neighborhood of Dundas and Jarvis to make their home together. It was an easy choice for Rapp, having studied and worked in Manhattan. But for Cilevitz, a native of Thornhill, the move downtown was less obvious. Having made the decision the results could not have been better.

"It's funky and fun where we live," Rapp explained. "The diversity and multiculturalism of our neighborhood is important to us. It's vibrant and we take advantage of everything it has to offer," she continued. "Yet we have not compromised our Jewishness; the entire city is so accessible to us. In fact, as Jews, we add to the cultural mosaic, and we have been embraced wholeheartedly."

Joe Milstone, a native Torontonian also grew up north of St.Clair but, when it came time to branch out on his own, he made his home in the Annex (Bloor and Spadina). Now married with two children, the Annex offers his family the lifestyle he and his wife have always wanted.

"We love our neighborhood, the vibrancy, the restaurants, the diversity you find in people that live down here," Milstone said. "We want our children to be a part of that diversity. But we also have the Miles Nadal JCC and I attend the First Narayever for High Holidays. We just have the right mix of everything."

At the same time, older couples are also looking to retire in the downtown core because it lets them enjoy the city's arts and culture without worrying about transportation. "At this stage in our lives, we want to be closer to restaurants, shops, theatre," said Judy Gwartz, who retired with her husband Jack to a downtown condo four years ago. "We're in the retirement age. It's a good lifestyle for us."

"My aunt's husband came from immigrant parents," Rapp added, "and he always says, it took him 30 years to move up over the Hill, and he spent the rest of his life trying to get back down. It just goes to show you, downtown appeals to almost everyone and, as Jews, we definitely have a place there."

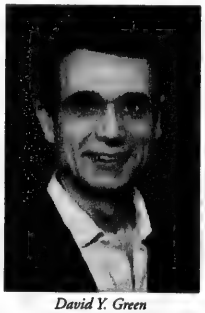
Annex a hub of Jewish life

David Y. Green was born on Major Street in Toronto's Annex (Bloor and Spadina), but moved north up Bathurst Street as the trend for young Jewish families dictated. When Green was 18 however, he returned downtown and has been there ever since.



David Y. Green

"There is a clear change in the demographic of the area," he explained. "I live in the Annex now and my block is probably 30 percent Jewish. Our Jewish institutions are thriving. Membership at the Miles Nadal JCC has increased after the renovations from 1600 members to 2500. The Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School has waiting lists. It's just a wonderful place to live."

His belief in the downtown core is demonstrated in his professional life as a developer. He is now in the process of building condominiums at Spadina and Bloor.

"The sales of the condos have exceeded all my expectation," said Green. "There is just this huge interest in the area, from singles to couples, to empty nesters. And there is no question in my mind that the vibrancy of Jewish life in this neighborhood plays a huge role in the appeal."

Jewish institutions an integral part of downtown

The first Jews to settle in Toronto at the turn of the 20th century made their homes in the downtown core, finding work and cheap housing. As opportunities increased and incomes grew, many Jews traveled north, out of downtown, in search of single dwelling homes they could afford and more land to expand with their needs. But even as the population changed and evolved, Jewish institutions in the downtown core have always had a presence and an important role to play in the lives of the Jewish community.

The cornerstone of the downtown Jewish community today, the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre was an integral part of the Jewish landscape when it was established as the Hebrew Literary & Athletic Club in 1919 before its incarnation as the Bloor JCC. Over the years, the name of the facility has changed but the significant contributions it has made to the Jewish life of the downtown core has never faltered.

"As parents raising our children in the Annex, it's very comforting to have the Miles Nadal JCC so close by with all its facilities," Stacey Helpert explained. "Our two-year-old attends programs there. We may send our children to the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School. Having the multi-culturalism and flavor of downtown with the Jewish resources of the Miles Nadal JCC is like having the best of both worlds."

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, the spiritual, intellectual and social centre of Jewish life on campus at the University of Toronto, situated at Harbord and Huron, opened March 2004. The 10,000 square foot building acts as a beacon for 4,500 Jewish students from U of T, who find immense value in the facilities the Centre provides, including all the programs presented by Hillel of greater Toronto, which uses the Centre as its Toronto headquarters.

"The people who drop by are of all ages and religious backgrounds, and everyone is welcome," Lisa Isen Baumal, director at the Wolfond Centre, said. "Jewish programming - parties, study sessions, movie nights - all take place during the academic year."

Jewish institutions still flavour the downtown Toronto landscape.

Traveling east from the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life towards the Danforth and Beaches area, Jewish life still thrives. Although still part of the downtown Jewish population, those choosing to live in the Danforth or Beaches area see themselves as a distinct group sustained by their own unique institutions.

The Danforth, traditionally known as "Greek Town," boasts two synagogues-the Jewish Circle and Shir Libeynu Synagogue. The Beach Hebrew Institute is one of the oldest synagogues in Toronto. In the beginning, the Shul acted as an oasis for Jews in an area which was not always hospitable toward Jews. The shul's name, Beach Hebrew Institute, deliberately did not include the word "synagogue."

"The synagogue has continued to be an integral part of the Beaches community since 1920," Arie Nerman, president of the synagogue, explained. "The shul prides itself on an open door policy during High Holidays and we are proud to say today it remains a thriving Jewish institution."

Women's Campaign & Advocacy installs new executive

Linda Frum takes the reins for 2006

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Linda Frum is the new chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy, following her recent installation at the Lipa Green Building.

Outgoing chair Fran Sonshine passed the torch to Frum, and to Judith Finer-Freedman, the new vice chair, following an impressive year in which $7 million was raised, and 60 new Lions of Judah came aboard. The Lion of Judah distinction is given to women who make annual contributions of at least $5,000 to the UJA Federation annual campaign.

After praising Sonshine and her outgoing board, Frum - who accompanied Honey Sherman and Warren Kimel, chairs of UJA Federation Campaign 2006, on a fact-finding mission to Israel in February - addressed the key elements of the upcoming campaign.

"Mercifully, the terror campaign against Israel has cooled," said Frum. "And, while it is funny to think of it this way, it gives us back the luxury of focusing our attention on young people at risk, and the economically disadvantaged, both in Israel and in our own backyard. It also allows us to help the waves of impoverished immigrants arriving in Israel, whose needs, by necessity, have been shunted aside these past calamitous years."

"What I learned this year was that the importance of Women's Campaign should not be taken lightly," said Sonshine. "Together, we have all helped to support important programs here and in Israel, and to ensure that the Jewish world remains strong and united."

"With the help of all the fabulous women in this room, we are going to make 2006 a proud year in the history of UJA Federation, as we bring comfort and aid to vulnerable Jewish people at home and in Israel," added Frum.

The installation, emceed by Barbara Bregman, also featured a moving address by guest speaker Rabbi Yael Splansky, the associate rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple.

Members of the UJA Federation Women's Campaign & Advocacy 2006 Executive are:

Executive Chairs - Tobie Bekhor and Kitty Grossman, Atarah; Linda Waks and Liora Yakubowicz, Lion of Judah; Fran Sonshine, Lion of Judah Endowment; Anita Robins and Laurie Sheff, Pacesetter; Karen Greenglass and Marley Greenglass, Telethon; Maura Cooperberg and Ellen Novack, Advocacy; Susan Maldoff, Board Development; Edie Harlang, Outreach & Engagement.

Renee Gozlan and Honey Rubenstein, Sapphire Event; Maxine Granovsky-Gluskin and Shanitha Kachan, Atarah Breakfast; Andrea Cohen, Lisa Draper and Sandra Waldman, Lion of Judah Event; Judy Gwartz, Past Chairs Representative.

Walk with Israel 2005 bringing families together

Teach your children well

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Keeping it in the family is a phrase Nelly Zagdanski, Sara Zagdanski, Felicia Posluns and Beth Singer take seriously. These four women, related by marriage, who are the co-chairs of UJA Federation's Walk with Israel 2005, have found that serving the community is more enriching and fulfilling when they do it together as one family.

UJA Federation's Walk with Israel 2005, Canada's largest one-day Israel solidarity event, takes place on May 29th, starting with registration at 9:30 a.m. at Coronation Park across from the CNE's Princes' Gates. Last year's Walk with Israel brought out more than 15,000 men, women and children.

The four sisters-in-law came to community service in different ways but they have always made it a part of their lives.

"We always gave to UJA," Singer explained, "and we love the Walk, but each of us has always been interested in community work. Sara and I work for the Association for Soldiers of Israel, and Nelly volunteers with Baycrest as well. Our husbands are committed to community work too; it's a family thing," she continued.

With 12 children among them, the impact of giving as a tool to teach their children is not lost on the women. They understand that they act as a role model for their children and expect them to follow in their footsteps.

"This is such a positive experience for our children," Posluns said. "They can see first hand that giving is not only about donating money but it is also about giving time and energy. They go hand-in-hand and our children really understand that."

For the past two years, the women co-chaired the RioCan Festival at Ontario Place following the Walk, which is also one of this year's highlights. The Festival will offer a little something for everyone, with games, rides and a kosher barbeque.

"I think at first just two of us were asked to chair the entire Walk after our experience chairing the Festival, but it was all of us, or none of us." Posluns reflected. "It's a bit unusual to have four co-chairs, but we all work so well together and have so much fun, it was just natural. I am so happy we did it. It's been a fabulous experience."

An old association renewed

A new supervisor of the pre-school enhancement program at Associated Hebrew Schools

There are many ways one can give back to the community. Yet for Eynat Katz, it was pretty clear where she would devote her time and energy. A graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools herself, she was happy to come full circle and work to improve the quality of the education of the school she loved as a child.

Holding both a Bachelors degree in education, as well as a Masters degree in Psychology, Katz worked at the Hospital for Sick Kids and Surrey Place Center, but was eventually drawn back to education and finally to Associated itself.

"I was a psycho-educational consultant for Associated through JVS Toronto (formerly Jewish Vocational Services) for seven years," Katz explained. "This year I was hired full time by the school and I am thrilled to be working here in an institution I really believe in."

Eynat Katz, new supervisor of the pre-school enhancement program at Associated, working one-on-one with a student.

As the new supervisor of the pre-school, Katz has worked together with the school's vice principals Surie Nagel and Susan Herberman to create a unique environment for young children.

"This program will enable our educators to identify the special needs of our students preventatively," Katz enthused. "We evaluate each child in an effort to understand what their strengths and weaknesses are and arm teachers with appropriate learning strategies to match each student's needs. We are empowering both our students and our teachers and this shift in thinking about how we educate our preschoolers is already meeting with success."

Katz's belief in the school is backed up by the fact that her own children, four and eight, attend Associated; a second generation in one family being educated in the same institution.

"Associated has the reputation of being the Jewish Day School of the community and I think that's important. We will continue to challenge our self and raise the bar of excellence. The future looks very promising."

This year, more than 2,300 students are enrolled in preschools affiliated with Jewish Day and supplementary schools.

NCSY reaches out to young teens

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the first time in history, young people are influencing their parents and grandparents with respect to their Judaism, says Stephen Savitsky, the new president of Orthodox Union (OU).

"We're living in a phenomenal time: young people are searching for their roots, and they're taking what they learn home," says Savitsky, also the international head of the 50-year-old National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), an organization under the OU umbrella.

Savitsky, who is based in New York, was in Toronto recently to, among other things, meet with Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director of NCSY.

This is an outreach program that has been validated to be effective in keeping young people Jewish, says Savitsky.

"[The teen years] are the right time for young people to get involved. They don't come with preconceived notions and they're open to new ideas. Ultimately, they take this involvement home.

"The Torah says that every period is different, and we are living proof. Instead of the parents bringing back the children, the children are bringing back the parents. We've come full circle."

Despite NCSY's efforts to bring youth programs that are vigorous and exciting, however, "we are still battling assimilation and intermarriage," he says.

"We are working [within a window of time]. In 20 years, it will be so much harder to bring people back. They won't be here to hear this message. Today, we still have a core of Jewish people. It is a matter of reaching the right kids at the right time."

When teens come to NCSY, he says, they see people who are passionate about what they do. "They actively participate in community causes, and everything is centred around Judaism.

"The idea is to develop techniques to reach these teens. We need to find out where they are, and we must touch their souls. When we touch their souls, we change their lives."

One of the most frustrating aspects of his job, he says, is to find the budget to sponsor all the programs he would like to see in place.

"I have to convince people that we will get results from what we are doing. The results will be that kids will stay Jewish and they will be proud of who they are. Only then will our tradition carry on for another generation.

"I believe that we have a product that works – that wins."

HAIFA FOUNDATION: The Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation recently gathered for its first meeting in Toronto. The foundation is dedicated to the promotion of Haifa's vision of pluralism and harmony, while being a model for the future peace in Israel. Its outstanding record of coexistence is achieved by nurturing Jewish, Christian, Muslim, Bahai, Druze and Ahmedian mutual respect in the city for the last 100 years, supporting immigrant absorption, culture and sport and urban beautification and environment. The mayor of Haifa, Yona Yahav, is expected to visit Toronto and Hamilton in May. Separating conjoined twins is 'glatt kosher surgery'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Chaim Rapoport, advisor to the chief rabbi of the British Commonwealth on medical ethics, said the recent separation of conjoined twins in Toronto was "glatt kosher sugery."

The so-far successful separating of conjoined twins Tinotenda and Tenashe Mufuka was the topic of a recent Torah in Motion program.

Children in a conjoined sate, he said, are in a precarious state. Their very existence when joined is a danger to both of them. If there is good reason to believe that the operation would be successful, then the risk is justified.

The event, held at Shaarei Shomayim synagogue, highlighted the efforts of fourth-year University of Toronto obstetrics and gynecology resident Dr. Rachel Spitzer, who delivered the twins in a small hospital in Zimbabwe and then arranged for them to be brought to Toronto, and Dr. Jacob Langer, professor of surgery, University of Toronto, and chief of pediatric general surgery at the Hospital for Sick Children, who separated the twins last March.

Nevertheless, Langer, Spitzer and Rabbi Rapoport all noted that the separation was not without questions of medical and Jewish ethics. These included the consideration of whether it would have been permitted to sacrifice one of the twins to save the other if that had been necessary (it wasn't necessary, as it turned out) or whether it was ethical at all to spend all that effort, time and money to save these children when the need in Canada is so great.

Spitzer was working in a 130-bed Salvation Army Howard Hospital in Glendale, Zimbabwe, when she met Elizabeth Mufuka, a mother in her 32nd week of pregnancy, whose midwives believed that she was carrying twins.

Delivered by Toronto doctor

When Mufuka came to Howard Hospital, Dr. Paul Thistle, a former Torontonian working in maternal health there, diagnosed conjoined twins with a shared liver but separate hearts.

Spitzer said that she was never sure just how much Mufuka understood of what was going on, but she did realize that something was wrong.

"Consider," Spitzer said, dealing with such a complicated matter without a CT or MRI machine, no Internet closer than Harare, quite a distance away, and generally primitive conditions.

Nevertheless, she said, on July 20, 2004, she and Thistle delivered the twins by uncomplicated Caesarean section. Outside of cleft lips and palates, they were born "healthy and screaming."

Slides showed Tinotenda and Tinashe lying in a crib, joined from chest bone to the lower abdomen. Tinotenda was considerably smaller than his brother, indicating potential problems.

Spitzer sprang into action, contacting the Hospital for Sick Children and its Herbie Fund; Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee; the Salvation Army, who paid for the flights and an apartment in Toronto; and the Canadian Automobile Association, who provided adult health insurance.

Help also came from Shaarei Shomayim, B'nai Brith Canada lodges Forestdale Heights and Thornhill, IBI Group, the Bessin Family Foundation and many individuals.

After being cleared by Howard Hospital and by a pediatric cardiologist, the babies, their mother and a nurse made the arduous flight to Toronto in the fall. They had to be prepared for what they would find here, not just the urban environment but the winter weather.

Langer itemized the difficult preparation for separating the babies. They were both skinny and malnourished and had to be properly fed and cared for. The smaller size of one of them, he said, might have indicated that there wasn't enough bowel to enable them both to survive, or an inadequate blood flow, which would have the same effect.

As well, they shared a single umbilical cord, which sent the cord blood through the shared liver, Langer said.

The investigation was exhaustive, including X-rays, CT and MRI scans, echocardiograms, nuclear medicine tests, medical evaluation and nutritional assessments.

A team had to be assembled and their duties organized: a surgical team, anesthetists, critical care staff, occupational and physical therapists, nurses and ethics staff.

Some of the team members were needed because the twins couldn't move or roll over. As well, because of their cleft lips and palates, they had to be taught to drink.

The tissue joining the babies had to be expanded, so that it would be possible to cover the incision where the separation would occur.

The twins were separated in early March and so far appear to be doing well. At a recent press conference, the Hospital for Sick Children said that they were discharged from the hospital, and would come back for tests and treatments.

'God smiles when we gather together,' minister tells interfaith dinner

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jews and Christians must continue to work together and develop even stronger ties of justice and peace, said the keynote speaker at a recent interfaith dinner.

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum

Speaking at the 19th annual Neighbourhood Interfaith Dinner, Rev. Andrew Stirling, the senior minister of Timothy Eaton Memorial Church, spoke of a shared sense of justice, righteousness and peace in an enthusiastically received talk for which he received a standing ovation.

The sold-out event was attended by 275 people, representing 13 local churches and synagogues. Both grace and Hamotzi preceded the kosher dinner at Yorkminster Park Baptist Church, which was followed by Birkat Hamazon and a closing benediction.

Rev. Stirling said that taking part in Bearing Faithful Witness – the United Church's 1997 document of outreach to, and reconciliation with, Jews – brought him to a realization of "the vibrancy of Judaism as a living religion," the severity of anti-Semitism, and a deeper understanding of the impact of the Shoah – an issue he grappled with as early as age 12, when he learned about the Holocaust from his closest friend, who was Jewish.

He also came to "a deeper realization of the Jewishness of Jesus," he said, adding that much of that Jewishness had been "suppressed and avoided."

Rev. Stirling said that when he first came to the Timothy Eaton church, he was expected to foster good relations with the Jewish community and with other Christian communities. That's when he knew he was in the right place, he said.

A native of England, Rev. Stirling moved to Cape Town with his parents, but eventually had to leave South Africa for his anti-apartheid views. He served in Ottawa before moving to Toronto.

Rev. Andrew Stirling

"What a blessing it is for Jews and Christians to be in one room together, to sit at a table together and to eat together," he said. "I can only say I believe the Almighty smiles when we gather together."

Rev. Stirling also said he realizes God's covenant with Israel is "inviolable. If that is not the case… then God is a liar."

He noted that Jews and Christians worship the same God, adding that he understands that "for Jews, the Christian worship of God is not a viable option."

He said he tells intermarried Jewish-Christian couples who wonder how to bring up their children that all he cares about as a pastor is that the children "love God and know that God loves them."

"That is the highest purpose, the loftiest of goals – to recognize that we worship the same God," he said.

On a practical level, he noted that not all differences can be worked out, but that Jews and Christians must keep the lines of communication open.

In thanking him, Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec Congregation called Rev. Stirling "our friend in laying out a path that I hope we can follow."

Project Chazak: more than an anti-bullying program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Netivot HaTorah Day School recently brought in York University student Jay Solomon, youth co-ordinator for the Canadian Initiative for the Prevention of Bullying, to talk about bullying to grades 6, 7 and 8 students.

As part of his interactive presentation, he called two volunteers to the front of the group of about 150 students to act out a scene of physical aggression.

When the pair were returning to their seats, a third boy, from his seat in the audience, suggested in a wisecracking tone that the "aggressor" hit the other student harder next time. A teacher quickly went over to him and quietly asked him to think about the appropriateness of his comment – putting into action a bit of what the students have been learning this year about not being a bystander.

The presentation was just one event comprising the school's "Project Chazak Day," for which regular classes were suspended. Other guests for the day included a police officer, a Holocaust survivor and a theatre troupe who did role playing with the students. Project Chazak, which began last fall, is an ongoing endeavour at the school.

The project's name – the Hebrew word for "strong" – is, in this instance, also an acronym for "choices, action, zeal, accountability and kavod (honour)."

Netivot HaTorah Day School recently celebrated Project Chazak with an evening of student performances and displays of artwork. Project Chazak emphasizes tolerance, respect, and responsibility in student interpersonal relations. [Rebecca Ansel photo]

The school-wide undertaking was developed by Netivot administrators, including Robyn Shiner, vice-principal of general studies, who proposed an initial idea after reading up on bullying issues last summer. There had been incidents at several day schools, and there were issues at Netivot, too, she said.

"But we do not see this as an anti-bullying program," she said. "We see it as much more than that." The program, with which most of the teachers are involved as committee members, focuses on social skills and interrelationships, she explained.

Although much of the Judaic program at the school is devoted to how to treat others, Rabbi Elliott Diamond, vice-principal of Jewish Studies, said the Chazak program offers "a more concentrated focus" and an opportunity to tackle the same issues schoolwide using additional sources that might not be part of the regular curriculum. "It's helped us to broaden our discussion," he said.

"We're trying to raise the consciousness of our student body [about] how to speak up and take action when you witness injustices," Shiner told The CJN. "The whole program focuses on developing those skills and awareness."

One aspect of the program involves "real-life situations" that are presented every two weeks. Students are invited to offer solutions to the problems, and the student council picks five of the best-written answers to be read over the PA system. At the same time, related discussions take place in class, and the scenarios are written up in the school's Netivon newsletter, so families can discuss them at home, said Shiner. It's important that the program touch the whole school community, she noted.

Other aspects of the program include art projects, social skills training and professional development for teachers.

Since the program began, teachers and students have shown an increase in awareness and ability to deal with social issues, Shiner said. However, she noted, "we don't expect to see huge changes overnight. It is a process. Over a period of two to three years, we're hoping to move everybody significantly forward."

200 agents and counting: "make life easier, and they will come"

Murray Goldkind

Sutton Group Admiral Realty has often been described as the "little company that grew." How do you attract over 200 top agents in 13 short years? By maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle, say Toronto real estate Brokers Sol & Murray Goldkind.

"What an agent wants is to sell real estate, pure and simple," says Murray. "That's what we help them do. We give them the tools they need, help when they need it, and an atmosphere that is second to none."

According to the Goldkinds, top agents are now looking for service-oriented environments without rigid structure. That means access to the latest computer facilities and a full compliment of the latest personal marketing and career management software and tools. Sutton Group Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept, which lets agents pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent, acting as his or her own businessperson, enjoys the benefit of controlling their bottom line.

Says Sol, "timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes we are both proud and confident to provide the concept that agents are looking for both now and in the future."

Youths acquitted of hate charges in vandalism case

An Ontario Court judge has convicted two youths of mischief – but acquitted them of the more serious charges of promoting hate and targeting religious property– in connection with a series of vandalism incidents last year that saw cemetery headstones overturned, synagogue windows smashed and swastikas painted on UJA Federation billboards.

Judge Walter Gonet said the two young people, who were 15 at the time, committed the mischief in a bid to get themselves on television. That did not amount to an intention to promote hatred against an identifiable group, as required by the Criminal Code in order to secure a conviction, he said.

Gonet said the boys committed the offences after witnessing extensive coverage of earlier incidents in which homes were painted with swastikas. The two youths and an adult, who has not yet been tried, drank some alcohol, committed the acts and then went home to see if what they'd done was being reported on TV.

While welcoming the mischief convictions, Jewish groups said they were disappointed with the judge's decision on the hate promotion charges.

"We are disappointed the judge felt the legal level of bias required for conviction was not met," said Joel Richler, chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The incidents outraged the Jewish and the wider community. "It wasn't just gravestones that were toppled, it was an attack on the hearts of all those who abhor hatred," he said.

"Motivation can be deduced from the nature of an act and the fact the graffiti included swastikas and symbols of the SS tells us that hate was an element of this crime. The special provisions in this legislation specifically include places of worship and cemeteries, which were the exact targets in this case," he said.

"The court has failed to recognize the hate-motivated aspects of this crime, which had a deep impact on the Jewish community," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada. "It is exactly in such cases that we look to the court to send a strong message of deterrence."

Noting that the crimes took place during a record year of anti-Semitic incidents, Dimant said, "Instead of recognizing the gravity of these hate-filled acts, the court has been all too willing to dismiss them as merely youthful pranks. What message does this send to today's youth?"

B'nai Brith urged the Crown to appeal the acquittal while Congress suggested the impact on the Jewish community and the "bias motivation" should be considered aggravating factors when sentence is pronounced.

The two youths will be sentenced on June 24.

Orthodox rabbis oppose same-sex marriage bill

Major Canadian Orthodox Jewish groups have joined together to reiterate their opposition to Bill C-38, the federal government's legislation to change the definition of marriage to include same-sex nuptials.

The organizations involved are the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, the Rabbinical Council of Canada (Montreal • Region), Grand Rabbinat du Quebec, Agudath Israel of Toronto and Montreal, Mizrachi of Canada and the Orthodox Union of America (Canada region).

Rabbi Baruch Taub

A coalition press release said it sees the legislation "as a dangerous experiment in social engineering that is not benign to the greater society.

"While the coalition does not condone discrimination, not every privilege is a right, nor should every institution be open to government fiat," the statement said.

Rabbi Baruch Taub, spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph to Toronto Congregation and the coalition's spokesperson, added, "Articulating a public stance against government legislation is not a matter taken lightly by the various groups comprising the coalition. However, there was a clear consensus that, as proud Canadian citizens, the Orthodox Jewish community could no longer remain a silent spectator to an attack on this basic societal cornerstone.

"A fundamental principle of the Jewish tradition is the integrity and sanctity of marriage, the bedrock of civilization and traditional morality for thousands of years. That tradition, with its source in the Divine Torah, defines marriage clearly and unambiguously as the union of a man and woman in matrimony."

The coalition is calling on all Canadians to protest in writing to Prime Minister Paul Martin, as well as to their MPs.

Ontario hate crime unit caught in funding gap

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Provincial funding for the hate crime/extremism unit, which serves seven police intelligence departments in southern Ontario, ran out in late March, leaving the organization in the dark as to its future.

The unit has been told by Dave Bedard, project manager of Organized Crime Strategy of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, that it will receive seed or start-up money for infrastructure (equipment and computers) but not enough to retain its one full-time analyst. However, late last week, Andrew Hilton, a spokesman for the minister, Monte Kwinter, appeared to reverse that decision.

"The government has made a commitment to expand hate crime units across the province," Hilton said. "We are not cutting funding for hate crimes. This is an important issue for the minister."

Retaining the unit's staffer, Abbee Corb, is key to its success, said Sgt. Don McKinnon, head of the youth and hate crime unit of the London Police Service.

By surfing the Internet, joining chat rooms and monitoring websites where extremists of left and right discuss their plans, Corb compiles the data that is used by the police departments and helps law enforcement units pre-empt possibly dangerous situations, McKinnon said.

Up to the end of March, Corb's salary along with other costs associated with the program were underwritten by the ministry. The unit had been operating on a budget of $93,000 per year.

The unit's request for $516,000 over three years to continue the work and expand to include several more police departments was turned down, McKinnon said.

The unit currently serves police departments in London, Ottawa, Hamilton and Guelph, as well as the Waterloo, Halton and Durham regions.

Corb, whose full title is open source intelligence operations specialist, said in the two years she has held the position she has compiled a large database that is accessible by all member units. The information in the data base includes visual aids (photos of tattoos and symbols employed by extremist groups), photos of events, copies of more than 2,000 intelligence reports, profiles of individuals of interest, information on international terrorism groups and other information of value to police, she said.

New money expected in next month's budget

In addition to collecting the information, Corb said she networks with other law enforcement agencies and organizations that monitor extremist groups and individuals.

"I'm the centre of the wheel, providing information to these police agencies," said Corb, who worked for the Canadian office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre before joining the police unit.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said "$500,000 over three years seems to be a small price to pay for the work it was doing."

Congress has long called on government to provide sufficient resources to police units that investigate hate groups. As extremist groups increasingly turn to the Internet to share information and plan activities, police must keep up with new technologies. "Police work is an evolving thing and the hate crime unit… is on the leading edge of that work," he said.

Congress planned to write to Kwinter "to express support for the work of the hate crime unit," he added.

Liberal MPP Khalil Ramal (London-Fanshawe) said he had discussed the question with the minister and "I don't think there's going to be any change."

He said the unit is caught in a gap between its previous funding and the announcement of new funding in the government budget next month.

Asper-inspired museum unveils winning design

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — U.S. architect Antoine Predock has won an international competition to design the new human rights museum planned for central Winnipeg, the project's organizers said last week.

The April 15 announcement that Predock had won the design contest for the Israel Asper-inspired Canadian Museum for Human Rights coincided with the 24th anniversary of the signing of Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

It also coincided with Treasury Board president Reg Alcock's pledge of $100 million toward the $200-million museum, which is scheduled to open in 2008 at the Forks, the meeting point of the Red and Assiniboine rivers.

The federal funding, which organizers have maintained was originally promised by former Liberal prime minister Jean Chrétien, had been in some doubt since Paul Martin became prime minister and led his party to minority status in last spring's election.

But Alcock, Manitoba's senior federal minister, told the 1,000 people who gathered at the Centennial Concert Hall for the design unveiling that Martin is strongly committed to the project, and he said many of his cabinet colleagues, as well as deputy ministers and other bureaucrats, are also excited about it.

Predock called winning the design competition a highlight of his career.

His design rises out of the ground and is meant to symbolize ice, clouds and stone in a field of sweet grass.

Asper, the founder of Canwest Global Communications, launched his campaign to build the museum in 2003. The groundbreaking ceremony was held in October 2003, two weeks after he died.

The morning program began with the screening of an interview with Asper by CBC host Evan Solomon a few weeks before his death. Asper spoke of his passion for human rights and the need for a museum devoted to the subject somewhere in the world.

Asper envisaged the museum he was proposing for Winnipeg as an international architectural landmark on par with the Sydney Opera House, Big Ben and the Eiffel Tower.

The morning event was co-hosted by Charlie Coffey, chair of the Friends of the Canadian Museum of Human Rights and the executive vice-president of governmental affairs for RBC Financial Group, and local businessperson Helene Bulger.

Prior to the announcement of the winning design, Manitoba Premier Gary Doer joined Stephen Owen, the federal minister responsible for Western economic diversification, and Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz in expressing support for the project.

Babs Asper, Asper's widow, introduced Predock. He and two Canadians made it to the final three in the international competition from an initial field of 62 architects from 21 countries. The finalists each received $100,000 to produce detailed drawings and a model.

Smith Carter Architects and Engineers will be local architect of record.

New York-based Ralph Applebaum, the world's leading interpretive museum designer, walked the audience through the project. Applebaum, the designer of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., was hired to develop content for the museum.

He described a series of galleries on different levels connected by walkways. They will include a Canadian gallery, which will explore dark periods in Canadian history, as well as a Holocaust gallery, and a "Hall of Fame and Shame" highlighting such icons as Mother Theresa and Nelson Mandela as well as others who have become synonymous with evil. There will also be a "Garden of Contemplation" and a 70-metre "Tower of Hope."

Winnipeg CJA campaign sets record

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish community's 2004 Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign ended up exceeding its target of $4.5 million by $31,000, and campaign organizers have increased this year's target to $4.65 million.

"It was the ninth year in a row that the CJA has raised the bar and met or exceeded the increased target," said Elaine Goldstine, Winnipeg CJA's new executive director. "On a card-for-card basis, our contributions are up 5.4 per cent."

Among the highlights of the 2004 campaign were 450 new gifts – totalling $132,000 – from first-time givers or individuals who hadn't given in years, and the Women's Division campaign raised more than $935,000, exceeding its goal of $910,000.

"It was a tough year, but we have a really good team of volunteers," said Goldstine, referring to the death from cancer of her popular predecessor, Gerry Koffman, in the middle of the campaign. (Goldstine was Koffman's long-time assistant campaign director.)

Larry Vickar, the 2004 campaign chair, is returning to lead the 2005 campaign. Vickar is a successful auto dealer whose father, Norman, is also a community leader and whose late uncle, Ed Vickar, was a renowned philanthropist.

Co-chairing the Women's Division campaign for the first time this year are Vickar's Israeli-born wife, Tova, and her close friend Hope Morry, whose husband, Howard, is a past president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg. Morry and Vickar co-chaired the Women's Division Lion of Judah category during the last two campaigns.

Both Larry Vickar and Goldstine are emphasizing the growing push to persuade CJA supporters to consider establishing endowments.

"Too large a percentage of the money we raise for the CJA comes from a handful of top givers," Goldstine said. "It's not easy to replace our top givers should they move away or pass away. That's why we are trying to promote endowments to the CJA."

(The CJA Endowment Fund, which was launched last year, is being administered by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.)

Also new this year is a streamlined executive committee, which has been reduced from 18 to 11 members, each of whom will have a specific responsibility.

"We are going to be asking each of our three major beneficiaries [the Board of Jewish Education, the Jewish Child and Family Service and the Rady Jewish Community Centre] to send a representative to sit on the executive committee," Goldstine said.

UTT arsonist's mom may be tried

MONTREAL – The mother of the 19-year-old man convicted of firebombing a United Talmud Torahs library last year is expected to stand trial on the charge of being an accessory after the fact in the arson.

Rouba El-Merhebi Fahd, 37, did not appear in Quebec Court last week, but her lawyer Marc Poupart said she will not change her not guilty plea that she entered in December. May 12 was the date set for her lawyers to return to court to determine how to proceed with the preliminary hearing.

The Crown's evidence is that she allegedly contacted a travel agent about buying a plane ticket to South America for her son Sleiman El-Merhebi. He was sentenced in January to a 40-month prison term for the attack on the school on April 5, 2004.

El-Merhebi Fahd was arrested last May and has been free on $10,000 bail. If convicted, her maximum sentence is seven years in jail.

Winnipeg Negev Gala to honour Asper Foundation

BY MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish National Fund (JNF) campaign goal this year is to raise $1 million to build a series of community action centres in needy communities in Israel.

JNF recently kicked off its 2005 Negev Gala campaign with a reception for organizing committee members and canvassers at the Pavillion at Assiniboine Park.

The honoree for this year's gala, scheduled for June 15 at the Centennial Concert Hall, is the Asper Foundation.

"Leadership is a complicated and challenging business," said Rami Kleinmann, the JNF shaliach for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, speaking at the reception. "Leadership requires hard work and the ability to take criticism. The Asper Foundation epitomizes leadership."

Because of the Asper Foundation's impact on Canadians of all faiths and ethnic groups, the canvassers this year are reaching out far beyond the Jewish community.

Invitations and information videos about the event and the project are going to be mailed out to 65,000 homes across western Canada.

Kleinmann said he will be meeting soon with leaders of 12 different ethnic communities in Winnipeg to lobby for their support.

Honorary chairs of the gala committee are Israeli Deputy Prime Minister and Trade and Industry Minister Ehud Olmert, and Canada's former minister of defence, Art Eggleton, who was recently appointed to the Senate.

Committee co-chairs are Toronto-based Charlie Coffee, executive vice-president, governmental and communitry affairs for the RBC Financial Group, and retired businessman and community leader Mel Lazareck, a two-term Combined Jewish Appeal campaign chair and former Negev Gala honoree with his wife, Karen.

Other committee members include national Jewish community leaders Keith Landy and Moshe Ronen, past Canadian Jewish Congress presidents (Ronen is currently vice-president of the World Jewish Congress), and Yaacov Brosh, Israel's consul general in Canada.

Also this year, a separate committee of young people has been formed to contact many of the 4,000 students who have participated in the Asper Foundation-sponsored visits to Washington and the Holocaust Museum over the past few years. The students will be encouraged to buy at least one tree each, at a cost of $18.

To help celebrate the evening, the organizing committee is bringing one of Israel's top musical acts, Duet, to Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, Montreal and Toronto. The duo combines Russian-born Israeli opera star Yevgeni Shapovalov and Israeli singer Shlomit Aharon, who sing a variety of Jewish and Israeli songs as well as songs from well-known musicals and operas.

The Asper Family opened the first community action centre in Israel, the Winnipeg Community Action Centre, in Be'er Sheva in 2002. The second, the Israel Asper Community Action Centre opened in Ofaqim in the Negev in 2003. Both are in partnership with the JNF. The third community action centre is scheduled for Migdal Ha'Emek.

The action centres provide educational, athletic and social activities and programs for underprivileged children.

"We are trying to help Israeli children escape the trap of poverty," Kleinmann said.

"We showed a video at a JNF luncheon in Toronto that was received very enthusiastically. As a result, the Toronto JNF office has undertaken to raise money to open another action centre."

Speaking for the Asper Foundation and the Asper Family, Moe Levy, the foundation's executive director, said the late Israel Asper would have been very supportive of the goal of opening more community action centres in Israel.

"The tremendous enthusiasm I am seeing here tonight shows us that we are on the right track," he said.

"We are considering opening similar community action centres in Winnipeg to benefit the underprivileged here."

FIGHTING CANCER: At a recent National Colorectal Cancer Campaign (NCCC) gala, Darryl Sittler, former Toronto Maple Leafs captain and honorary NCCC chair, is joined by Bunnie Schwartz (left), co-founder and director of the NCCC, and CTV's health reporter, Avis Favaro. Favaro was recognized for her coverage of colon cancer, one of Canada's primary health concerns. Sittler has been an avid supporter of the NCCC since his wife, Wendy, died of colon cancer. He holds the Wendy bear, named in her honour.

Members of the interfaith trip to Israel are seen near the ruins of an ancient synagogue in Old Jerusalem.

Jews, Christians study at Shrine of the Book

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A small group of Christians and Jews recently returned from a first-of-its-kind interfaith trip to Israel to study with the chief curator of the Shrine of the Book.

The group of 14 Jews and eight Christians went specifically to meet with Adolpho Roitman, who is in charge of the shrine at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem.

Roitman became something of a local celebrity in Ottawa when the exhibit "Ancient Treasures and the Dead Sea Scrolls" was at the Museum of Civilization last year. Record crowds attended the exhibit, and Roitman spoke to interfaith audiences both at the museum and outside venues in events arranged by Michael Walsh, co-chair of the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum.

Plans underway for future dialogue

Both Roitman and Walsh had hoped to continue the dialogue at the Israel Museum and came up with the idea to assemble a local mission.

Rabbi Steven Garten of Temple Israel put the wheels in motion before leaving for a three-month sabbatical in Israel. Temple Israel has a relationship with Parkdale United Church, whose members help with a hot-meal outreach program for homeless and disadvantaged people. Rev. Anthony Bailey signed on for the Israel mission, recruiting six people. The other Christians on the trip were an Anglican and a Roman Catholic.

Rabbi Garten co-ordinated the trip and arrived in Israel before the group.

"I was there to greet them when they arrived. Once they were there, I was really responsible for the trip – I dealt with the tour guides, the buses, the museum and the hotels," he said.

The group studied with Roitman and also toured Christian and Jewish sites throughout the country, seeing things through each other's eyes. They visited sites around the Sea of Galilee such as Yardenit, the baptismal site associated with John the Baptist; the synagogue at Capernaum where Jesus preached his first sermon; and the Mount of Beatitudes.

Both Rabbi Garten and Rev. Bailey spoke and led prayers at several of the sites.

"The highlight was the group sitting in the ancient synagogue at Capernaum and reading from the gospels about Jesus in the synagogue and me reading from the Talmud about the synagogue of Capernaum, and recognizing how we were really from the same roots. In the gospel piece, Jesus is invited to preach in the synagogue and in the Talmud it says that it was common for visitors to be invited to preach there," Rabbi Garten said.

Rev. Bailey, who was in Israel for the first time – but, he stressed, not the last – said "the whole trip was wonderful… at the Sea of Galilee, we re-enacted or commemorated our baptisms in the Jordan River, and our Jewish friends looked on with reverence."

Originally, Bethlehem was not on the itinerary due to security concerns, but the group's Christian members were anxious to go there, and they did so with the encouragement of former Israeli ambassador to Canada Haim Divon, who met with the group in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Garten and Rev. Bailey said plans are underway for trip participants to get together in Ottawa to continue their dialogue and build on the interfaith relationships they forged in Israel.

Political voices unite against suicide bombing

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Members of various ethnic groups joined representatives of all four political parties recently for a concert at which they voiced their opposition to suicide bombing.

"Voices of Hope in Harmony: Canadian Voices Oppose Suicide Bombing" was an evening of music and poetry held at Congregation Beth Shalom synagogue.

"Music is an international language," said organizer Floralove Katz. "Regrettably, the reason that brings us together is suicide – or what I call homicide – bombing."

Katz, director of the Ottawa Klezmer Band, which performed during the evening, co-ordinated the event with Cantor Daniel Benlolo, director of the Beth Shalom and Shira Ottawa choirs and cantor of Congregation Beth Shalom. Benlolo organized an interfaith musical evening for peace at the synagogue last year.

Evening of music and poetry held

The evening included Jethro Marks, a violist with the National Arts Centre Orchestra, and pianist Alexander Soloway. They delighted the audience with their solos.

Shakir Sheikh, of the Association of Progressive Muslims of Canada and president of the Guyanese Caribbean Muslim Association, read a poem he had written for the occasion. Poetry was also read by Sara Mirzakhani of the Coalition of Iranian Canadian Women Against Fundamentalism and by Ahmad Hassani of the Committee for Defence of Human Rights in Iran.

The second half of the program featured the gospel choirs Big Soul Project and Faith Tabernacle Group, which were joined by the Jubilee Apostolic Church Choir, the City of Refuge Church Group and the Calvary United Pentecostal Church Choir.

Susan Kadis, Liberal member of Parliament for Thornhill, said the evening was her first time in a synagogue in Ottawa and would probably not be her last.

"Homicide bombers are not martyrs," she said. "Homocide bombers must never, ever be justified or legitimized in any way, shape or form."

Stockwell Day, Tory foreign affairs critic, told an emotional story of a family affected by a homicide bombing. "A night like this gives us hope that this kind of darkness can be expelled," he said. "Together we can drive this darkness from the corners of the earth."

Ed Broadbent, New Democratic Party MP for Ottawa Centre, said that "suicide bombing, in any form whatsoever, violates all [three] of the articles of the Declaration of Human Rights. We, the global community, have a responsibility of showing the sides of peace where violence has become the norm."

The only participant to address the audience in French as well as English was Bloc Québécois MP Richard Marceau, one of the sponsors of last year's bill to institute an annual Holocaust Memorial Day. "It is time not only to raise awareness about this evil but to consider suicide bombings for what they are – crimes against humanity," he said. "Let us work together to liberate the world from the evil that is suicide bombing."

The night ended with all the musicians, choirs and poetry readers returning to the stage, where they were joined by the politicians and Justice Minister Irwin Cotler for some lively singing and dancing.

Montreal federation tightens belt to meet new local needs

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Despite a record Combined Jewish Appeal campaign, FEDERATION CJA had a $2-million shortfall in its 2005-2006 budget, which resulted in its laying off 20 staff members and reducing the hours of 12 others, as well as making major cuts in administrative and infrastructure costs.

Federation president Sylvain Abitbol, however, stressed that the community will not see any reduction in services, and the level of allocations to programs helping the neediest, including direct aid to the poor, subsidization of Jewish school fees and practical support for low-income and frail seniors, remains untouched.

Most of the jobs lost were within the federation itself and at the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors (CJCS). The federation and its 16 agencies have approximately 450 employees, including part-timers. The jobs eliminated were deemed no longer necessary or in programs that could be delivered by fewer people.

The shortfall was covered by "reallocating" $1.6 million to areas considered more important, revenue from a fund set aside for that purpose and grants from United Israel Appeal and the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal A decision was made not to eat into the capital of the federation's principal fund for extraordinary local needs, Operation Montreal.

No cuts, however, have been made in local allocations. In actual fact, about $250,000 more was spent this year, than last. In percentage terms, local spending is also up, to 55 per cent of CJA proceeds, from an unusual low of 49.5 per cent last year. By comparison, in 2002, local spending accounted for 62 per cent of the pie.

Most of the rest goes to Israel and elsewhere overseas. Montreal's contribution to national Jewish agencies and services continues to take the smallest share.

Abitbol noted basic expenditures that have to be met right off the top, such as insurance, a promised three per cent across-the-board salary increase, and adjustments to employees' pension plans as required by law, have risen substantially this year.

More money is being put into security, particularly at Jewish schools; services to the 13,000-member West Island Jewish community, which is growing and relatively young; maintaining services to children with special needs that were initiated a few years ago through a special line of the campaign; and Israel advocacy and combating anti-Semitism.

This year, Montreal doubled its contribution to the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, the Toronto-based national body created two years ago. But Abitbol said most of that came out of the special campaign for Israel two years ago and not the general campaign proceeds. "What we are contributing to CIJA is not impacting our local service delivery," he said.

Sara Tauben, chair of the community planning and allocations committee, calls this year's three-month budget review process, involving hundreds of volunteers, "the most challenging and intensive in recent memory."

Abitbol said the federation had been counting on a major boost in funding to the Jewish schools from the Quebec government, up to $10 million annually, which Premier Jean Charest backtracked on in January. The federation had planned to reallocate the $2.55 million that now goes toward tuition assistance, and to use the funds for the general operation of the Jewish schools.

However, the loss of nearly a million dollars from Centraide has not had a significant impact on community coffers because the individual allocations to four agencies this year will total a similar amount. The beneficiaries are CJCS, Project Genesis, Camp B'nai Brith and Jewish Family Services.

The 2004 campaign raised just over $47 million, including $2.3 million in a parallel drive specifically for security and fighting anti-Semitism. Much of the latter has been used to purchase equipment at the 42 Jewish educational sites and to hire a co-ordinator of security at the federation.

The previous year, close to $49 million was raised, but that included $5 million for urgent needs in Israel.

A net amount of $44.9 million was left to spend this year.

One event, three accounts

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The meeting in Texas last week between U.S. President George W. Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon at the president's ranch received very different treatment by our national newspapers, raising interesting questions about the nature of news judgment.

On April 12, the Globe and Mail carried the headline, "Bush backs Sharon's plan for settlements" (with the sub-head: "But U.S. President asks Israeli PM not to expand West Bank enclaves") over a report by Paul Koring from Washington.

But the National Post's headline said "Bush nixes West Bank expansion" over an article by Washington correspondent Sheldon Alberts.

Koring's article began "Palestinians may need to cede large chunks of densely populated Jewish suburbs near Jerusalem as the price for an independent sovereign homeland, U.S. President George Bush suggested… after holding talks at his Texas ranch with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon."

On the other hand, Alberts had an entirely different opening: "George W. Bush publicly chided Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon… over a decision to expand a major Jewish settlement [Ma'ale Adumim] in the disputed West Bank, expressing concern that the move jeopardizes the chances for a peace agreement with the Palestinians."

A reader looking at both papers could only come away confused. Who had it right?

One reason for the discrepancies might be that each reporter focused on different elements of the joint press conference that followed the meeting.

Koring, for instance, drew attention to Bush's acknowledgement that in final status negotiations with the Palestinians, major West Bank settlement blocs near Jerusalem will be incorporated into Israel. This was a reiteration of Bush's letter of April 14, 2004, to Sharon.

Quoting Bush again that Israel is obligated under the "road map" peace plan to not expand settlements, Koring added that Bush and Sharon "apparently failed to reach an agreement on just what constitutes the expansion of an existing settlement."

While Koring found that Bush's "careful wording" gave Israel "sufficient wiggle room for Israel to add to Ma'ale Adumim and other West Bank settlements," Alberts was more assertive. Bush had left no room to manoeuvre.

Alberts also cited Bush's statement that "I've been very clear [that] Israel has an obligation under the road map. That's no expansion of settlements." Alberts pointed out that "Bush repeated the admonition twice more during [the] joint news conference with Mr. Sharon."

Both correspondents explained that in Israel's view, the expansion of Ma'ale Adumim is allowed under the road map "based on Mr. Bush's [2004] pledge to support the country's plans to keep large West Bank settlements under a future peace deal."

Still, because of the difference in emphasis, readers of the Globe and Mail and National Post will come away with a very different understanding of what transpired at the Bush ranch.

To complicate matters further, the headline in the New York Times story by Richard Stevenson (April 12) was "Bush supports Plan by Sharon For a Withdrawal From Gaza."

While noting that Bush and Sharon "differed openly" over Israel's plan to expand Ma'ale Adumim, Stevenson emphasized Bush's praise of Sharon as a "strong, visionary" leader for undertaking a "courageous initiative" in disengaging from Gaza and the northern West Bank this summer.

In Stevenson's account, the thrust of the meeting was for Bush to "bolster" Sharon "as he heads toward a wrenching confrontation this summer with some Jewish settlers and their allies as he moves them, perhaps forcibly, out of Gaza."

In Alberts' report, however, the Bush-Sharon disagreement over settlement expansion "overshadowed efforts by Mr. Sharon to win renewed support from Mr. Bush" for the Gaza withdrawal plan.

It seems that apparently straightforward exchanges between world leaders can be open to very different accounts. All of which brings to mind culture critic Robert Fulford's remark that journalistic objectivity is an illusion – perhaps the one truth we can, paradoxically, count on.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Event marks 60 years since death camp's liberation

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BERGEN-BELSEN — Canadian Holocaust survivors returned to the former Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in Lower Saxony last week as Germany marked the 60th anniversary of its liberation in a solemn ceremony.

The camp, now a memorial and documentation centre, was liberated by British and Canadian troops on April 15, 1945, some three weeks before Germany's official surrender.

"It was an unbelievable moment," said Manny Langer, a 74-year-old survivor from Toronto, in a reference to his sudden liberation. Langer, who was born in Lodz, Poland, spent six weeks in Auschwitz before being taken to Bergen-Belsen, 60 kilometres northeast of the stately city of Hannover.

On the day he was freed from captivity, somewhat like the Jews of ancient Egypt, Langer saw an endless column of tanks in the distance. "At first, we thought they were German tanks. You couldn't tell from far away." But when he and his fellow prisoners realized they were Allied tanks, they stormed German warehouses to sate their hunger.

When the Allies seized Bergen-Belsen, a byword for pain, brutality, fear, hunger and thirst, they found 10,000 corpses the Nazis had not buried and 58,000 surviving inmates, almost all of whom were in wretched condition.

Approximately 70,000 people, including 20,000 Soviet prisoners of war and 30,000 Jews, were killed here. Anne Frank was among the victims. After liberation, 14,000 Jews died of disease.

Allan Ironside, a photographer attached to the Royal Canadian Air Force, was shocked by the scenes of human misery he witnessed in Bergen-Belsen. In a letter written on May 4, 1945, addressed to his daughter Nancy in Orillia, Ont., he commented: "There are still nearly 300 per day dying here. Into a building which should accommodate less than 100 as many as 1,500 have been crowded... Vermin of all sorts overran the [building] and soon typhus was raging... There was no medical or dental attention. It was simply a systematic brutal plan to exterminate Jews and other enemies of the Glorious Reich."

Thirty-two Canadians, several of whom were born in Bergen-Belsen after World War II when it was used as a displaced persons camp, attended the ceremony, which was organized by the Lower Saxony ministry of education in conjunction with the World Federation of Bergen-Belsen Associations, headed by Sam Bloch.

Bloch, a 79-year-old survivor from Lithuania now lives in New York City. He was the youngest member of the Jewish Committee that administered the displaced persons camp after the war. In an interview, he said there are 6,000 to 7,000 Bergen-Belsen survivors throughout the world today.

Five hundred survivors from more than 10 countries, including Israel, Argentina, France and Hungary, converged on Bergen-Belsen on April 17 to pay homage to the dead.

The contingent from Canada was a varied one.

Regina Eisenstein of Toronto, who gave birth to her daughter Sharon here in 1946, said she came to Bergen-Belsen to say Kaddish for the Jews murdered during the Holocaust. She had no compunction about setting foot on German soil again. "It's not the same Germany. I don't hate the Germans. What does hate bring? It's destructive."

Her younger sister, Jenny, echoed her feelings. "A person must be strong enough to forgive and see them [Germans] as normal people. They were born to live, as I was."

Sam Lepek, an accountant from Toronto, and Lucy Wolkove, a retired teacher from Montreal, were both born in Bergen-Belsen, in 1947 and 1948, respectively.

Lepek, whose wife Helen's parents met and married in Bergen-Belsen, said he could no longer avoid Germany after visiting Auschwitz several years ago. "I had mixed feelings about coming here, but I realized I shouldn't be afraid. Some of my friends will never visit Germany. I told them, 'You can't put your head in the sand.'"

Wolkove, who was here with her husband, Norman, said, "You can't keep holding grudges forever."

Mina Lustiger-Thaler of London, Ont., and her sister, Annette, of Antigonish, N.S., made the journey to Bergen-Belsen to honour their late mother, Sala, who was an inmate of the camp. Their cousin, Jean-Marie Lustiger, a Jewish convert to Christianity, is a cardinal in the Catholic church.

Jennifer Podemski, a Toronto actress, said she could not resist the temptation to visit Bergen-Belsen in the company of her grandfather, Joe, a survivor.

One of the most unusual members of the Canadian delegation was Jozefa (Juno) Piltz, an 80-year-old Catholic who fought with the Home Army in Nazi-occupied Poland and was sent to Bergen-Belsen after the 1944 Polish uprising in Warsaw. Piltz, who settled in Toronto in 1953, rescued seven Jewish children and placed them in a monastery and delivered small arms to the Warsaw Ghetto fighters prior to the uprising on April 19, 1943.

Adam Fuerstenberg, who selected the delegates from Canada and directs the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, said the trip was an opportunity for survivors to find closure and honour the fallen.

Beefing up the border

Egypt may post 4,000 troops on its border with Israel to prevent arms smuggling to Palestinians. Israeli sources said talks are underway with Cairo on the proposed deployment, which effectively would do away with a clause in the 1979 Camp David peace accord requiring that the Sinai Desert be demilitarized. Security officials believe Palestinian terrorists are stockpiling weapons brought through the porous Israeli-Egyptian frontier, and have called on Cairo to crack down on the smuggling. But Yuval Steinitz, chair of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee and a critic of Egyptian policy on Israel, warned against changing the "strategic situation" in Sinai.

Mayors make peace

Israeli and Palestinian mayors met in a gesture of peacemaking. Thirty mayors met in Jericho and pledged to push their leaders to end more than four years of fighting. "We want an end to the suffering. We are brothers," said Eli Moyal, mayor of the Israeli town of Sderot, which has faced rocket attacks from Palestinians firing from Gaza. Jericho Mayor Hassan Saleh added, "Neighbourly relations cannot exist with occupation or checkpoints, nor can it exist with a killing, rocket or explosion here or there." The mayors plan a follow-up meeting in Sderot.

Israel's unfriendly skies

Hezbollah flew a spy drone over northern Israel. The Lebanese militia announced the secret foray last Monday, saying one of its Mirsar-1 drones had circled over 18 communities in northern Israel before returning safely over the border. The Israeli Air Force scrambled jets to intercept the intruder, but were too late. It was the second such infiltration by Hezbollah, which said it was retaliating for Israeli overflights in Lebanon. In November, another drone entered northern Israel but then crashed into the sea.

Farewell to arms

Israel intends to disarm Gaza Strip and West Bank settlers slated for evacuation. Under the plan, police will confiscate Gaza settlers' firearms a day before they are relocated as part of withdrawals set to begin July 20. Residents of four West Bank settlements to be evacuated will be expected to disarm two weeks in advance, as they are widely perceived as more politically extreme and likely to resort to violence if they resist the withdrawals. In carrying out the evacuations, Israel plans to send in unarmed soldiers, and to resort to paramilitary police only if settlers put up a fight.

Israeli firms on promising list

Israel boasted 20 of the 100 most promising companies on a business technology magazine's list. Israel was second only to Britain in the number of promising firms in Europe and Israel on a list compiled by Red Herring magazine.

'Germany must constantly remain alert'

The ceremony, which featured speakers ranging from politicians to clergy, was held at the imposing international monument that honours the dead of Bergen-Belsen.

The first speaker, Christian Wulff, the prime minister of Lower Saxony, expressed his sympathy and "greatest respect" for the survivors. Likening Bergen-Belsen to Auschwitz and Treblinka, he described it as a symbol of "the genocide perpetrated against our Jewish fellow citizens."

Declaring that Germany has no alternative but to deal with the burden of its Nazi past, he observed: "But these shameful memories are the source of our responsibility for the present and for the future." He endorsed a statement made recently by German President Horst Koller: "The responsibility for the Shoah is part of the German identity."

In closing, Wulff said Germany must constantly remain alert to manifestations of racism, anti-Semitism, intolerance and xenophobia.

Paul Spiegel, the president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, said anti-Semitism still poses "a serious threat" in Germany and other countries.

"We need more than just sporadic gestures of sympathy and condemnation. We need more allies from all sectors of society to exert constant public pressure and demand unambiguous gestures of solidarity on the part of the majority of society."

Bloch sounded an identical theme. "Our commemoration should help people everywhere better understand the warning bells of unconstrained racial and religious hatred and bigotry that are sounding globally unchallenged in our times now."

Simon Veil, the former French cabinet minister and president of the European Union who spent several months in Bergen-Belsen, spoke of its horrors and of the exultation of being liberated.

Menachem Rosensaft, whose late father Josef was the chief administer of the displaced persons camp until it closed in 1950, said the "critical lesson" of Bergen-Belsen cannot be overlooked – "indifference to the suffering of others is in itself a crime."

Bernd Busemann, Lower Saxony's minister of education, told survivors ground has been broken for a new 180-metre-long building to commemorate Bergen-Belsen's place in the Holocaust. Construction is expected to be finished by April 2007.

A benefit concert to raise funds for the building took place on April 16 at the Hannover Convention Centre. The program of music included works by Felix Mendelsohn-Bartholdy, Max Bruch and Gustav Mahler.

In rich, dark tones, Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple sang Adon Olam to the tune written by 19th-century German-Jewish composer Salomon Sulzer.

Close call for London Jews

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — An Al Qaeda poison plot that was uncovered in Britain reportedly targeted Jews. The Independent newspaper reported last week that an Algerian terrorist convicted of preparing large quantities of ricin had planned to use it against the London Jewish community. A British court found the Algerian, who had trained in an Al Qaeda camp in Afghanistan before moving to London, guilty last Wednesday, but it acquitted eight other Muslims in the case. It was the first conviction under tough anti-terror laws introduced by Britain after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States.

Israeli lyricist Ehud Manor dies

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Turn the dial of a radio in Israel, and song after song written by Ehud Manor will waft over the airwaves.

The prolific lyricist died last week, but that's not why his music is being played. The radio bursts with his work every day because so many of his songs are part of the Israeli musical canon.

Obituary

Now Israelis are grappling with the loss of a man whose songs for decades have tapped into the national psyche with tales of love, loss and belonging.

"Ehud Manor knew how to sing the way Israel wanted to be sung to," said Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, one of several cabinet ministers who attended Manor's funeral last week, along with thousands of family members, friends and musicians.

"He knew how to be sad when Israel felt sad, how to cheer when Israel felt it was time to cheer. He knew how to fall in love in an Israel in need of love, and he wrote with the simplicity of one who writes with pushed-up sleeves, without a bit of ostentation," Peres said.

Manor, considered Israel's most prolific songwriter, died of a heart attack at age 64.

He wrote some 1,200 songs and translated over 600 more into Hebrew. He was a cultural legend, and Israelis across the political and social spectrum could relate to him.

The Israel Prize-winner wrote of nostalgia for more innocent, more pastoral times. His songs often touched on the theme of loss. Many of the songs Israelis associate with times of national mourning, such as the days after terror attacks or Remembrance Day, were written by Manor.

Manor lost a brother in the War of Attrition, and wrote My Younger Brother Yehuda in his memory.

One of Manor's most famous songs was I Have No Other Country – in Hebrew, Ein Li Eretz Acheret. It is sung by both the left and the right in Israel.

Just as Next Year captured the triumphant joy of expectation in 1968, I Have No Other Country was emblematic of the bitter divisions of the early 1980s, when the Lebanon War tore Israelis apart.

The composers in each case also underscored how a national consensus had collapsed: In 1968, Nurit Hersh was the sunny, pretty purveyor of bright children's songs; Corinne Elal, who wrote the music for I Have No Other Country, was a protest singer, the grungy harbinger of a decade of disillusionment.

That Manor could write for both women was a testament to his flexibility and universal appeal. Indeed, he noted with surprise how his protest song against the Lebanon War became a standard – a cry of defiant patriotism during the first Persian Gulf War, when radios broadcast Gali Atari's sombre rendition of the song to Israelis huddled in sealed rooms during Iraqi missile attacks.

Thousands of Israelis had fled the country during the war but millions stayed, and I Have No Other Country summed up why.

"Somehow, it was adopted by everyone as a song of pain," Manor wrote in liner notes to a greatest hits anthology.

Atari sang the song at Manor's funeral, and the crowd sang with her.

Manor's funeral was held at the cemetery near his childhood home in the village of Binyamina, south of Haifa, where he grew up to Russian immigrant parents. The service was broadcast live on television and radio.

Israeli musicians who worked closely with Manor paid tribute to him and played some of his best-known songs.

Mati Caspi, one of Israel's top singers, who collaborated for years with Manor, was overcome with emotion as he gave a eulogy, calling Manor his "soulmate."

Ehud Manor with Israeli soldiers [Israel Sun photo]

Singer Gidi Gov said Manor's creative output was incredible.

"There were just so many songs," Gov told Israel Television.

Manor's songs are played on Israeli radio stations more than those of any other songwriter, according to ACUM, a non-profit organization for Israeli musicians and composers.

When Manor won the Israel Prize in 1998, the selection committee wrote, "Ehud Manor represents contemporary reality. For the past 30 years, he has expressed our mood through the hundreds of songs he has written, together with the finest composers."

Since becoming a major figure in the Israeli music world in the late 1960s, Manor continued to work with the most popular Israeli singers, including a younger generation of artists, until the end of his prolific life.

He also translated many musicals into Hebrew, including Hair and Chicago. As well, he translated Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet and Twelfth Night, hosted television and radio programs and wrote children's books.

Manor was celebrated as one of the greatest contributors to modern Israeli culture, and his death was front page news. He was eulogized by the Yediot Achronot newspaper as "a composer of dreams, a poet of hope."

Manor, who once said "my family is my muse," is survived by his wife of 40 years and three adult children.

Yoav Ginai, a close friend of Manor's, remembered him as "a teacher, an instructor, and a friend."

"His songs have entered our blood and will never leave,'" Ginai said.

Washington Bureau Chief Ron Kampeas contributed to this report.

PM may delay Gaza pullout onset until mid-August

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon may postpone by three weeks the first evacuations of settler homes, until after the traditional mourning period for the ancient Temples ends on the ninth of the Hebrew month of Av, the 14th of August.

Disengagement chief Yonaton Bassi proposed the delay to Sharon during the weekly session of the cabinet on Sunday, said Bassi's spokesperson Haim Altman.

Sharon was quoted by Israel Radio as hinting that he may agree to the postponement, saying that he wished to ease the plight of the evacuees as much as possible.

Bassi raised the issue after "an internal struggle and talking to rabbis" and explained that Jews are not allowed to move to a new home during the mourning period, Altman told the Associated Press.

If Bassi's proposal is accepted, the disengagement would begin on Monday, Aug. 15.

Vice Premier Shimon Peres also insisted that a possible delay in Israel's planned pullout from the Gaza Strip is not political and would be purely for religious reasons.

Peres, in Paris for meetings with President Jacques Chirac and other leaders, told France-2 television that the pullout could be "a little delayed as a result of the religious issue."

"It's not a political delay," he said.

Sharon has previously turned down military and governmental requests to delay the disengagement for logistical and planning reasons. Senior officials in the Prime Minister's Office said the delay had also been considered in the past, noting that other factors also weighed on the decision.

In particular, officials seek to have the evacuees relocated by the start of the new school year on September 1.

In any event, the evacuation is likely to be delayed by at least several days. According to Israeli legal rulings, the government cannot begin evacuations before Wednesday, July 20.

But military officials have advocated deferring the start until the following Monday, the 25th, as a result of the symbolism of the fast day that falls on the 24th: the 17th of Tammuz, the beginning of the three-week Jewish mourning period for the destruction of the First and Second Temples.

Three northern Gaza Strip settlements – Alei Sinai, Dugit and Nisanit – will be the first to be evacuated by the army and police in the implementation of the Gaza disengagement plan, according to the latest version of the withdrawal blueprint.

The isolated settlement of Netzarim is also apparently due for evacuation in the first week of the withdrawal, in late July. Officials admit, though, that the plan could yet change.

The northern part of Gush Katif is slated for withdrawal in the second week, with the southern part of Gush Katif to be evacuated in the third week. Evacuation of the four settlements around Jenin, in northern Samaria, is expected to begin in the third week and will be completed in the fourth week.

Senior military sources have told Ha'aretz that the final decision about which specific settlement will be the first to be evacuated will be made only very close to the start of the disengagement. In preparatory discussions for the withdrawal, much importance is being attached to the success of the initial stages of the evacuation. The military believes this is crucial for the success of the entire operation, since initial success may well weaken resistance to the evacuation in the later stages.

The northern Gaza settlements were chosen as the first to be evacuated because they are relatively isolated and because their residents are considered less ideological. The residents in these settlements may well feel that they have played their part in the campaign against disengagement and go quietly, rather than try to reach Gush Katif to make a stand there.

The Israel Defence Forces and police will deploy an especially large force for the initial evacuation, in a demonstration of determination.

The evacuation of Netzarim, where the resistance is expected to be tougher, will also be considered in the first week. The settlement considered the most difficult for the entire process is Neveh Dekalim, the largest of the Gush Katif settlements, where ideological motivation is perceived to be very strong. The settlement is likely to be evacuated in the second week. The army reckons that if it is successful in Neveh Dekalim and Netzarim, much of the resistance to the withdrawal in other settlements will crumble.

Special sensitivity is being accorded to the evacuation of the Gush Katif cemetery.

Redeeming 'lost' Jews

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

A New York rabbinical court made a precedent-setting halachic decision last summer that could eventually pave the way for legions of "lost" Jews to return to Judaism.

The case revolves around Wendy Armstrong, a real estate professional in St. Louis, Mo., who was raised in a Christian home and attended a Methodist church as a child. Armstrong found immense significance several years ago in her discovery that her fourth great-grandmother in her maternal line was Jewish, and she planned to convert to Judaism as a result.

"Once I found out that my family was Jewish, it was like a light bulb went on," said the single 35-year-old, who began taking classes, lighting Shabbat candles and attending synagogue. "I just got it. It was like, 'Ah-hah!' It was an eye-opening experience."

Armstrong's third great-grandmother was one of three sisters left at a Christian orphanage in St. Louis in 1880 by their widowed father, Theodore Menn, an indigent saloonkeeper who had left a handwritten note in German that was still in the files of the superceding institution. The note began with a common Hebrew short form – "B'H" (Blessed is God) – and went on to beg God to forgive him and take care of his children.

As Armstrong discovered, Menn and his wife, Anna Heinrich, were married by an Orthodox rabbi in Quincy, Ill., in 1865. Numerous other documents corroborated the family's Jewish origins to a standard of evidence readily acceptable to any genealogist.

Armstrong presented a thorough 25-page genealogical report to a three-person rabbinical panel, which also accepted the paper trail as proof of her Jewish ancestry and ruled that an official conversion was unnecessary because she was already Jewish. "They basically said, 'Congratulations, you're a Jew, welcome home,'" she said. "I don't have to go to a mikvah."

For Missouri businessman Craig Shapiro, who helped Armstrong with the genealogical report to the beit din, the ruling cleared the way for the establishment of Shlach Amee V'yavdonne, a non-profit organization specifically designed to help "lost Jews" return to Judaism.

The rabbinical decision is a precedent because it recognizes for the first time the validity of using records of both Jewish and non-Jewish provenance to prove Jewish ancestry, Shapiro said. The same precedent, he asserted, might also be applied to bring back to Judaism the descendants of Jews who were converted under threat of violence in centuries past, for example during the Holocaust, pogroms, the Spanish Inquisition or even the Crusades.

The phrase "Shlach amee v'yavdonne" bears particular resonance at Passover, because it is taken from the Book of Exodus and translates as, "Let My people go, that they may serve Me."

Shlach Amee is planning an international advertising campaign in search of people with suspected Jewish roots. The organization will hire genealogists around the world to help research the ancestry of respondents who show a genuine and sustained interest in Judaism, Shapiro said.

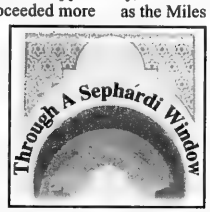
According to Shlach Amee advisor Rabbi Chaim Mentz of Los Angeles, the organization has the potential to spark a major in-gathering of Jewish exiles over the next generation. "Twenty or 30 years from now, we could be bringing home hundreds of thousands of Jews," he said.

Shapiro expressed the goal of bringing six million Jews back to Judaism over the next 18 years, but readily admitted those numbers are more symbolic than realistic. "Even if we bring one Jew back, it'll be worth it," he said. "Even one Jew will make a difference."

One city, two Jews – two shuls

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Legend has it that the very first minyan in the Americas consisted of Jews of both Sephardi and Ashkenazi background. The day was Yom Kippur. The rituals of the day proceeded more or less smoothly up until the Yizkor service. Those following the Ashkenazi customs naturally wished to intone the solemn words of Yizkor in the memory of their loved ones who were no longer alive. On the other hand, the Sephardim, for whom Yizkor holds no meaning and is, in fact, non-existent, wanted to continue with the Musaf prayer. For them, the order of the Avodah, which describes the sacred rites of the day performed in Temple times, was the high point.



Insensitivity begot misunderstanding. Misunderstanding begot argument. Argument begot division.

This first Yom Kippur service attended by both Sephardim and Ashkenazim was also to be the last. The following year, each group formed its own separate minyan.

And something similar happened with the small group of Jews from Morocco here in Toronto many years later. It was on Yom Kippur, at the YMHA on Bloor Street, then simply known as the "Y." This was before it was called the "South Y," for the "North Y" was not yet in existence. (And certainly, before "the South Y" was renamed as the Miles Nadal Jewish Centre.)

Evidently questions about the prayers, about both their order and their tunes, developed into a tug of war between the two communities from Morocco – those from the south and those from the north, the French and the Spanish.

The first Yom Kippur they davened together in Canada was also to be the last, as both communities went on to worship on their own.

The Bloor Street area was then the epicentre of Toronto's Jewish life. Newcomers would meet daily after work at the Y and socialize. There they would sit and solve the problems of the world. After one of these encounters, the French group decided to approach Rabbi Shlomo Langner with a request for space in his synagogue on Brunswick Avenue to use for worship.

They knocked at the good rabbi's door and Rabbi Langner himself answered, only to promptly close the door in their faces. The poor rabbi, on seeing the group of dark-skinned men, none of whom was wearing a kippah, took them all for non-Jews! Only when they protested and professed their faith as Jews did he apologize and let them in.

This awkward beginning was the start of a long and warm relationship. Rabbi Langner of blessed memory is fondly remembered for his kindness and interest in the welfare of the French Moroccan community. He would often leave his own minyan to join the Moroccans and marvel at their Sephardi services, especially the Kabbalat Shabbat.

From downtown, the community migrated uptown, renting space for a time at the Bialik Hebrew Day School on Viewmount Avenue, then purchasing a house-turned-shul, also on Viewmount Avenue. From there, they, like the general Jewish population, migrated further north to the Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue area and their present address on McAllister Road.

Attempts have made throughout the years to rejoin the two Moroccan groups, with no success.

But in close to 30 years in the rabbinate, every Yom Kippur and at the other times when Yizkor is said, I have personally led that service for the Ashkenazim present.

Freedom and Passover

Books
Bernard Baskin

In the wealth of information at this season about Passover, three basic and essential ideas emerge.

In the first place, the Exodus was only the initial chapter in the saga of liberty. It reached its apex when a horde of erstwhile slaves received the Ten Commandments at the foot of Mount Sinai. Without law there is no freedom. As the chains of bondage are broken, human hands become free to grasp the tablets on which are inscribed the restrictive commandments. Else liberty degenerates into licence and freedom into servitude to a new tyranny.

A modern poet has put it this way: "I have on my table a violin string. It is free to move in any direction I like. If I twist it, it responds; it is free. But it is not free to sing. So I take it and fix it into my violin. I bind it and stretch it and only when it is bound is it free for the first time to sing."

Freedom is like a mighty torrent. Permitted to flow uncontrolled, it can flood the countryside and bring destruction and havoc and ruin. Properly harnessed, it can fertilize the plain, water the field, and yield power and energy by which life may be enriched.

Secondly, we must take to heart the truth that freedom is indivisible. It must exist for all members of society.

It has been compared to a bag of sand – if there is a hole anywhere in the bag, all the sand will run out. If any group or people are denied their rights, then sooner or later all groups will discover that their freedom has leaked away.

If there is no freedom for the non-conformist, there can be no freedom for the conformist. If there is no freedom for the least favoured, most ignorant elements on the face of the earth, there can be no real freedom for the proudest and most intelligent world citizens.

In a remarkable passage, the Bible demands, "If a stranger sojourns with you, he shall be as the home born and you shall love him as yourself." Why this insistence? The repeated answer is, "You were slaves in the land of Egypt. You know the heart of the stranger." You know from experience what it means to be aliens, to be feared, to be oppressed, to be denied human rights.

It would be impossible to exaggerate the importance of this ethic for our day. In a real way, we are all strangers within the gates of this earth. Our world has shrunk to the size of a village. We are but moments away, as the bomb-tipped missile flies from the farthermost parts of the earth. All nationalities, all races, all colours and all creeds are now part of the same world. There are no home-born, no aliens.

C. P. Snow has put it well: "If we cannot feel that all individual human beings, whatever they believe, whatever they look like, whatever economic system they are living under, are in essence like ourselves, then we are headed straight for horrors."

Finally, Passover insists that freedom must be constantly fought for. Its victories are never final, its defeats are never permanent. Each generation must defend its heritage, for each seeming conquest gives rise to new forces that will attempt to substitute fresh means of oppression for the old. Every battle our fathers thought finished will have to be fought anew by their children.

A climatic moment occurred when fleeing slaves found themselves with the Red Sea before them and the pursuing Egyptians behind them. They cried out unto the Lord and the Lord rebuked an importuning Moses, "Why do you cry to me? Why do you pray to me? Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward."

To go forward is an unending and constant challenge. It is not for the weak, the faint-hearted or those who grow weary in the battle.

Passover is an annual gift that reminds us that freedom must be channelled, shared and then fiercely maintained against apathy, indifference, cynicism and ignorance – the seductive and thoughtless lures of enslavement.

Seder in a strange land

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

There's nothing quite like enjoying a seder with family and friends. But there are times when you must spend the holiday away from loved ones. Whether you find yourself at home or abroad this Pesach, I hope you enjoy these stories.

Mark Rosen's most cherished seder memories are the ones after he left home and became an annual "seder stranger," the newcomer at other people's seders. [http://tinyurl.com/44r48]

A few years ago, Severyn Ashkenazy of California did something that hadn't been tried in Poland in decades. He hosted a seder in Warsaw. "The seder consisted of traditional foods – kugels, kreplach, tsimmes, brisket and compote, "beloved Passover recipes that had their origins in Poland." Of course, since those pioneering days, Seders throughout the former Soviet Union have become far more common. [http://tinyurl.com/3uok2]

I was fascinated to find several examples of how American soldiers have made do during the holiday. In A Reminiscence from the Civil War, we read from the memoirs of Joseph A. Joel, "who enlisted from Cleveland, Ohio, in the Union cause." Here's his description of his Passover seder in the spring of 1862. "We obtained two kegs of cider, a lamb, several chickens and some eggs. Horseradish or parsley we could not obtain, but in lieu we found a weed whose bitterness, I apprehend, exceeded anything our forefathers 'enjoyed'... There, in the wild woods of West Virginia, away from home and friends, we consecrated and offered up to the ever-loving God of Israel our prayers and sacrifice." [www.jhom.com/calendar/nisan/civil_war.html]

Captain David Arkush was a Jewish soldier who was captured by the Japanese and forced to work on the Burma-Siam railway. "On Pesach 1943, soon after the arrival of many more Jews from the Dutch forces captured in Java, we had a service after which we served rice cakes and rice coffee in lieu of a seder. Over 50 Allied prisoners attended, including many brought on stretchers... Kaddish was recited for those killed in action or who had died on the railway." [http://tinyurl.com/5sztv]

Rabbi Mayer Abramowitz had the responsibility of conducting the first Passover seder in Occupied Germany in April 1945. The seder took place in the city of Kassel in a bunker that held 300 Jewish personnel and 100 Jewish survivors. Particularly poignant is how the rabbi describes a survivor talking of his ordeal. "He had us in tears as he recounted the afflictions he and his fellow survivors suffered under the Nazis." [http://tinyurl.com/5sszo]

Now skip ahead to another century and another continent to learn about Passover in Iraq. Major Jonas Vogelhut of the 101st Airborne Division describes his "seder somewhere in Iraq." "The service concluded with songs and Psalms like The Lord Is On My Side, I Have No Fear. Together our unit made this tent a house, this house a home, a piece of Judaism and a piece of America." [http://tinyurl.com/4t8da]

Thanks to the efforts of JWB Chaplains Council, here's what soldiers can expect to find in their official seder kits: a box of matzah, two cans of chicken matzah ball soup, two cans of tuna, a bottle of grape juice, a Haggadah and a Passover pamphlet. [www.jcca.org/press_passover.html]

Chabad rabbis are known for organizing seders in locations, no matter how remote. If you think you might be spending some time in Thailand or Turkey, there's room for you at a seder table. Rabbi Dror Moshe Shaul has welcomed several hundred Israelis to his seder tent in Dharamsala, India, in the foothills of the Himalayas. [http://tinyurl.com/4adcx]

In the Far East, Yosef Jacobson says his seder in Kobe, Japan, was his most memorable ever. [www.jewish-holiday.com/qualityseder.html] Will Recant spent a Passover in Shanghai while setting up new services for the elderly and children with mental disabilities in that city. Here's how the mayor toasted him: "From the largest and oldest community on earth – the Chinese – to you, a representative of the oldest and smallest community on earth – thank you for sharing your holiday with us and for helping our people." [http://tinyurl.com/3o4pn]

Passover Food Ideas

Award-winning book features vegetarian recipes for Passover

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

A good chef is one who leaves his culinary options open and Gil Marks does just that. His latest book, Olive Trees and Honey: A Treasury of Vegetarian Recipes from Jewish Communities Around the World (Wiley, 454 pages), has been nominated for a prestigious James Beard Award in the vegetarian category.

This outstanding collection of 300 vegetarian dishes has been woven together with cultural and historical details that will intrigue armchair travellers, history buffs and cooks alike. Olive Trees and Honey will take you on an exciting global journey, allowing you to experience the way Jews have been eating meatless meals for centuries. Unique seasonings and condiments add regional flavour to simple recipes, letting you experience how Jewish communities around the world prepared their food.

Marks is a rabbi, historian, chef, cookbook author, teacher and expert on Jewish cooking. He has no professional training, but his mother encouraged him and his siblings to cook and experiment, even if they made a mess. He told me that his paternal grandfather once set the house on fire while trying to make coffee in an electric coffee pot – on the stove!

When I recently interviewed him by telephone, Marks declared, "Cooking is an art, but baking is a science." He loves to prepare fancy meals for friends in his small, cramped Upper West Side kitchen in New York.

Olive Trees and Honey includes an exciting array of vegetarian dishes for any occasion on the Jewish calendar, from festivals to everyday meals. Popular Passover dishes include Ukrainian Beet Soup (Borscht), Turkish Sweet-and-Sour Artichokes (Anjinaras), Turkish Leek Patties (Keftes de Prassa), Moroccan Mashed Potato Casserole (Batata bil Firan) and Calcutta Curried Vegetables (Subzi).

Marks writes about the versatility of matzah, which is ground to make matzah meal or finely ground to make matzah cake meal. Crumbled and ground matzah is used to create an imaginative array of Passover dishes, including stuffings, puddings, casseroles, pancakes, fritters, dumplings, pastries and cakes. Since matzah meal has an intriguing nutty flavour, it is often used for binding and breading throughout the year as well as on Passover.

The Bible forbids the consumption of chametz (leavened grain) during Passover. Among Ashkenazim, an interdiction emerged against eating legumes (kitniyot) on Passover as well as rice, millet and some seeds: poppy, sesame, caraway, coriander and mustard. On the other hand, Sephardim, prolific rice and legume consumers, not only rejected these prohibitions, but frequently featured these foods at the Passover seder. The restriction of kitniyot on Passover remains one of the major differences between Ashkenazim and other Jewish communities.

According to Marks, these simple but delicious spinach patties are irresistible, even to spinach-haters. He recommends a splash of fresh lemon juice, which makes a major difference in taste. Onions add a sweet flavour and textural complexity. He writes, "These patties are traditional on Passover and Rosh Hashanah, corresponding to the emergence of the early and late spinach crops. For Rosh Hashanah, you could substitute fine dried bread crumbs for the matzah meal."

SEPHARDIC SPINACH PATTIES (KEFTES DE ESPINACA)

3 tbsp. olive or vegetable oil
1 large onion, chopped
2 to 4 cloves garlic, minced (optional)
2 lbs. fresh spinach, stemmed, cooked, chopped and squeezed dry (or 20 oz. thawed, frozen chopped spinach, squeezed dry) about 1 cup matzah meal about ¼ tsp. table salt (or 1½ tsp. kosher salt) ground black pepper to taste
½ tsp. grated nutmeg or ½ tsp. cayenne (optional)
3 large eggs, lightly beaten vegetable oil for frying lemon wedges for serving

In a large skillet, heat the olive oil over medium heat. Add the onion and, if using, the garlic, and sauté until soft and translucent, about 5 minutes. Remove from heat and add the spinach, matzah meal, salt, pepper, and, if using, the nutmeg or cayenne. Stir in the eggs. If the mixture is too loose, add a little more matzah meal. The mixture can be stored in the refrigerator for a day.

Grafstein Wines' Passover offerings

Couple started company in 1983

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Add wine to an excellent meal and you make it even better, says Neil Grafstein of Grafstein Wines, Ontario wine distributors.

Grafstein's interest in wine dates back to when he was a child and he helped his grandmother prepare homemade raisin wine for Passover, he says.

This interest continued when he visited California wineries while he was a marketing student at University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA).

He runs the company, exclusive agents in Ontario for the Golan Heights Winery, with his wife Rachel, whose family, originally from Morocco, were winemakers.

The couple started the firm – known then as the Sacramental Wine Company – in 1983, because they share a passion for wine, and because they wanted to provide high quality kosher products "that would satisfy all tastes in wine – the bone dry as well as the sweeter wines."

New releases from Golan Heights Winery, available at the LCBO include:

• Golan Cabernet Sauvignon combines ripe berry and jammy notes with oak and spice. Food it complements include roasted or smoked turkey, roasted duck, beef steak and other hearty dishes.

• Golan Emerald Riesling combines notes of citrus fruit, pear and floral with a slight pine aroma and a sweet finish, and goes well with roast chicken, cold broiled chicken, dairy dishes and roasted vegetables.

• Yarden Blanc de Blancs displays delicate tropical fruit, floral and citrus notes balanced with nuances of fresh bread and minerals, and is crisp and dry. Food suggestions include rich and/or salty foods, or delicately flavoured foods such as pan-fried chicken breasts.

• Yarden Sauvignon Blanc layers tropical fruits with citrus, light herb notes and hints of vanilla and oak. It is complex and medium bodied with long fruit finish, and can be served with fish dishes, poultry such as baked chicken, Cornish hen and light dairy dishes.

• Yarden Mt. Hermon Red combines deep red purple colour and ripe berry fruit characters with hints of herbs. It goes well with strong flavoured foods, basic meat and potato dishes, turkey, chicken and fish.

• Yarden Mt. Hermon White has natural fruity and floral qualities and is complemented by chicken, fish, poached salmon, fresh tossed green salad, gazpacho and rich dairy dishes.

Other products at the LCBO include Yarden Carbernet Sauvignon, Hafner Welschriesling, Hafner Zweige[illegible]d Hafner Ice Wine Chardonnay.

Versatile chocolate mousse has intense flavour

Shape the spinach mixture into patties 3 inches long and 1½ inches wide, with tapered ends. In a large skillet, heat a thin layer of oil over medium heat. In batches, fry the patties, turning, until golden brown, about 3 minutes per side. Drain on paper towels. Serve warm, accompanied with lemon wedges. Makes about 16 patties.

Spinach Patties With Cheese (Keftes de Espinaca con Queso): Add 1 cup (4 oz.) shredded Muenster, Swiss, Gouda, or Cheddar cheese, or ¼ cup grated kefalotyri or Parmesan cheese.

Spinach Patties With Walnuts (Keftes de Espinaca con Muez): Substitute ½ to 1 cup finely chopped walnuts for the matzah meal.

Italian Spinach Patties (Polpettine di Spinaci): Add ¾ cup raisins soaked in white wine for 30 minutes, then drained, and ¾ cup toasted pine nuts.

GIL MARKS' VERSATILE PAREVE CHOCOLATE MOUSSE

8 oz. semisweet chocolate
¼ cup water
8 large eggs, separated
1 tsp. vanilla extract
pinch of salt
⅔ cup granulated sugar

In the top of a double boiler set over barely simmering water, melt the chocolate and water, stirring occasionally (about 10 minutes). Remove from the heat and beat in egg yolks, 1 at a time. Stir in the vanilla and salt.

Beat the egg whites until soft peaks form. Gradually add the sugar, beating until stiff and glossy (3 to 5 minutes). Fold ¼ of the egg whites into the chocolate mixture, then gently fold in the remaining whites.

Pour into a bowl or individual serving dishes, cover and chill until set (at least 4 hours). Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Chocolate Mousse Pie: Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9-inch pie pan and dust with sugar. Pour 4 cups of mousse (above) into prepared pan, reserving remaining mousse in refrigerator. Bake until set (about 25 minutes). Cool for 30 minutes, then chill. (Centre will fall, forming a shell.) Pour reserved refrigerated mousse into chocolate shell. Refrigerate until serving time.

Jelly Roll Mousse Cake: Preheat oven to 350. Spoon 4 cups of mousse into a 15½ by 10½-inch jelly-roll pan lined with parchment paper. Bake until firm (about 15 minutes). Transfer to a rack and let cool. Invert onto a piece of parchment paper placed on a flat surface, peel off the paper, and spread with the remaining mousse. Roll up from a long end. Refrigerate until needed. Slice and serve.

Chad J. Shandler
Chair Designate of the United Jewish Communities National Young Leadership Cabinet

Congratulations to Chad J. Shandler on his selection as the Chair Designate of the United Jewish Communities National Young Leadership Department and its National Young Leadership Cabinet.

Mr. Shandler has held many distinguished positions in the UJA-Federation of New York and in the United Jewish Communities of MetroWest, New Jersey. He has been a member of the National Young Leadership Cabinet since 2001.

The United Jewish Communities National Young Leadership Cabinet is comprised of 500 Jewish leaders in their 30s and 40s from the United States and Canada. The goals of Cabinet are to develop high-potential leadership, to promote volunteerism, to inspire other young adults and to further giving through the UJA-Federation Campaign.

A graduate of the John M. Olin School of Business at Washington University in St. Louis, Chad is currently a Managing Director of Traxi LLC, a special situation advisory firm focused on companies in need of restructuring or in financial distress.

Chad grew up in Livingston, New Jersey, with his parents, Phyllis and Alan, and his younger brother, Adam. He lives in New York City with his wife, Leah (Goldberg) Shandler, who grew up in Toronto with her parents Susan and Martin and her brothers Aaron, Joel, Daniel and Noah.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Weeknight pleasures For Passover

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

At the best of times, feeding your family satisfying, nutritious and delicious meals during a hectic week can be a challenge. We all tend to gravitate to the same 10 recipes, albeit in different guises. What happens then during Passover, when dietary restrictions prohibit the use of so many of our staples?

After the brisket leftovers are eaten, and everybody is tired of the morning ritual of matzah brei, give the following recipes a try for a new look and taste for weeknight suppers during Passover. Of course, they can be eaten during the rest of the year as well. Simply replace the potato starch with all-purpose flour.

VEAL CHOPS WITH ORANGE AND ROSEMARY

Using a rasp – originally a workman's tool but now used by the culinary industry – makes short shrift of zesting an orange. If you don't want to use wine in the sauce, substitute chicken stock with a dash of lemon juice. Using fresh rosemary in this recipe really makes the dish burst with fresh flavour.

2 tbsp. finely grated orange zest
3 cloves garlic, minced
2 tsp. finely chopped fresh rosemary
½ tsp. each salt and pepper
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
3 tbsp. olive oil
4 veal loin chops
1 tbsp. potato starch
½ cup orange juice
¾ white wine

In a small bowl, combine orange zest, garlic, rosemary, salt, pepper, parsley and 1 tbsp. of the oil. Spread all over veal chops. Transfer to plate, cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 8 hours or for up to 24. Bring meat to room temperature for 30 minutes.

Heat remaining oil in large skillet over medium-high heat. Cook chops, 7 minutes on each side, just until a hint of pink remains. Remove to plate and keep warm. Stir potato starch into skillet for 1 minute. Pour in juice and wine, scraping up any brown bits. Boil, whisking constantly, for 3 minutes or until slightly thickened. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Serve with meat. Makes 4 servings.

ARTICHOKE, SPINACH AND MATZAH PIE

Although the ingredient list may seem daunting, this Sephardi-based dish goes together surprisingly quickly once the component parts are all ready to be cooked. If using unsalted matzahs, increase the salt a bit.

3 tbsp. olive oil (approximately)
6 cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp. dried oregano
¼ tsp. each dried basil and mint
2 tsp. each salt and pepper
8 cups sliced mushrooms (about 1½ lbs.)
1 lb. lean ground beef
1 cup pasta sauce (optional)
4 large onions, thinly sliced
1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
1½ cups canned quartered artichoke hearts
1½ lbs. fresh spinach leaves, trimmed
½ tsp. grated nutmeg
9 matzah squares
6 eggs
⅔ cup chicken stock
2 tbsp. lemon juice

In large non-stick skillet, heat 1 tablespoon of the oil over medium-high heat. Add garlic, oregano, basil, mint and one-quarter of the salt and pepper. Cook, stirring, for 2 minutes. Add mushrooms. Cook, stirring, and adding up to 3 tablespoons of water to prevent the pan from burning, for 10 minutes or until all excess liquid has evaporated and mushrooms are starting to turn golden. Add beef, breaking up with spoon. Cook, stirring, for 10 minutes or until no longer pink inside. Stir in pasta sauce, if using. Transfer mixture to bowl.

Food, Scrumptious Food

In same skillet, heat 1 more tablespoon of oil. Add onions, vinegar and another quarter of the salt and pepper. Cook, stirring, for 15 minutes or until onions are very soft and golden. Transfer to separate bowl. Add remaining oil to skillet. Cook artichokes and a quarter of the salt and pepper for 4 minutes or just until golden. Remove to separate bowl. Rinse spinach under cold running water. With just the water clinging to leaves, cook in skillet along with nutmeg, turning leaves until wilted and cooked through, about 3 minutes. Drain in colander. Squeeze out as much liquid as possible.

Meanwhile, cover matzah with cold water. Let soak for 2 minutes. Drain well on paper towels. Spread meat mixture into bottom of 13 x 9-inch casserole dish. Top completely with matzah. Top with onions, then a layer of matzah, then artichokes, then 3 more matzahs, the spinach and the remaining matzahs.

Lightly whisk together eggs, chicken broth, lemon juice and remaining salt and pepper. Pour over casserole, lifting sides of matzah to ensure the mixture seeps to the bottom. Bake in centre of preheated 400 oven for 30 minutes or until set. Let cool for 5 minutes before serving. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

TURKEY CUTLETS WITH SHALLOT MUSTARD SAUCE

This is also delicious if you add some cooked mushrooms to the sauce. Add 4 cups sliced button mushrooms with the shallots and garlic. Cook, stirring occasionally, for about 10 minutes or until all excess liquid has evaporated and mushrooms are starting to turn golden. Proceed with the recipe as indicated below.

- 1½ lbs. turkey breast cutlets, cut about ¼-inch thick
- ¼ tsp. each salt and pepper
- 3 tbsp. olive oil
- 2 shallots, minced
- 2 cloves garlic, minced
- ½ tsp. dried thyme
- 1½ tsp. grated lemon rind
- 1 tbsp. potato starch
- 1¼ cups chicken stock
- 2 tsp. lemon juice
- 2 tbsp. Dijon mustard

Sprinkle turkey cutlets with salt and pepper. In large skillet, heat 2 tablespoons of the oil over medium-high heat. In batches, cook cutlets for 2 to 3 minutes per side or until cooked through. Transfer to platter and keep warm. Reduce heat to medium-low. Add remaining oil to skillet. Add shallots, garlic, thyme and lemon rind; cook, stirring for 2 minutes or until softened. Sprinkle potato starch over. Cook, stirring, for 1 minute. Whisk in broth and lemon juice; bring to boil and cook, whisking, for 2 minutes or until thickened. Whisk in mustard until combined. Pour over meat to serve. Makes 4 servings.

It's how you get there that makes the difference.

Western sets exam for night of first seder

By HAILEY EISEN
Special to The CJN

This Passover, Joanna Ticker will be trading the Four Questions for hundreds of the multiple choice variety, because the final exam in her freshman psychology course conflicts with the first seder.

Ticker is one of many first-year Jewish students at the University of Western Ontario who is being forced to choose between writing the psychology 020 exam – scheduled for Saturday, April 23, from 7 to 10 p.m. – and attending a family seder back home, then writing a makeup exam either at the end of April or in early May.

"At the beginning, a lot of people wanted to write the makeup exam. But now they are giving in and missing Passover," Ticker said, explaining that most first-year students just want to finish their courses and don't want to return to London once they've moved out of residence.

As well, since most Jewish frosh take psychology, "the exam could have at least been scheduled in the afternoon so we'd have time to make it home for dinner," said Ticker, one of 2,016 first-year psychology students who must write the test.

Glen Tigert, who oversees exam scheduling as Western's director of student financial services and student records, said the university tries to avoid scheduling exams on religious holidays, particularly the first two days of Passover, but sometimes it has no choice.

In this case, the short exam period and space considerations made the conflict unavoidable, he said.

"It was not a mistake," Tigert said, adding that if the same problem comes up next year, the university will try to take the holiday into account.

He noted that students with religious conflicts can always write makeup exams.

Ticker said she and her friends "were shocked when we found out our exam was on the night of the first seder. I don't see other universities doing that."

Indeed, York University has a policy barring the scheduling of exams on the first and last two days of Pesach, while a spokesperson at the University of Toronto said its faculty of arts and science does not hold exams on Saturdays, thereby avoiding a conflict this year with the first seder.

The problem at Western has upset Joanna's father, Charles Ticker. He was surprised that Western would even schedule exams on Shabbat, but said Pesach is a family holiday and even Jews who are not very religious tend to celebrate it.

He said he accepts the school's explanation for the conflict, but he wants an apology.

"I am very unhappy that Joanna will have to miss the seder," he said. "And I'm annoyed with the university for putting us in a situation that could have been avoided with proper planning."

Jared Isaacson, director of Jewish Campus Services at Western, said the scheduling conflict gave JCS an opportunity to educate university officials about timing issues related to Jewish holidays.

"When the conflict came about, there was little that they could do about it," Isaacson said. "But come September, I will have a conversation with them to discuss the timing of the coming year's exams."

He looks forward to continued dialogue.

"I appreciate where both sides are coming from," he said. "There is a very finite window in which the university can hold the proper exam schedule. They even schedule exams on Sundays now."

McMaster students express grievances over SPHR event

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

McMaster student Jacob Kocsis had never written a letter to a university administrator before, but a recent talk sponsored by the university's Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights club prompted him to do so.

The April 7 talk, by Lenni Brenner, was titled "Zionist Collaboration from the Nazis to the U.S.A. Imperialists Today."

In an April 6 letter to university president Peter George and others, Kocsis lodged a formal protest, requesting that the lecture be stopped and that SPHR, a recognized university club, be shut down.

He received one reply indicating the matter was being looked into.

The situation on campus has "definitely escalated" over the past two years, Kocsis told The CJN. "We had this nice campus community that wasn't poisoned by anti-Semitism."

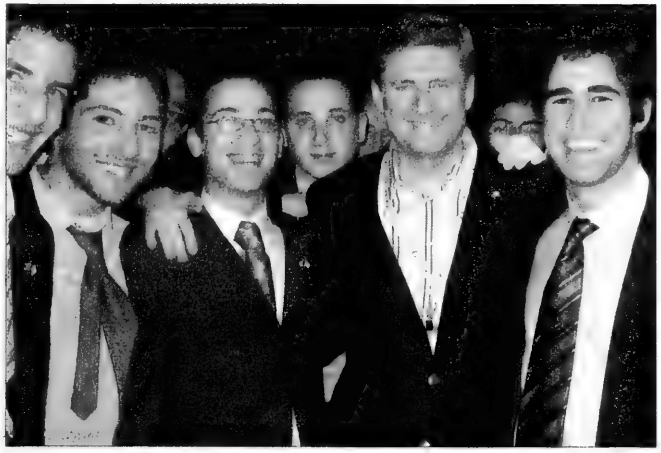
The Jewish Federation of Hamilton wrote to Peter George, president of McMaster, late last week, expressing outrage about the lecture and requesting a meeting.

Judy Schwartz, director of the Jewish Students Association (JSA), told The CJN she believes the lecture was planned for "only one reason, to vilify Israel. Certainly it creates major anti-Semitism and unrest on campus."

SPHR did not "cross any official policy that is currently on our books," said incoming McMaster Student Union president Tommy Piribauer. "There are two separate issues: events we have on campus, and how they're promoted. We will be using the summer as an opportunity to redraft clear guidelines in both respects."

McMaster student Brandon deSilva, a past president of both the JSA and Zionists at McMaster, said students have learned from Israeli Apartheid Week at the University of Toronto earlier this year that a public outcry over anti-Semitic events can provide unwanted "advertising. It's best to do what you can behind the scenes.

"We've been meeting with MSU," he said. Also, he said, Kocsis was one of at least 10 or 12 students and possibly five times that many who wrote letters after hearing about the lecture via e-mails from Zionists at McMaster and the JSU.



MEETING THE LEADER: Hillel Montreal student leadership met with Conservative Party of Canada leader Stephen Harper during the party's first policy convention, held in Montreal in mid-March. The group discussed a variety of issues with Harper at a cocktail hosted by the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy public affairs committee (CIJA-PAC). Invasive meningococcal disease: recognition, prevention

By Dr. Orli Goldberg

Nineteen-year-old Mary Louis Carlos of the Victorian suburban community of Saanich was discharged from a Victoria Hospital on Dec. 21, 2004, at 11 a.m. with a fever and a sore neck. Her mother brought the teen back to the hospital later that day as her symptoms worsened, and she died of bacterial meningitis four hours later.

Patricia Vepari, 21, a chemical engineering student at the University of Waterloo, left a Kitchener hospital despite her fever, nausea and sore throat, after being told that she would have to wait eight hours to see a doctor. The following morning she was taken to the Intensive Care Unit, where she was put on life support. She ultimately died of meningococcemia a few hours later on Feb. 4, this year.

These two recent tragic deaths of previously healthy young women highlight the virulence of invasive meningococcal disease. They emphasize the need for early recognition of clinical symptoms of the disease, as well as the need for immediate medical attention and management once the diagnosis is confirmed. They reinforce the importance of primary prevention of disease and the value of widespread immunization programs.

Although not common, invasive meningococcal disease (IMD), caused by the bacteria Neisseria meningitides, can be devastating to affected patients and families. Despite modern treatment, nine per cent of those affected die from the disease. In a small proportion of affected patients, the disease runs an aggressive course, with death ensuing in less than 12 hours after the onset of symptoms. For this reason, IMD has been the cause of public alarm and has received intense media coverage.

IMD may be associated with a wide range of clinical syndromes, depending on what part of the body the bacteria infect. When the meningococci bacteria invade the fluid surrounding the brain and spinal cord, it is called bacterial meningitis. When the bacteria invade the bloodstream it is called meningococcal septicemia, or meningococcemia. Meningococcal septicemia, with or without meningitis, can be particularly life-threatening and is responsible for more deaths than meningococcal meningitis.

In its initial stages, IMD may not be recognized because of its similarities to a flu-like illness. A patient with meningitis may present with a headache, fever, neck stiffness, vomiting and sensitivity to light. A patient with meningococcemia may present with fever, muscle and joint aches, cough, sore throat, headache, with or without the other features of meningitis. The most characteristic feature of meningococcemia is a red blotchy rash that does not blanch under pressure.

Due to the rapid progression of IMD, an adequate response requires decisive and swift action from both clinicians and communicable disease control services. Deaths from IMD may be prevented by early antibiotic treatment. Patients presenting to a hospital emergency department with suspected IMD need to be seen urgently, and they should receive their first dose of antibiotics no later than 30 minutes after arrival.

The bacteria that cause IMD can live in the body without causing symptoms, a process called colonization. In fact, 10 per cent of the population is colonized with meningococci, most commonly in their nose and throat, but most people never develop active disease. Someone who is colonized but not infected can still transmit the infection to someone else. Nonetheless, the meningococcal germ is less contagious than influenza or the common cold. The bacteria are spread through droplets in the air from coughing or sneezing. As well, bacteria from the saliva of a colonized or infected person can be spread when common items are shared, such as beverages, cigarettes and lipstick.

While the mainstay of the public health control of IMD in the past has been reactive, beginning in January 2005, the Ontario government has become proactive with the release of the publicly funded Meningococcal C-conjugate vaccine. The vaccine protects against serogroup C, a particular subgroup of Neisseria meningitides. Serogroup C (IMD-C) has been almost exclusively responsible for localized clusters or outbreaks of IMD in schools and communities.

In Ontario, many of the cases of IMD-C are in adolescents and young adults. As a result, the vaccine will be offered free of charge to children over 12 and youth age 15 to 19. People of any age who have been in close contact with a person who has IMD-C are at greatest risk of infection and are already eligible to receive the vaccine. Moreover, one-year-old children can receive the meningococcal C-conjugate vaccine as part of their routine immunization. Anyone else who wants the vaccine but who is not from the aforementioned groups can also receive the vaccine, but the government will not pay for the cost at this time because of limited resources. This new program is intended to lead to universal immunization against IMD in Ontario.

If you would like more information on IMD or about the meningococcal vaccine, please consult your family physician.

Dr. Orli Goldberg is a medical resident in the department of family and community medicine at the University of Toronto, currently training at North York General Hospital. This article is part of an occasional series.

Page-turner explores ambiguities in the material world

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

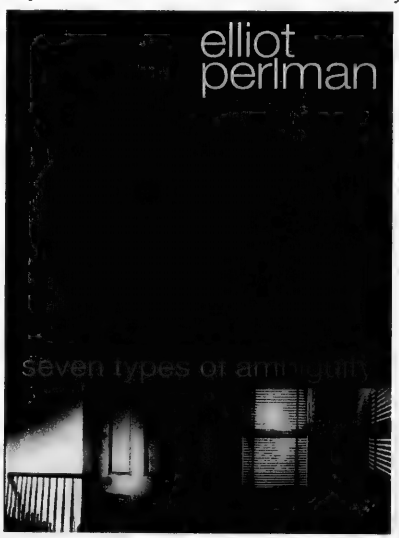
While the sheer width of Seven Types of Ambiguity may appear daunting, Elliot Perlman's novel about obsessive behaviours in the material world quickly turns into a compelling page-turner.

The psychological thriller revolves around the kidnapping of a little boy as seen through the eyes of seven, sometimes unexpected, characters. They are linked by a Quixote-like protagonist, Simon Heywood, who is struggling with the moral ambiguities of our times.

Elliot Perlman

Drawn from a 1930s work on poetry by William Empson, the title itself alludes to the ambiguous nature of events as they are perceived and interpreted by individuals saddled with the baggage of their own histories. On a more general level, the novel explores the political, economic and social challenges facing the western world – from insider trading deals related to privately run health-care systems to the hypocrisies inherent in the academic world.

With astute clarity, Perlman describes the recent professorial trend toward literary deconstructionism in universities with the observation that "with their clumsy, jargon-ridden opacity they succeeded in intimidating those students not already under their sway. The term 'theory' came to be understood as their theory." It is an observation that could be applied to several schools of thought in current academia.



Perlman portrays the relationships between brokers and analysts who work in the financial markets as seen through each other's eyes. One broker watches the "walking out" of a colleague who put too much money on a stock that tanked and imagines how he will always "remember certain half-whispered comments from colleagues who he would not have expected to so relish his demise."

But most of all, Seven Types of Ambiguity is a novel that explores the nature of despair. It is a portrayal of the world today where extremism defines the environments and heroes aren't all good and villains aren't all bad. "Everything is messy and life is really a series of reflections of shades of gray," said Perlman, who was in Toronto recently at the Harbourfront International Reading Series.

Although he is a self-professed liberal, Perlman said that "being a liberal doesn't mean you have a monopoly on morality… It is not unusual for circumstances to leave people feeling marginalized and, despite their values, lead them to hurt those around them."

Perlman, who now divides his time between New York City and Melbourne, grew up in Australia and attended Mount Scopus Memorial College, a Hebrew high school in Melbourne, before completing a BA in economics and politics and a law degree. He worked for five years as an associate to an Australian Supreme Court judge while completing Seven Types. A film based on his first novel, Three Dollars, will be released next month in Australia. His second book, titled Reasons I Won't Be Coming, won the Betty Trask Award (U.K.) and the Fellowship of Australian Writers Book of the Year award.

While his parents were born in Australia, he said that he was taught about anti-Semitism and Israel from a very young age. "All three of my books are [affected] by a Jewish sensibility whether or not any of the characters are overtly Jewish."

Writers observe the world around them and therefore can't entirely be a part of that world. This reflects the Jewish condition in that "whatever apparent successes Jews make in the Diaspora, because of the system of the virus that is anti-Semitism, we are always, to a lesser or greater extent, on the outside."

This awareness informs the descriptions of the insecurities that consume his characters and drives the fast-paced narrative.

The other aspect of being Jewish that influences Perlman's writing is, as he puts it, the strand of humanism that is "interested in ameliorating hardship and making society better.

"It's a secular humanism, in the sense that I'm not a practising Jew, but I'm unequivocally very Jewish in terms of my values and my self-identification with things Jewish," he said.

The Law of Joint Custody

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

What happens when two divorcing parents are in constant conflict, claim they cannot agree on anything, and cannot cooperate? Will the Courts refuse to order a shared parenting schedule (or not) just because one parent refuses to cooperate with the other? Is such a decision in the best interests of the child? What is the law of Ontario, and how has it been recently applied?

In two apparently contradictory decisions called Kaplanis and Ladisa, released within days of each other in January 2005, the Ontario Court of Appeal has told divorcing Ontario parents that shared parenting will work in some situations and not in others.

Parents' inability to communicate precludes counselling

In Kaplanis, the trial judge ruled that since each parent thought that the other parent was "fit", it was a good idea to force warring parents to share the children's time. She therefore ordered them to seek counselling. But this couple proved to be unable to communicate effectively and therefore, the Appeal Court ruled that counselling was inappropriate. Since the father never asked for sole custody to begin with, the Court of Appeal's remaining choice was to award sole custody to the mother and order a new trial on what kind of access should be awarded to the father.

The most interesting part of this decision is that although the Court recognized the inherent right of the Courts to "order counselling," it empowered a Court to make such orders only in cases where the evidence shows that the parents are able to communicate and get along. That evidence may come in the form of third party reports from social workers, psychologists, or the Children's Lawyer. Otherwise, a Court can't simply force people into counselling anymore.

By contrast, in Ladisa, the Court upheld a decision by Justice Linhares de Sousa in favour of a shared scheduling arrangement for two children and against the wishes of the mother who, on appeal, was insisting on sole custody. The key piece of evidence about these parents was strikingly different than in Kaplanis: "According to the testimony of third parties, including teachers, a former hockey coach, other hockey parents and neighbours, the parents, when together, have always acted appropriately towards each other and towards their children. Their conflict has not been obvious to [their observation.]" In addition, the children were very close to both parents and there was a history of co-parenting.

Jockeying for position in co-parenting arrangements

While it may appear that we have no consistent rules, that is not true. If there is a history of co-parenting and communication notwithstanding the strife, then the parent who attempts to bolt from that type of cooperative parenting arrangement by suddenly claiming a greater degree of control will likely lose. However, if the strife is so aggravating that the level of communication has negatively affected the parenting, then the awarding of sole custody will be more likely.

The problem is that some litigious parents, meaning the type of parent who "plans for" and "strategizes" his separation, often begins to "co-parent" shortly before he separates from his wife (or her husband) to gain a tactical advantage in anticipation of "third parties" investigating the relationship between them and their children. Previously neglectful fathers or mothers suddenly become instant Bill Cosbys or Mother Teresas. One then has to be careful who investigates the fractured family, meaning: just who reports to the Court? There are very few truly respected child custody assessors who have the sophistication and experience to see through such tactics. Buyer beware.

Previously neglectful parents suddenly become Bill Cosbys and Mother Teresas

TJFF the largest Jewish film fest worldwide

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

"Today I am a film festival," is the jocular slogan of the upcoming Toronto Jewish Film Festival as it enters its 13th season, the traditional "bar mitzvah" year.

But the annual springtime event, which is scheduled to screen 101 films from May 7 to 15, has also reached a more significant milestone: it is now the largest Jewish film festival in the world, showing more films than similar fests in San Francisco, New York or Jerusalem.

While the honour seems appropriate for a city that also hosts the world's largest international film festival each September, executive director and co-founder Helen Zukerman continues to express delight and enthusiasm at the growth of the pet project she has nursed since its 1993 debut, which saw 19 films screened over five days.

"I absolutely adore the process of this festival, because it's always a challenge and it's always rewarding," she said. "There are always surprises and it's always a pleasure to do. And just when you think you've seen a film about everything, something happens and you get something like The Unshod Man, or Edelweiss Pirates or Perla. The stories are endless, just endless."

While nearly a dozen films fall into the "coming of age" category, which is this year's unofficial theme, Zukerman noted that a more appropriate theme might be "spotlight on Israeli films," since 14 feature films on the festival program – including the highly celebrated opening night offering, The Syrian Bride – were made in Israel.

The Syrian Bride* opens the Festival May 7.

According to the Montreal-born Zukerman, it's been a blockbuster year for Israeli fiction films: she speaks glowingly of titles such as Bonjour Monsieur Shlomi, Henry's Dream and Or. "The quality of the films coming out of Israel has taken a giant step forward since we began doing this 13 years ago," she observed. As a case in point, The Syrian Bride (Saturday, May 7, 9:30 p.m.), co-written by Israeli director Eran Riklis and Palestinian screenwriter Suha Arraf, has already earned 15 international awards since its release in 2004.

Since the departure of former programming director Shlomo Schwartzberg, the festival has assembled a panel of six programmers, including Israeli filmmaker Amit Breuer, who now lives in Toronto, and newly appointed programming co-ordinator Larry Anklewicz, who writes on cinema for The CJN. The team winnowed this year's choice offerings from a field of some 300 submissions. "Everyone brought their own take on the everlasting question,'What is a Jewish film?'"Zukerman said. "It's a never-ending debate."

In addition to the festival's roster of Israeli films, numerous entries deal with various aspects of the always-sensitive issue of Israeli-Palestinian relations. "Music, from religious to rap" is another thematic grouping, and includes material for two midnight screenings that will please the hip-hop set: Jericho's Echo, which profiles the Mohawk haircuts and pounding rhythms of Israel's punk rock scene; and Channels of Rage, a dynamic examination of the "anger and competing nationalisms" of an Israeli and an Arab rapper.

A number of festival choices fall into a thematic category that might be loosely labeled "the blame game." Protocols of Zion, for example, is a tough and disturbing documentary by New Yorker Marc Levin, which examines the spurious myth that the Jews were behind the 9/11 attacks. Another is Sister Rose's Passion, a profile of the remarkable Catholic sister whose research prompted the Vatican Council's 1965 declaration that the Church could no longer blame the Jews for the death of Christ.

Yet another festival track is "Jews from distant lands," which includes two kindred docs about Jews in Iran as well as the remarkable Russian film Papa, which prompted the festival to send a special unpaid emissary to Moscow to secure. "Oy! Did we go through agony to get that!" Zukerman exclaimed about the 2004 film, which she described as "probably the first Jewish-content film that Russia has produced in a long time."

Described in the program as a "heartbreaking historical melodrama," Papa is set in an imaginary shtetl in 1929 as well as in Moscow in the prewar and war years, and features a shtetl Jew as its hero.

As usual, Holocaust-related films continue to be a staple of the Jewish cinema: witness Edelweiss Pirates, a documentary about a little-known group of young Germans who attempted to sabotage the Nazis in Cologne in 1944; and Perla: The Last of the Seven Dwarfs, a riveting tale told by an 80-year-old about a dwarf family of Romanian entertainers upon whom Josef Mengele conducted gruesome experiments.

Although the festival is considered a great success as it moves toward adolescence, its box-office revenues barely cover one-fifth of its expenses – a large part of which is used to import the directors and other special guests whose involvement has become a festival hallmark.

"The festival has never paid its way – we're not supposed to, really," Zukerman said. "The box office pays 21 per cent of the cost. We also get some government funding, but most of our funds are privately raised by our wonderful director of development, Roz Davidson. We exist by the generosity of our friends."

Screenings take place at two venues, the Bloor Cinema just east of Bathurst St., and the Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal JCC, at Bloor and Spadina. The opening film is $20; general admission for most other films is $10 or $6 for seniors and students with ID; and weekday matinees are $6. Three types of festival passes are also available. For details, phone 416-324-9121, e-mail boxoffice@tjff.ca or visit the website www.tjff.com.

TWO SPECTACULAR EXHIBITIONS OFFER DISTRACTION FROM OTTAWA'S POLITICAL CIRCUS

The National Gallery of Canada is celebrating its 125th anniversary with a rare and extraordinary exhibition, "Leonardo da Vinci, Michelangelo and the Renaissance in Florence," opening at the Ottawa institution on May 29.

The show features some 125 paintings, drawings, sculptures and prints by the likes of Michelangelo, da Vinci, Andrea del Sarto, Bronzino, Piero di Cosimo and other celebrated Florentine masters. The National Gallery collaborated with a host of prestigious institutions including Florence's Uffizi Gallery, the National Galleries in London and Washington, and even the Vatican, to bring these treasures to Canada.

"Florence from about 1500 to 1550 is one of the most outstanding periods in the entire history of art," said curator Dr. David Franklin, noting that most of the pieces had never travelled to North America before nor been seen anywhere together in one place.

The gallery intends to display the Jacopo Pontormo drawing Reclining Male Nude, an important recent acquisition, alongside the imported masterpieces. The exhibition remains on view until Sept. 5.

Another spectacular museum show in the capital region may also help to distract public attention momentarily from the dizzying political scandal swirling around Parliament Hill.

The exhibition "Pompeii," which opens in May at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull, offers nearly 500 artifacts from Pompeii, Herculaneum and other sites that were buried in lava and ash after the catastrophic eruption of Mount Vesuvius in 79 CE.

Considered the greatest natural disaster of the ancient world, the Vesuvius eruption destroyed Pompeii, a city often associated with wealth and pleasure, leaving a perfect time capsule of city life at the height of the Roman Empire. The exhibition tells the story of the human tragedy of the eruption through frescoes, sculptures, jewelry, body casts and household items.

"Since the first archeological discoveries in the region in 1738, people have been fascinated by the history of Pompeii and by stories about the volcano's survivors and victims," said Victor Rabinovitch, the museum's president and CEO. The objects on view will be "the most complete, intact archeological remains of life in Roman times, and they have rarely been allowed out of Italy," he said.

"Pompeii" runs from May 27 to Sept. 12.

Aharon Appelfeld, one of Israel's most celebrated novelists, sits in a Jerusalem cafe and talks, a flood of memories streaming out. In Adi Fuch's gripping and empathetic Applefeld's Table, he recalls his happy childhood in Czernovitz, his horrific experiences during the Holocaust, his new life in pre-state Israel and his ability to listen to his inner voice and mine these bittersweet reminiscences. Excerpts from his novels are also read.

His bald pate glowing in the light, Appelfeld recalls that his parents' house was full of pleasantness and tenderness and that summer holidays with his grandparents in the country were idyllic.

With the Nazi occupation, he entered "a world of horror," during which he heard his mother's "death scream," witnessed death in "all its shades," and suffered pain, hunger and disease. Through sheer willpower and immense powers of creativity, he transformed all that negativity into "a world of meaning" in more than 30 books, nearly all of which touch on the Holocaust.

Arriving in Palestine in 1946, when he was just 14 but completely matured as a person, he was interred by the British in a refugee camp. He then lived on a kibbutz, where he learned Hebrew and obtained an education. "We came to Israel to build and be rebuilt," he says succinctly. But much to his puzzlement, the Holocaust was not a subject that was discussed in his new homeland.

Having no trusted friends in whom he could confide, he poured his feelings into a diary. As an emerging writer, he wrote about kibbutzim, but soon discovered that the most authentic material in his literary repertoire was the Holocaust. As he puts it, "The past is not an obliterated time. It's the present."

Oriental, Avi Nesher's intriguing film, posits an original link between belly dancing and the failed Camp David summit of July 2000. Elina, an attractive young woman of Russian-Jewish origin and a dedicated belly dancer, recruits a traditional Israeli Arab band for a concert she is planning. She and her Arab collaborators soon find themselves enmeshed in a variety of disputes and, suddenly, her concert seems in jeopardy.

The relationship between their misunderstandings and Israel's failure to resolve its differences with the Palestinians at Camp David due to different negotiating tactics and clashing values, is what lies at the core of Oriental.

Elina looks for order and precision, but her Arab colleagues don't agree with her somewhat rigid approach. When she learns that "reality can accommodate many narratives," she and her Arab collaborators succeed. The Israeli and Palestinian negotiators are not as fortunate. They become embroiled in a welter of mutual suspicions, which wreck their talks. An astute Israeli negotiator sums up the impasse: Israel fears that a permanent peace agreement will only be temporary and unravel. The Palestinians fear that an interim accord will harden into something permanent and leave final status issues unaddressed.

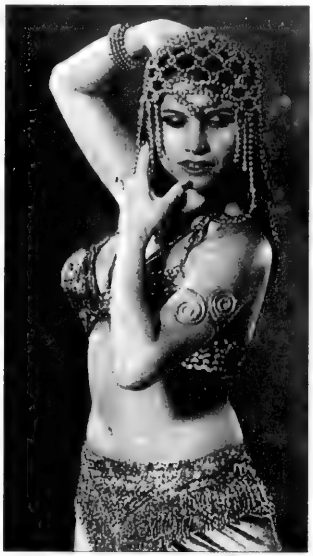
Dan Setton's The Next War: Radical Zionists in the Holy Land is a disturbing profile of a sect of young, extreme Jewish settlers in the West Bank who want to turn Israel into a theocracy and expel the Palestinian inhabitants of the territories. Some of them, known as "hilltop youth," live in unauthorized outposts, which Israel has promised to dismantle under the 2003 road map to peace. Still others reside in settlements such as Kfar Tappuach and Bat Ayin.

Influenced by the racist teachings of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, whose party was banned by Israel, the Kahanists believe that if they do not destroy "the Israeli secular entity" and cleanse Arabs from its towns and cities, redemption will elude them. "War now," chants a typically misguided Kahane acolyte.

This riveting documentary revolves around two themes: their plot to bomb an Arab girls' school in eastern Jerusalem and the cat-and-mouse games they continually play with the Shin Bet, Israel's internal intelligence agency. One of its former directors warns that their extremism poses a strategic threat to Israel. One can clearly understand that after watching this chilling movie.



Belly dancing is linked to the failed Camp David summit in Ari Nesher film.

Keep Not Silent, by Ilil Alexander, boldly explores the underground world of "Ortho dykes," or Israeli Orthodox Jewish lesbians. After taking solemn vows of marriage and giving birth to children, Yehudit, Ruth and Miriam discover that they prefer the company and love of women, and can no longer live lies as "straight" individuals.

In desperation, they turn to rabbis for advice. They are not marriage counsellors.

Yehudit is told that her "weakness" is comparable to murder and that she should live alone in a religious setting. The rabbi seems oblivious to her fear of being alone and lonely. Ruth's husband, Boaz, is informed by a rabbi that her adultery with a woman is less objectionable than not covering her hair in public. Miriam is advised to continue having sexual relations with her female lover as long as she keeps her marriage together. Such advice prolongs their agony.

Watermarks, by Yaron Zilberman, revisits the legendary Hakoah sports club of 1920s and 1930s Vienna, which produced an Austrian championship soccer team and a roster of excellent swimmers who competed in the Maccabiah Games.

This engaging and nostalgic film focuses on Hakoah's women's swimming team. Today, they are all in their 80s and live mainly in Israel. The ladies recall their youths, and the difficult choices they had to make.

Hakoah was formed in 1909 out of sheer necessity. Some regular sports clubs in Austria simply did not accept Jews. Within a few years, however, Hakoah was the world's biggest club of its kind, with over 3,000 members.

Watermarks turns on their warm reunion in Vienna and their final dip together in a familiar pool.

Palestinians in the West Bank under Israeli occupation feel fear, anger, rage and suffocating pressure. Soraida: A Woman of Palestine, by Egyptian-born filmmaker Tahani Rached, reflects these sentiments through the eyes of Soraida ben Hussein and her neighbours in Ramallah, a city re-occupied by Israel in the spring of 2002 after an unprecedented wave of Palestinian suicide attacks.

A secular nationalist, and a militant in the first intifadah, Soraida is an articulate spokesperson for the Palestinian cause. She favours a two-state solution and an end to bombings in Israel proper, but supports attacks on soldiers and settlers in the territories.

This two-hour National Film Board of Canada production, which unfolds against the backdrop of rumbling Israeli tanks and Israeli soldiers cradling rifles, is far too long and repetitious. But its message of opposition to the occupation and yearning for statehood is loud and clear.

ISRAEL'S GESHER THEATRE TO PRESENT ACCLAIMED PLAYS BASED ON WORKS BY SINGER, BABEL

Gesher Theatre, Israel's renowned bilingual Russian and Hebrew theatre company, makes its Canadian debut in June with the Toronto performance of two acclaimed plays, Shosha and City (Odessa Stories). While Shosha is to be performed in Hebrew and City (Odessa Stories) in Russian, patrons will be offered simultaneous English translations via headset.

Shosha, an adaptation of the 1978 novel by Isaac Bashevis Singer, offers an assortment of colourful characters in 1930s Warsaw, including bohemians, philosophers, communist revolutionaries, Jews and gentiles. The story is told through the eyes of Tsutsik, a young writer, and his childhood love, Shosha, as their world falls under the ominous shadow of Adolf Hitler's ascent to power.

City (Odessa Stories) is an adaptation of Isaac Babel's Odessa stories. The play, which was Gesher's successful debut production, is an anthology that portrays Odessa's Jewish-gangster underworld before World War II, and has been described as "Fiddler on the Roof meets Three Penny Opera."

Names in the News: The Toronto launch of Helen and Douglas Davis's book Israel In The World, which spotlights some of Israel's many scientific, medical and other innovations and breakthroughs, drew a crowd of VIPs last week to the Indigo bookstore at Yonge and Eglinton. Foremost among them was Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Ohud Olmert, who praised the book as a model for how Israel should be represented to the world. "It says to the international community, 'Stop this bias – stop focusing on those issues which characterize the State of Israel in an unbalanced way, and focus on the real things,'" he said.

Dignitaries in attendance included Belinda Stronach, Susan Kadis and Senator Consiglio Di Nino from Parliament Hill and Toronto deputy mayor Mike Feldman. Also present were Bahai community representative Gerald Filson, Somalian community representative Dr. Mohamed Kassim, Chaviva Hosek of the Canadian Institute of Advanced Research, Mark Persaud of the Canadian International Peace Project, Joseph Mapa of Mount Sinai Hospital, and numerous top-level representatives from the Israeli government and several community organizations.

Stan Morais, general manager of El Al Canada, presented a spectacular door prize to lucky ticket-holder Carol Wilding of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation. The prize? Return air travel for two to Israel, along with a complimentary four-night stay at both the David Citadel Hotel in Jerusalem and the Sheraton Hotel in Tel Aviv. The affair was co-hosted by Indigo's Heather Reisman, who is giving the book prominent display in the chain's flagship store.

More Names in the News

• Author, journalist and film producer Linda Frum is the new chair of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Women's Campaign & Advocacy, which raised $7 million last year towards the federation campaign. She's the daughter of the late Canadian broadcasting legend Barbara Frum and sister of David Frum, National Post newspaper columnist and former speechwriter for George W. Bush.

• Teachers Meir Balofsky, Donnie Friedman and Dr. Jack Lipinsky have co-authored Telling Our Story, a middle-school textbook that recounts the Canadian Jewish legacy from its beginnings to the aftermath of the World War I era. The book launch was April 14 at the Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Arts in Brief

• Markham Little Theatre presents A Chorus Of Disapproval, a "classic backstage comedy" by Alan Ayckbourn. Markham Theatre for Performing Arts, 171 Town Centre Blvd. $20.50-$17.50. April 20 to 23, 8 p.m. 905-305-7469.

• Karen X. Tulchinsky reads from The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky. Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave. $6 members, $8 non-members. Thursday, April 21, 7:30 p.m. 416-789-5502.

• Fern Lindzon and her Jazz Quartet play at the Montreal Bistro, 65 Sherborne St. Wednesday, April 27, 9 p.m. to midnight.

• "A Peaceful Heart," an exhibition of acrylics on canvas by Tobi Snajdman, is at Gallery on the Bay, 231 Bay St. N., Hamilton, Ont., until May 1. 905-540-8532.

ELLI DAVIS

21ST SUCCESSFUL YEAR AS A REALTOR

#1 IN CENTRAL TORONTO FOR 18 CONSECUTIVE YEARS

CONGRATULATIONS

For the past 21 years, Elli Davis' enthusiasm for real estate has translated into numerous awards of recognition. Elli first earned the title of Number One in Canada in 1987, and her persistence and dedication has allowed her to maintain this position for 13 years.

Elli's portfolio of awards also includes the Number One Realtor in Toronto, a position she has held for 18 years!

Elli specializes in both houses and condominiums. Her primary area of expertise is Central Toronto, including the prestigious neighborhoods of Forest Hill, Rosedale, Moore Park, Lawrence Park, Lytton Park, Chaplin Estates, Allenby, Bayview, Yorkville, the Annex, Yonge St. Corridor, Waterfront, and, the Avenue Lawrence area.

Royal LePage congratulates Elli on her continued success!

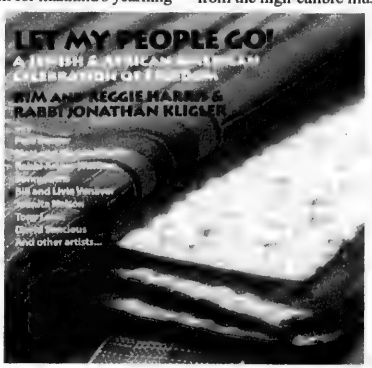
CD features Haggadah melodies and gospel music

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

No story in the Bible has left as large an imprint on the shaping of western values through the ages as that of the Exodus from Egypt.

The liberation of the Israelites from slavery became the paradigm for mankind's yearning for freedom and for the power of human hope and has found its various expressions in western literature and music since the story was first told.



The arrival, therefore, on the eve of the Passover festival of the CD Let My People Go: A Jewish & African American Celebration of Freedom is a felicity worth savouring.

It is an inspiring fusion of traditional songs from the Pesach seder, African American gospel songs and spirituals and the occasional Civil Rights-era reading.

The collection will resonate with anyone who enjoys the lyricism of the sweetly sung, familiar melodies of the Haggadah and the deeply resonant harmonies of black gospel song.

It is an especially memorable musical experience for those listeners who recall the tears, the travail and the triumph of the mid-60s Civil Rights movement in America. Indeed, the 16-page booklet that accompanies the CD is a historical booklet, opening up with the now timeless photo from 1965 of Civil Rights leader Martin Luther King and educator and social activist Abraham Heschel marching together in Selma, Ala.

That photo provides the visual context for the splendid musical offerings that follow.

The first song sets the tone and the content of the CD. It combines the key hortative injunction of the Haggadah, "B'chol dor va dor..." ("In every generation, mankind must see itself leaving Egypt"), with the riveting gospel I'm On My Way.

The work is a collaborative effort of folksingers Kim and Reggie Harris and Rabbi Jonathan Kligler, all of whom have richly entertaining voices. But the record features many more voices, young and old, and benefits from the high-calibre musical arrangements.

One quibble I have with the producers of the CD is the inclusion of a poem by Palestinian poet Mahmoud Darwish. My equivocation does not relate to the legitimacy of the yearning of the Palestinians for their own freedom. Darwish is an internationally recognized poet and considered by many to be the voice of the Palestinian people. And the short poem and its musical rendering are undeniably moving.

Rather my irritation at the poem's inclusion relates to the fact that most of Darwish's national longings relate to the founding of the State of Israel as a form of original sin. Palestinians are not only without a state, his poetry posits, but they were all dispossessed of their lands and homes by the creation of the Jewish state.

This is an untenable premise – morally and historically. And it diminished somewhat for this listener the poignancy in the linkage between the redemption of the Hebrew slaves and that of the inheritors of the black slaves in America.

Despite my quibble, however, the energy and the emotions the CD evokes are an effective mood-setter for Pesach and a compelling social- studies instruction for the constantly renewing relevance of the story of the Exodus.

The CD is available online at www.appleseedrec.com.

Israel defies prognosticators by winning IIHF hockey gold

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There's an old saw in hockey circles that's repeatedly been proven true in the playoffs: the most talented team on paper doesn't necessarily win on the ice.

The NHL record book is littered with the names of great teams that fell short of expectations: the 1971 Boston Bruins for one, and the Ottawa Senators – pick a year – for another.

Hockey's playoff aphorism recently proved true to the benefit of Israel's senior national hockey team. Earlier this month, the boys in blue waltzed into an IIHF World Championship Division II tournament in Belgrade and defied prognosticators who had them pegged for relegation. Instead they skated away with the gold medal.

En route to the gold – the team's first since 2000 in Iceland – the Israelis upset the tournament favourites from Serbia and Montenegro, which squandered the advantage of playing on home ice.

Though more talented than the Israelis, the Serbs learned a brutal hockey lesson to never underestimate your opponent.

Israeli national coach Jean Perron, who led the Montreal Canadiens to the 1986 Stanley Cup, said the key to the gold medal for the Israelis was the second game against Serbia and Montenegro. In the first, they tied a mediocre team from North Korea, 4-4, and most onlookers believed the Israelis were playing to form.

But in game two, the Israelis came out flying and jumped to a 2-0 lead. Employing Perron's strategy of pressuring the Serb defencemen and employing the third winger high to intercept the Serbs' long passes through the middle, the Israelis bottled up the fast-skating Serbs and put them on their heels. It was 3-1 after two periods and the final was 5-1 in Israel's favour.

Israel went on to a four-win and one-tie record. Serbia finished second in the tournament and North Korea third.

Perron said he was surprised the Serbs didn't adjust to his strategy until the third period, but by then it was too late.

"When I look at Serbia after we beat them in the second game, I wondered how did we do that. They had such a great team," he said.

Moshe Eizenman, whose three sons, Alon, Erez and Oren, all suited up for Israel, said Perron's coaching and scouting had a huge impact in the game against Serbia and throughout the tournament.

"Perron made a difference in the way he read the play on the other teams, and he prepared the team to take advantage of the mistakes he saw in the other teams," said Eizenman, who attended the tournament.

Perron created a professional atmosphere where the team concept superseded personal agendas, he added.

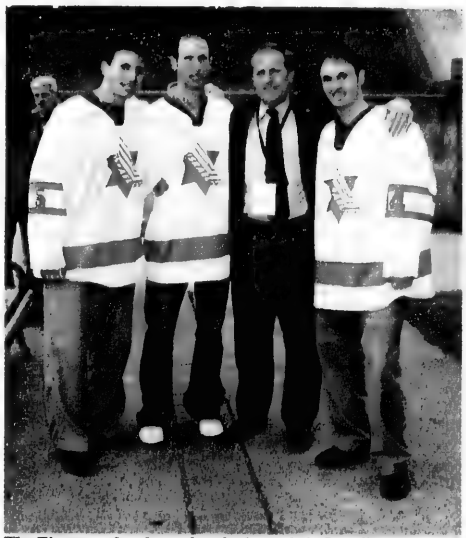
Alon Eizenman, who played professional hockey this past winter with ASG Tours in France, echoed his father's assessment of Perron.

Perron's vast knowledge of the game was clear, Alon said.

"Given the constraints he was dealing with, he put in an aggressive defensive scheme. We were very careful defensively, but told to put on pressure, that they'd make mistakes. It was a trap for the most part with two fairly aggressive forecheckers."

Alon, who played on Israel's other gold medal team in Iceland, said this year's squad was much better. "I was shocked at the progress the Israeli team has made in quality of players and of its play."

The experience was particularly gratifying in that he was able to share it with his two brothers, he added.



The Eizenman brothers played a key role in Israel's gold medal victory. Seen here, from left, are Oren Eizenman, who was selected as best forward in the tournament, Alon Eizenman, coach Jean Perron and Erez Eizenman.

Perron said the Israelis readily accepted the roles he assigned them and "nobody complained. As far as the team concept was accepted, I was surprised."

Perron said Israel iced two good offensive lines, led by the Eizenman brothers. (The Eizenmans scored 15 of Israel's 21 goals, including four game winners.)

At the back end, Perron went with four defencemen: Daniel Spivak, Ron Soreanu, Daniel Bochner and Ron Berman. They were a mobile crew, in good shape, intelligent with the puck, had good size and played sound positional hockey, Perron said.

Goaltender Jevgeny Gussin, who allowed 11 goals in five games, played very well, Perron added.

Bochner, who received an offer to play professional hockey in Belgium next season, said beating the Serbs was satisfying, especially since they had laughed when they watched Israel's first practice.

"Even before the game, at the warmup, you could see them laughing," said the 6-1, 190-lb defenceman. By the middle of the game "they were getting really frustrated. They were yelling among themselves."

Oren Eizenman, who plays NCAA hockey for the RPI Engineers, led the tournament in scoring, registering 14 points on 10 goals and four assists. Sergey Frankel was fourth in scoring with one goal and nine assists and Alon Eizenman, who missed the first two games as his team played in the French elite league championship (they lost to the Mulhouse Scorpions), scored three goals and added three helpers.

With the victory, Israel moves up to the IIHF's Division I (which includes countries ranked 17 through 28 in the world) and will face off against teams stocked with professional players, among them France, Italy, Estonia, Lithuania, the Netherlands and Romania.

"It's going to be tough, but we'll do our best," said Perron.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

The allegations emanating from the Gomery inquiry implicating members of the governing Liberal Party and their friends in a taxpayer-funded fundraising scheme are discouraging, but not unexpected, considering the potential monetary gain involved. People who profit illicitly must return their gains, possibly adding on a 100 per cent penalty. Jewish law states that a ganav, a thief, who tries to hide his activities, must pay back double the amount stolen. Interestingly the gazlan, the brazen crook who openly steals, pays no such fine. At least such a person is not hypocritically hiding behind a cloak of false honesty. Thus, the armed bank robber pays back what he stole and no more – God will deal with the fear he creates in people – while the government bureaucrat lining his pockets pays double.

Understanding the all-pervasive desire for money, our sages tried to ensure that only people whose integrity is rock solid should be trusted with community funds. Jewish law at times actually forbids giving money to people whose honesty is not a matter of record.

Our elected officials are, truth be told, a reflection of the values of the society they represent. While people tend to get excited about government waste, I see no evidence that the practices of government officials are any more or less dishonest and corrupt than societal practices at large – be they in corporations or, sad to say, in many not-for-profit organizations, including those providing "religious" services. In a society with an egocentric culture, with many people predominantly, if not exclusively, concerned with their personal interests irrespective of the public good, we should expect no more.

Our legal codes say that when electing communal officers one must vote "for the sake of heaven." Despite the fact you may personally benefit more from an alternate candidate, Jewish law stipulates that you should vote with the interests of the wider community in mind. While this notion may sound foreign, it is the basis of a properly functioning democratic society. Western philosophers understood that we must be willing to give up some of our rights for the benefit of society as a whole. In the end, we all personally benefit from such an approach. This applies equally to our elected officials, who must vote with more than re-election on their mind.

Let them come and eat

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I have never experienced hunger, going without a morsel of food to eat and not knowing where my next meal will come from. Imagine, however, as we do on Yom Kippur in a condensed fashion, that physical sense of gnawing emptiness, nourished by the fear of one's weakening body. Envision hunger with all its desperateness and disrespect. Then look at your child, or someone you love unsparingly, and consider what it would be like to see them suffering from hunger and not having the means to feed them. Is there any greater parental or familial torture?

I believe that it is for this reason the Passover Haggadah emphasizes, in bold letters, "Those who are hungry, let them come and eat." We are charged on Pesach to actually set a place for a person whose stomach grumbles with the melancholy rumblings of hunger, and we are commanded to consciously and aggressively open our doors to search for a tired creation to come and share the seder with us.

Indeed, the command on Pesach is to not passively respond to the pleas of those searching for food. We are instructed to assertively create a metaphysical place where human beings, regardless of their vigorous or skinny girths, are one in unity, not one in solitude. We the satiated and we the hungry have a symbiotic relationship, each one relying on the other as partners in providence.

In 2005 Toronto, our dread of the stranger – and the city's prevalent fear-culture, which has put millions of dollars in the pockets of alarm companies – prevents us from acting on this dictate in a direct way.

Yet hunger exists in our community, so we rely on organizations with the mandate to feed the malnourished – organizations such as Mazon Canada, a Jewish response to hunger; Tomchei Shabbos, a group of anonymous people who deliver food clandestinely to those who can't afford Shabbat or holiday fare; the National Council of Jewish Women, which conducts a righteous annual food drive that delivers more than 3,500 boxes of matzot, grape juice and Passover meals to shut-ins, new immigrants and other Torontonians; and Congregation Habonim, which, in partnership with Ve'ahavta, holds a spirited and welcoming annual Passover seder for the homeless.

Wouldn't it be honourable and remarkable, however, if on the first night of Pesach, as the sun sets on the Toronto horizon, we actually saw and heard our Jewish neighbours – dressed in fine, shiny attire on Sultana Avenue, Dunvegan Road, Clark Avenue or Palmerston Boulevard – broadcasting noisily like the newspaper boys who once announced the headlines of the daily tabloids, "A PLACE IS SET AT OUR TABLE WAITING FOR YOU! THOSE WHO ARE HUNGRY, LET THEM COME AND EAT! THOSE WHO ARE THIRSTY, LET THEM COME AND DRINK!"

Before the first seder, contact someone you know who survived Auschwitz or Birkenau. Ask them to describe hunger and the underground seder they conducted at risk of death, singing from memory the words of the Exodus and their dreams of freedom, and bidding the ravenous and famished to join them in their paltry Passover Holocaust cuisine.

And when the Pesach seder is about to begin and your holy table of distinction is set with your finest dishes – as well as the shank bone, maror and matzot – clutch your children's hands and lead them outside, where the elements are the uninviting host to many hungry human beings. Together, shout and holler with piercing sincerity that grand invitation, "Those who are hungry let them come and eat."

Wait for a moment. Then wait again. They are listening and might just honour you by appearing and following you into your home – where a place has been set just for them, and where Judaism ensures that not a single Jew is a stranger in a strange land.

Chag Samayach.

We are all connected

Editorial

The literature in this supplement deals with subjects ranging from the celebration of Shabbat, to childhood memories of a Passover seder with family, to the effect the Holocaust had on survivors. But one theme that remains constant is the connection that Jews feel to one another.

Although some secular and religious Jews in Israel and North America are divided both spiritually and politically, the holidays are always a time when Jews of all levels of observance can unite with family and friends to celebrate our rich history and culture.

What we have to remember is that when we observe a holiday, we must not simply go through the motions, but also teach the future generations what it means to be a Jew, that our customs and traditions have meaning and are not arbitrary.

The holidays should also be a reminder that we are a resilient people. We have overcome slavery in Egypt, expulsion in Spain, genocide in Europe, and we will continue to defeat the obstacles that stand in the way of peace in Israel.

With a population of less than 13 million Jews worldwide and the number declining on an annual basis, it is more important now than ever that we stay united and hold on to some part of our Jewish identity.

There are many ways to stay connected to Judaism. Hearing the blowing of the shofar on Rosh Hashanah, or lighting the Shabbat candles every Friday night, or coming together with family on Passover to dine and sing the Four Questions can make us feel a bond with our religion.

I eat matzah on Passover not because I have to, but because I want to feel a connection with my community, to remember the suffering of the Jews who lived before me, to reflect on what it means to be a Jew today.

My hope is that this collection of poetry and prose written by Jews, young and old, with different backgrounds and positions, will provide readers with an understanding that it doesn't matter where you come from – we are all connected to one another.

Sheldon Kirshner's photographic essay on the Jews of India is a testament to that fact.

This Passover, take a step back, enjoy the richness of our culture and accept that being a Jew is not just a designation, but a privilege.

Two risings before shaping

By Sarah Rosenfeld

Brushing the crust with egg yolk beaten with a little bit of water first gives a nice shine to the challah once it has baked in a hot oven for about an hour. The sun beats down on its sesame seed-tiled roof and the braided egg bread, saffron yellow inside, bursts into an enormous wholesome flower.

I baked a challah for his family the first time I met them, wrapped it in a brown paper bag and tucked it away in the trunk of the car. The vinyl upholstery stung my bare legs, while I sat in traffic on the expressway out of Montreal. I fiddled with my ring, twisting it round and round my swollen finger. The summer heat made everything swell. The city seemed to expand and contract behind a thick veil of car exhaust.

"I knew we should have left earlier," he muttered, flicking down the sun visor and tilting his head to one side. He grinned at me from behind silver aviator sunglasses that reflected my face, which was squinting back at him uncertainly in the harsh sunlight.

I stuck one arm out the window, surfing my hand through the waves of hot air. With his broad-knuckled fingers on the steering wheel, he checked me out against the window frame, glancing sideways at me against a backdrop of metallic cars moving like parched crabs in the sand.

"Stop looking at me!" Half laughing, I slapped his blue-jean knee and giggled. My stomach squirmed underneath my tank-top.

"I like looking at you. I like you. I even like you when you're sassy." We were coming up to the part of the expressway where the asphalt and tar become a pinball game, roads twisting and looping in figure eights and arcs, multi-coloured billboards luring us into their shiny picture-perfect worlds.

He reached over to rub my leg, running his hand over the flesh and exploring the smoothness of the skin but feeling the bristle where the hairs were growing back. "What do you feel like doing later? Feel like catching a flick?" he asked.

"We'll check what's playing at… Stop!" I objected. "Stop feeling my legs, I know what you're going to say!" He grasped my thigh muscle, his mouth upturned in a smile and bent over to kiss me on the cheek. I pushed him back with a sticky hand.

"Watch where you're going. What are you doing? We're going to have an accident. Keep your eyes on the road."

He pulled himself upright and stiff in his seat, both hands evenly spaced on the wheel, a mocking smirk on his lips. The wide-bottomed station wagon in front moved sluggishly along, brake lights flashing red with each rattling bounce forward.

"What's this idiot doing?" he fumed. We careened out of the lane and I jetted back into the seat, gripping the vinyl piping tightly, picturing the bread being tossed from side to side amidst the tennis rackets and windshield wiper fluid in the trunk. I imagined the whole package coming undone, the challah twisting out of its paper bag and the sesame seeds scattering like frightened ants into the dense jungle of carpet.

"I hate it when you do this! You know I hate it!" I said, wailing over the rumble of the engine. We flew by still portraits: a man smoking a vanilla pipe, a young woman on a cellphone, a floppy-eared dog drooling over the side of a pickup. Swerving back into the lane, the car came to a halt in one final jerk, tires shrieked, the bumper barely skimming the new silver polish of a Porsche. I scowled at him, at his playful eyes.

"You know I hate it when you do that. You always… I really hate it! If you do it again, I'm getting out of the car. And you do it more because you know I hate it. It would be such a stupid way to die."

The man with the pipe sped past leaving a trail of vanilla smoke. Their lane was moving faster now.

But winding up the ramp, we were invincible. Nothing could stop us hurtling towards the open space, the grey plane of the road. The office buildings loomed behind, glass walls glinting like new pennies.

Usually, we don't say much in the car. He says, "Gum?" and I take a piece. I say, "Can we listen to The Who?" and he slides a CD into the stereo. We open the windows wide just as we're hitting the open stretch of highway, pouring out from the bottle's neck. The sun blinds us when it sinks towards the horizon. Pinball wizard and blasts of air flap and fart against our ears, drowning out the world.

In the excitement of meeting his mom and dad, Bubbie Rose and Zaide Ben, I forgot the challah in the car. It was probably still growing in there, swelling in the heat, sesame seeds spitting as the crust expanded, dotting the dusky sky with golden stars. I remembered it when we started on the salad and thousand island dressing, and I had to wait shyly in the front hall for him to bring the car keys. Closing the unfamiliar front door behind me to stop the air conditioning from leaking out, I left fresh footprints on the lawn, just cut. Barbecue smoke wafted over from the backyard.

She sliced the bread into thick velvety pieces

Bubbie Rose was still busy in the kitchen when I came back with the bread. She was doubled over into the fridge, rummaging through the bottles and jars of condiments in the door. "Murray, you got pickles?"

"I think there's some in there, Ma. Look in the door," he hollered through a mouthful of salad.

"I'm looking, I'm looking," she sang to herself.

I waited patiently, studying the old photographs tacked to the fridge door with an assortment of magnets: Support B'nai Brith Women, a wooden ladybug, I love Miami Beach.

"Doesn't that look delicious," she exclaimed, eyeballing the challah as she emerged from the fridge with a wide jar of murky green pickle juice clasped in her hands. "Murray?" she shrieked. "Murray? I found the jar but no pickles."

"OK," he answered matter-of-factly. "Sheila, we need pickles."

"I'll put it on the list."

I pulled the challah out of its wrinkled bag, careful not to shower the counter top with seeds and crumbs. "Should I cut it into slices? Or does everyone want to tear pieces off?" I asked, standing uncomfortably with the empty bag in my hands.

"Hold on a minute, let's see what we can find here," she answered distractedly, opening up all the kitchen cabinets with her dry, creased hands. She pulled a smoky glass plate from one of the highest cupboards, stretching up on her tippy-toes, the other dishes clattering back into place.

"Doesn't that look delicious," she reminded me, smoothing out her duster snapped snugly over her blouse.

"Bubbie, ask her about how she gave me the business the whole way here in the car and you won't think it's so delicious anymore." He was sitting at the table, impatient, picking at the bits of iceberg lettuce he'd left on his plate.

Bubbie Rose picked up the challah and let it drop – thump – onto the plate. "You be quiet. I don't see you bringing anything to the house."

The cat slipped past, black and fluid, leaving through the open back door where the hamburgers sputtered and smoked on the barbecue. I caught his eye from the dining room and he smiled, squishing one side of his face into a boyish wink, rubbing-his stubbly chin.

"Don't let him give you any trouble," she said elbowing me, and I blushed, thinking how we'd been naked barely an hour before at his apartment, twisting ourselves in the blankets, kissing until we both had chapped lips.

She sliced the bread into thick velvety pieces. "It's so soft. How many times did you let it rise?" she asked, noshing on the bigger crumbs that fell to the plate. "A good challah needs at least two risings before shaping." She carried the loaf to the table, her eyes twinkling like diamond rings.

Outside, the trees shivered in the cool evening breeze. A sprinkler fanned water over the neighbour's lumpy lawn covered with crabgrass and dandelions. The cat paused at the edge of the balcony, a black silhouette against the overgrown impatiens, pink and red, sniffing the new fresh scent rising from the watered grass.

Passover Greetings

Zaida

By Helen Goldenberg

Today I feel so despondent. My wonderful 85-year-old grandfather is in hospital undergoing an emergency operation. My wise and amiable grandfather.

I remember an early Passover. My mother, father, sister, baby brother and I (with a large roasting pan of gefilte fish) travelled 50 miles from Turner Valley along a dusty, bumpy road to join our family in Calgary.

When we arrived at our destination, our weariness dissipated the moment we entered your house. Aunts, uncles, cousins were at the door to welcome the tired travellers.

I greeted everyone and ran to the kitchen to give my Bubba a big hug. I ran to the living room to hug you, Zaida. I remember I suddenly grew shy and hesitated. You picked me up and gave me such a welcome. Little wonder that I loved my grandparents.

Wonderful aromas flowed from the kitchen as we examined the beautifully set Passover tables. The silverware shone, the glasses sparkled on the white tablecloths, used only for the days of Passover. The tables held bottles of home-made red wine, bowls of salt water and hard-boiled eggs, containers of horseradish and plates filled with matzot. A large seder plate and the plate with a cover dividing three pieces of matzah was placed on the first table.

A pitcher of water used for washing hands, a towel and a bowl rested on a table by your chair, Zaida. The tables seemed to go on forever through the living room, the dining room and sitting room. Strangers were always invited to join us.

We sat with our cousins at the "children's" table where we even had our own seder plate. The seder commenced. I glanced up to watch you daven, Zaida. Your yarmulke sat perfectly on your greying hair, as majestic as a jewelled crown on a monarch. Your elegant white gown covered your suit. How serene you looked, your body swaying to and fro in rhythmical motions as you read from the Haggadah.

As the night progressed, we grew fidgety, but managed to keep our eyes on you, dear Zaida. We may have appeared attentive as you davened, but the truth is eight pairs of eyes where watching your every move to see where and when you would hide the afikoman. Together we chanted the four questions in Yiddish.

A seder table as seen in Entertaining on the Jewish Holidays by Ella Banin, Modan publishing

We ate a delicious meal and the moment arrived. We surrounded you, Zaida, to search the entire area. We searched and ran all over, and finally, when the small piece of matzah was found, we greeted the lucky finder with cheers and claps. Funny, I can't ever remember who found the hidden object, possibly because of all the sips of wine I was allowed to drink. It didn't really matter, because we were all rewarded with coins. I realize now it was being together as a family that resulted in the happiness and excitement we shared.

The little ones fell asleep. The older children remained to join the adult table to sing songs and wait for Eliyahu. When we opened the door, no one actually ever appeared, but if we looked hard enough, the full glass of wine seemed to ripple, and somehow a tiny bit of liquid seemed to vanish.

Oh Zaida, please give me the secret of maintaining the magic of the evening for my children and grandchildren. Please tell me how they will also experience fond memories of our Jewish heritage and in turn will one day understand the importance of what you have taught me.

God willing, my darling Zaida, you will again be seated at the head of the table when we celebrate Pesach again this year.

Best Wishes for a Happy and Healthy Passover

A Very Happy Passover

Faigie & Rubin Zimmerman and Family

First Passover in Uniform

By Gordon Berger

U.S.-born Montrealer Gordon Berger enlisted in the U.S. Army in March 1942 and served as company clerk at Fort Hancock, N.J., where he was stationed for basic training. Following is an incident he remembers from his first Passover in uniform.

One day after marching drill was over, a rather frail-looking GI approached me apprehensively. He asked if he could speak to me in confidence. I knew most of the men in Company G but didn't recognize him.

"Sure, why not," I said. "How's it going, soldier?" An easy opener.

"You're Jewish aren't you?" he asked.

His assumption was true.

"Yeah… some of us are. Why?" I asked, wondering where the conversation was going.

"I thought so," the GI said. "I'm a rabbinical student, and I… we… some of us have a problem. Maybe you can help.

"It's the second day of Passover, and to tell the truth, with all this marching and exercise, we're a bit worried about what we're going to eat. Maybe you could speak to the lieutenant to see if…" He looked at me hopefully.

My first reaction was to suggest he speak to the lieutenant himself, but I thought again. Maybe he was right. It might be better if I spoke on their behalf since I enjoyed a good rapport with the lieutenant.

"What in the hell are you doing in a combat outfit?" I asked.

His answer made good army sense. "There are three of us. When we enlisted, they told us we would be assigned to the Medical Corps because we weren't far enough along in our yeshiva studies to qualify for the Chaplain Corps."

Enough said. At least, I could try to help them.

"I'll speak to the lieutenant in the next half hour," I said. "You men wait for me outside the headquarters tent."

I was certain the lieutenant would be sympathetic and I was right.

He shook his head in disbelief. "Just one more army snafu," he said. "They weren't supposed to be here in the first place. I'll try to help… It's an officer's obligation to see that his men eat properly, right soldier?"

"Yes sir," I agreed, wondering how the hell he was going to resolve the problem.

"Tell those men to report to the base hospital immediately and to ask for Captain Levine. I'll phone ahead and alert him. You better go with them, Berger, to be sure that they don't get sidetracked."

I guess I must have looked puzzled.

His stern military gaze softened. "Not to worry, Berger… just trust me. Now, get going."

The three rabbinical students and I walked quickly, two abreast, for the mile and a half to the hospital. We located Captain Levine, who steered us into a curtained-off area, where he asked, "Which one of you is Berger?"

We all wore fatigues and none of us had a distinguishing stripe, so there was no other way he could tell us apart.

"I am, sir," I answered. He nodded, and proceeded to examine the other men, checking their eyes and ears, and peering deep into their throats.

"Mm-hmm. Just as I thought," he said. "These are all advanced cases of predisposition to ravenosia acutus. These three must remain here for observation and be put on a special diet for the remainder of this week."

The rabbinical students became agitated and looked at me in despair. All I could do was shrug my shoulders. I had never heard of ravenosia acutus.

"Not to worry, men," said Captain Levine. "Your diet will consist entirely of kosher for Passover food and, Berger, be sure to tell that lieutenant of yours – my brother-in-law – that his quick thinking has saved Fort Hancock from a very severe epidemic!" The captain gave me a big wink.

I chuckled all the way to headquarters, where I still had my duty rosters to type for the next day. The lieutenant was waiting for me, exulting as if he had demolished a Nazi panzer division by himself.

As I entered the building, he asked, "Berger, would you like a piece of my mother's homemade gefilte fish?"

"Yes sir," I replied. "Maybe with some chrain?"

On the last day of Passover, the rabbinical students were released from the base hospital and transferred to the Medical Corps. Despite their week-long confinement with ravenosia, they had all gained a few pounds.

Moishe Shlemazel

By Stanley Herbert Weisberg

In my parents' birthplace, the town of Podzencheen in the western part of Poland, there were many men named Moishe. One of them, my mother's second cousin once removed, was known by the entire town as Moishe Shlemazel.

Now, as you have probably guessed, Moishe Shlemazel was so named because he was a very unlucky person. And he was so named not out of malice but out of compassion. You have all heard the expression, "everything he touches turns to gold." In Moishe Shlemazel's case, everything he touched turned to stone. Not lead. Lead you can sell. That is how bad his luck was.

Now Moishe might have been a shlemazel, but he was also a mensch. Just because someone is unlucky does not exclude him or her from being an honourable person. Surprisingly, Moishe Shlemazel did not consider himself to be unlucky. However, the entire population of Podzencheen did and they all felt sorry for him.

It started in his teens when his father, Yankel, died suddenly of a stroke. The townsfolk considered it to be a tragedy, but not Moishe. What they did not know was that his father suffered the stroke during one of his frequent beatings of his eldest son, Moishe, who was trying to communicate with God at the time. He was thankful that his prayers were finally and irrevocably answered.

As a result of Yankel's death, Moishe had to quit school to run his father's fabric store and support his mother and younger brother, Abraham. All of the citizens of Podzencheen again pitied him. But Moishe hated school and tried hard not to show happiness at his good fortune in having an excuse to drop out.

As the townsfolk expected, the fabric store did not do too well under Moishe Shlemazel's management. It seemed that when Moishe ordered a large quantity of a popular material, it immediately went out of fashion. Then, when Moishe knocked the price down to get rid of the "gatherer of dust," it immediately came back into style again. The townsfolk felt sorry for him but after all, a bargain is a bargain and they snapped up the material before he could up the price. After a few years, the once-prosperous store was barely bringing in enough to support Moishe, his mother and brother.

Finally, Moishe changed his tactics. After all, a shlemiel he was not. He watched until his wholesaler cut the price on a once-fashionable material. Moishe waited months until he knew the wholesaler was getting anxious to sell. He then offered a ridiculously low price to take the entire stock. Then keeping one bolt for himself, he rented a horse and wagon and took the rest to the province of Galicia, where the people had a reputation for being behind the times. With his mother, Rivka, looking after the store, he peddled the material no one else wanted, door to door until he sold it all – and at a handsome profit.

Rivka, with her illness, became a complainer, a real kvetch

Moishe was now doing really well. So when Abraham turned 18 and asked if he could enroll in the University of Vienna, Moishe promised to support him. Not long after Abraham left, Moishe's mother fell ill. Now poor Moishe Shlemazel not only had to look after the store by himself, he also had to look after her. The store was easy but Rivka, with her illness, became a complainer, a real kvetch.

Not only did the business suffer, but Rivka's incessant demands for attention drove Moishe crazy. After more than a year, she passed on. Almost the entire Jewish population of Podzencheen came to the funeral and whispered to anyone who would listen, "Poor Moishe Shlemazel, he is now an orphan." Moishe, who loved his mother, was thankful that she was out of her misery and was no longer the source of his misery.

Now, with his full concentration on the store, Moishe was able to build his business up again. After all he had not only himself to support but Abraham, whose letters always ended with a humble request for more money. Moishe never refused. Do you think that now God or the "evil eye" or whatever was responsible for his misfortune would leave him alone? No!

In 1914, Moishe was drafted to fight against Germany and its ally, Austria. Because of the war, the price of textiles went up and Moishe was able to sell his store and attached home at a handsome profit. Uncertain of his future, Moishe sent the entire proceeds to his brother. It cost him dearly to smuggle the money into enemy Austria. In his enclosed letter, Moishe begged Abraham to avoid getting drafted into the Austrian army by fleeing to America.

Meanwhile, Moishe fought in the trenches for three years. That is, if you call shooting over the heads of the enemy fighting. Moishe, like many other Jewish conscripts, was loath to shoot at an enemy who might be a fellow Jew, and in this case, even a brother. After three years of trench warfare, Moishe was badly wounded in his left arm and the doctors had to amputate it. Losing his arm earned him an honourable and early discharge from the army and Moishe returned home to Podzencheen.

The town was now divided into two groups: those who wanted to call him, compassionately, Moishe-one-arm and those who still referred to him as Moishe Shlemazel. Regardless of what they called him, everyone pitied him. Moishe, on the other hand, considered himself fortunate to have survived three years of a bloody war and to be able to come home in exchange for an arm, even though the war ended for Russia and Poland three months later. Moishe still felt that missing three months of war was worth the loss of an arm.

'Moishe fell on hard times'

Without his home and store and the meagre pension that he'd been awarded on his discharge, which had stopped after only two months because of the Communist Revolution that saw Poland enter a war with Russia, Moishe fell on hard times.

But with the enthusiasm of a survivor, Moishe tried to raise enough money to rent a horse and wagon and buy bargain textiles to sell in Galicia. Without any collateral and only one arm, the bank would not lend him any money. His friends who said that they would, did not have any money to lend. Moishe finally had to swallow his pride and move into the Podzencheen's poorhouse. Contrary to the belief that Jews are a stingy, money-grubbing people, every Jewish community in Europe in those days, well before government welfare, had a poor house. These were run by the community and not by the synagogue or the government. There, needy Jews were given basic shelter and food. Even if you did not live there, you could always drop in for a meal.

The little money that Moishe earned running errands and doing odd jobs, he used to clothe himself and help pay for his upkeep at the poorhouse. Finally, the war with Russia ended, but he had now been living in the poorhouse for more than three years. He was so unhappy and miserable, that many nights he cried himself to sleep. He had no prospects for the future.

Without an arm, he could not find a job and without a job he could not find a wife. His life, if you could call it living, was at a dead end.

In the past, he had ignored being called Moishe Shlemazel. Events in his life were either misinterpreted to be bad luck, or they were only temporary setbacks. However, now he began to believe that he really was cursed. Now that this latest war was over, the only thing that kept him going was his desire to find out if Abraham was still alive. If he could only see him one last time, his miserable existence would then have had some meaning.

> 'Now he began to believe that he really was cursed'

Without money, there was not much he could do. He prayed daily that Abraham had survived the war. Now that postal service had resumed, he wrote letters to his brother's last address and to the University of Vienna. No one had heard from Abraham for years. Moishe was now more determined than ever to find a job and earn enough money to try and find Abraham.

One afternoon Moishe lay resting against the side of the poorhouse. Exhausted from a morning of wood-chopping, Moishe, eyes closed, was trying to envision what his brother would look like, if he was still alive. He had not seen Abraham in more than eight years and had not heard from him in six years. Suddenly, someone was shaking him awake from his daydream.

"Moishe, Moishe, wake up! Oh my God! What has happened to your arm?" Moishe slowly opened his eyes.

"What a nice dream," he thought. "Here is what Abraham would look like as a man, right in front of me, elegantly dressed like a Polish count."

"Moishe, Moishe, look at me. It's me, Abraham. Thank God, I found you."

Moishe wiped his eyes with his one hand. Abraham dragged him up into a massive hug. As soon as Abraham tried to speak, he began to cry and when Moishe tried to speak, he cried also. There were tears of joy but also of sorrow and shame that they had not found each other sooner. They remained like this, holding each other, for a good half hour. Finally they pulled apart and sat down in the grass. Their knees were too weak to hold them up. Abraham sat next to Moishe and looked up at the sky while he told his story. He could not look at his brother without breaking into tears.

With the huge amount of money that Moishe had sent him in 1914, Abraham had had enough money to escape to America. Once there, thanks to Moishe's gift, he was able to continue his studies at the prestigious Boston Medical School. Upon graduation, he set up his medical practice in Newark, New Jersey. His practice was an instant success, especially with Jewish families who had unmarried, eligible daughters. An entire extended family would switch doctors to see this new prospect. But Abraham was still unmarried because a commitment would cost him at least half of his lucrative practice.

Abraham stopped talking, but he would not let Moishe say anything. One look at him and where he was living already told Abraham more than he wished to know. He had come to find his brother and to take him with him back to Newark. He had not expected to find Moishe in tattered clothes, maimed and living off charity. Abraham could hardly look at Moishe; it broke his heart.

Finally Abraham spoke.

"Come on. Come on, shlemazel. Let's go home."

A Time to Die and a Time to Live

By April Shour Laufer

Her coat hung from her stooped shoulders. With her right hand she clutched her coat at mid-chest as if trying to keep the chill of the brisk spring air from entering her body. It made it seem that she was wearing clothing too large for her small frame. Her eyes focused on her footsteps as she walked with a steady, firm pace.

People moved on either side of her, passing her in both directions. The women wore long coats and clicked along the sidewalk in high-heeled shoes. The men wore carefully creased trousers and shiny loafers with tassels that bounced.

Those who looked saw an elderly woman, too thin, even for her small-boned frame. They saw sunken eyes encased in dark, deep circles. Tucked under her scarf, her hair was an ancient grey colour, not the silvery grey that so many other women her age had, but a tired, washed-out colour that seemed to suit the rest of her appearance. Yet she exuded a certain energy. She walked with such determined steps it seemed as if some great errand lay ahead of her.

Her morning walks up and down Bathurst Street between Roselawn and Lawrence avenues, a distance of one mile each way, had become a habit over the past 10 years. She had lived in this neighbourhood ever since she arrived in Toronto, more than 60 years ago. She knew the buildings, the streets, the movement of the people.

Felix Nussbaum's self-portrait with Jewish identity card, 1943 A Time to Die and a Time to Live

These days she went into the stores for necessities, never just to browse. She didn't pay attention to any of the conversations of the other shoppers as their words floated around her.

"Mr. Brent is using a cane."

"I thought she was going in for surgery at the end of the month."

"He had a heart attack and then a stroke."

"I'm going to buy these treats for the grandchildren."

She would walk only as far as Lawrence then abruptly turn around and walk home, stopping along the way to collect the few items that she needed. Today, she stopped to purchase some fruit and a package of tea biscuits. She bought her biscuits in one store and then her fruit in another – the two stores were side by side. The owners recognized her and greeted her with a friendly smile asking if that was all. She didn't look up at their familiar voices.

'The odours were of luncheon borschts and fried potato latkes'

"Yes, that's all," she replied.

She counted out her change, peering into her small, worn change purse to try to distinguish which coins she was offering. She needed to take out her reading glasses but she couldn't be bothered. She knew the storekeepers always returned any extra dimes or nickels that exceeded the amount of her purchases.

She put her purchases into a small mesh shopping bag that she took from her purse. It was time to go home. She walked, looking down and watching as the sidewalk passed under her feet. She was tired today. More tired than usual. She looked up to check how far she was from her apartment building. One more block.

Her apartment was one of several tall nondescript buildings that lined the street and cast their shadows over the sidewalk. She arrived at her building, took a single key out of her purse and opened the front door to the lobby. Fifteen more steps from the lobby and she stood in front of the elevator.

She looked up as the elevator made its descent. It moved very slowly and made loud creaking noises. The elevator doors slowly jerked open. She looked around to see if anyone else might be coming along, but there was no one. Lately, she didn't like to be alone on the elevator. She was worried it was going to break down, and the thought of being alone in the elevator and waiting to be rescued made her nauseous.

As the elevator's doors began to close, she had to hurry to avoid getting caught in the unforgiving doors. She gave a kind of small rabbit hop onto the elevator, looked at the buttons and pressed 5. The elevator began its slow, cranky ascent, then bumped to a stop on the fifth floor. The doors opened slowly and she took a careful step onto the tired carpeting of the hallway; it was frayed, worn through so that you could see the dull linoleum beneath it.

> It was nice to hear the language of their youth

The odours in the corridor were of luncheon borschts and fried potato latkes. Her stomach grumbled. She looked in her purse for the key to her door and extracted another single key from one of the small pockets on the inside of her purse. She unlocked the door, clutching her purse under her elbow while her mesh shopping bag hung from her wrist. The key wouldn't wiggle in quite right, and she had to put her purse and bag down by her feet to unlock her door. She finally managed to open the door, and with her shoulder, pushed it slowly open. She bent to pick up her purse and shopping and slipped into the apartment.

When she had decided to live here so many years ago, it had impressed her as a sturdy, reliable door, but now it just seemed heavy. She used two hands to shut the door and lifted the chain lock into its place. Stepping onto a faded oval rug, she ignored the mirror that hung on the wall. In the days when she was working, she had always been careful to check her appearance before she stepped out, adjusting a hair here, making sure her lipstick was neat. But now the mirror was too high for her to even catch a glimpse of herself. Her friend Pearl told her that people shrink as they age.

She shrugged off her coat and placed it on the hanger in the front hall closet. It was just two steps into her dining room where she dropped her groceries onto the table. She didn't have the energy to put anything away. Seven more steps into her living room and she settled into her favourite chair.

She thought she should make herself some tea to quiet her stomach, but having relaxed into the chair, she didn't want to disturb the peace that settled about her.

Beside her chair was a small end table with a lamp and one of the many books she was currently reading. She was a voracious reader but found that lately she was rereading books she had enjoyed in the past. She decided that she liked knowing the ending, she didn't like surprises.

Her friend Pearl was going to come over later in the afternoon. Usually she came at least once during the week, but she was in a wheelchair since she broke her hip, and sometimes the companion Pearl had hired didn't feel like pushing her to visit her friend in the apartment across the street. Still, they managed to keep up their visits, alternating apartments, sometimes weekly, sometimes biweekly.

When Pearl did come over, she would put out tea biscuits and some fruit. They would sit and speak Slovak to each other while Pearl's companion smoked a cigarette outside on the small balcony. They spoke Slovak, not because they had any secrets that they wanted to keep from the companion, but just because it was nice to hear the language of their youth. They would sit together, sipping tea in easy comfort with each other, enjoying the warmth of the afternoon sun that flowed through the windows.

'Her nights were filled with a sense of dread'

Though it was true that most of the time she was alone, she told herself she really didn't mind. She had her books that occupied most of her days, but the nights... Her nights were filled with a sense of dread that made her feel panic-stricken, and so she would keep reading because she was afraid to fall asleep. Of this, she never spoke to Pearl.

Pearl had lost her two children and her husband in the Holocaust. One day when she happened to be visiting Pearl, she saw a book on Pearl's coffee table, something new. She had picked it up, flipping through its pages. She remembered Pearl had told her that her nephew had put together her memoirs into a book. She had not meant to read it, but somehow the words jumped out at her and she found herself reading the description of Pearl's last minutes with her children.

"Auschwitz... The doors of the train opened... everyone had to jump out... we were separated... glanced behind me... the two children... alone... hand in hand." She quickly closed the book placing it back on the coffee table. After that one time, whenever she visited Pearl, the book was nowhere to be seen.

They never spoke of the families they had both lost. In all their years of knowing each other, they had filled the void in their lives with casual conversations about friends, work, weather and politics. The long, uneventful afternoons when they sipped tea gave them a companionship that was enough. Yet she was forever caught in a backward glance at her life, wondering where everyone had gone.

After a restless night, she would rise and take her morning walk and then return and settle into her chair. Sometimes she would try and fight the sleep that weighed on her eyelids, but she almost always ended up drifting off. Then her memories poured forth like a deluge and she was plunged into an ever-deepening sadness. She woke up from this fitful sleep gasping for air as if she were drowning in her own tears. And the memories were always the same.

1944 Czechoslovakia. The Germans occupied their town. All the normal activities of the Jews were restricted. Her family was still in their own home, but every day, they watched as more and more people were rounded up.

On that fateful morning, she had slipped into her parents' empty room and snuggled into the warmth and comfort of their heavy feather quilt. She must have dozed off because she was suddenly startled by the sounds of crying and loud and angry voices.

'When she woke, she felt as if she was suffocated by the memories of that day'

The cries seemed to stop as quickly as they had begun. She heard voices. She strained to listen to the different words and sounds. Then she heard a noise on the stairs. A man's voice and the sound of heavy boots stepping onto the landing. She tried to make herself as small as possible burying herself deep under the quilt. Even though she felt as if she were suffocating under the weight of the quilt, she was too afraid to move. She never saw her parents or sisters again. They had disappeared.

She had grown old as that child and now, in her old age, she wished for some other memory to shape her sleep. When she woke, she felt as if she was suffocated by the memories of that day. She would catch her breath finally, and wipe the tears from her cheeks.

The doorbell rang and she slowly pushed herself up from the chair. "Coming," she said. She unlocked the door and there was Pearl.

"I've come for tea," Pearl said brightly. In a few minutes, they were seated in the living room. As the water was boiling for tea, she opened a package of cookies and offered Pearl a plate of fruit.

"Have you seen this morning's paper?" Pearl asked with some eagerness.

She looked at Pearl. Some of her anxiety started to leave her bones as she listened to Pearl's soft but animated voice.

Coughing and Wheezing in Florida

By Eleanor Kunigis Moidel

Everyone at the clinic was coughing and wheezing while waiting to be seen by a doctor. The coughing attacks were suffered by old and young alike. Babies on daddies' laps, elderly people, alone or with family members, single people, men, women and toddlers: all were suffering from respiratory ailments. The germs and bacteria made no distinction between race, religion, age or sex.

As people sat waiting to be called in to see their designated doctor, conversations continued among family members and new conversations started between people who had never before met.

Two couples sat across from one another. The women started to speak. Before long, after just some preliminary information, it was clear that they had similar backgrounds. Both couples had come to Canada after World War II. The women exchanged information as to where they lived, how many children each had, where the children lived and where they were visiting from.

One of the women asked the other why her husband wasn't saying anything. Did he not understand English?

"Of course," she answered. "He understands English."

"Does he understand Yiddish?"

"Yes, he understands Yiddish. He prefers to speak Polish."

"Why?" asked the first woman.

"He just does."

Nothing more was said for several minutes. Then, as if there hadn't been a break in the conversation, she said, "He saved my life. If not for him, I wouldn't be here."

Then, very quietly, the first woman who had been asking all the questions said, just above a whisper, "Maidanek." Without hesitation, the second one answered, "Auschwitz." Again, nothing more was said.

I sat in a chair listening to all of these exchanges, understanding the Yiddish and the English and, yet, not really capable of understanding anything at all. These two couples were lifetime members of a private club to which I did not belong. They were survivors of two concentration camps. Only they understood each other. No one else could.

The nurse poked her head out the door and asked one of the couples to come in. The doctor was ready for them.

The following thoughts ran through my head as I sat awaiting my turn. Languages can be understood when spoken. Events and experiences cannot, unless one has lived through the events. No amount of reading, no lectures, no movies, no documentaries can ever prepare us for understanding anything about this exclusive club. It is a club comprised of survivors, a club of victims who lived through the darkest years in human history. All they uttered were the names of the camps in which they had been victims of unspeakable cruelties. For them nothing more needed to be said. They understood one another as no two people on earth could ever understand one another.

I hope that whatever respiratory problems they had were cured by the doctors and nurses. We need them. They are the last witnesses to the Shoah.

Remember Passover

By Karen Sue

Search beyond the sands of time,
A distant age, across strange lands.
Try to Remember, Remember?
Our Passover story, rebellion over oppression
Glory of freedom, bitters/sweets, four questions.
Teach to Remember, Remember?
Seders rich in tradition, share wine with grain harvest,
Read ancient Haggadahs, future orators among us.
Pray to Remember, Remember?
Tell folk tales, find matzah, sing ancestral songs,
Stories rich with our history, commemorate those long gone.
Tell them to Remember, Remember?

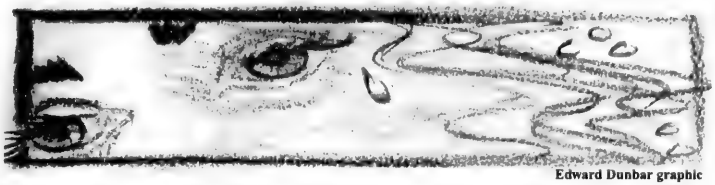
With My Own Eyes I Saw It

By Roselle Stone

You have to have mazal for everything, I always say. My zaide, may he rest in peace, used to say, "only shlemazels believe in mazal," in plain English, "only the unlucky believe in luck." So, if this is true, why did this story have such a good ending? It was pure luck, mazal.

I was about 10 years old at the time, a curious, inquisitive child, and one who loved to run errands. It was depression time, and the ordinary working man earned about $8 to $10 a week, that is, if there was any work. We were poor, so running to the store to buy something was a very important event.



Edward Dunbar graphic

One bright April day, Mamma was busy at home preparing for Passover. Such preparations, I can't begin to tell you. Jewish immigrants, in those days, with very little money, somehow prepared for Jewish holidays, with God's help. The house was turned upside down, steel-woolled, scrubbed, aired and koshered beyond words.

My dear mamma, with so much on her mind, remembered that she forgot to buy some Passover pepper, and asked me to run down to the Jewish market, which today is called the Kensington Market. I was delighted to get out of the house at the drop of a hat. We lived just around the corner of that wonderful place. As a matter of fact, it seemed, at the time, that all the Jewish people lived just around the corner, or close by.

So, I ran down to the market, and believe me, this was some marketplace. Store on top of store, stalls on top of stalls, peddlers on foot, on wagons, on bicycles, on pushcarts, loaded with all kinds of fruits, clothing, household items and whatever else anyone could possibly need, at bargain prices. Every inch of space was used to display wares of every description. Men, women, children, everyone yelling on top of their voices, "bargains here, pay less," in languages I couldn't understand. So much turmoil, colour and excitement, one had to see it to believe it. Being an inquisitive child, I stopped, looked, listened, and had a ball.

Mamma warned me ahead of time to make sure the pepper was fresh, not from last Passover, that it was clearly printed "Kosher for Passover" and that I shouldn't pay more than 15 cents. So I kept repeating over and over to myself, that I shouldn't, God forbid, forget. But I was still a child and could very easily be distracted.

Suddenly there was screaming and screeching. A crowd gathered and I was in the midst of an experience. A woman, shabbily dressed, holding a chicken under her arm, hysterically cried and screamed something in Yiddish like, "God help me, I've been robbed. There are ganovim (robbers) in this market. Blood money, $8, a whole week's wages, a week of sweat. For months my Mendel didn't work, we went hungry, the children cried for bread, I didn't have any to give, now what will I do? Where will I turn? Please God, somebody help me, Oy, oy, I'm – I'mmm…"

She fell to the ground in a faint. A woman loosened her clothing, another poured some water on her face. A few men ran in all directions to look for that thief, that scoundrel, that pickpocket, that lower-than-low human being who would pull such a mean trick. The crowd gathered around, crying out "aza umglick," (such a tragedy), and cursing at whoever the thief could be. I stood motionless, bewildered, shocked, and full of sympathy for this poor soul.

When she finally came to, she started to cry out and continued to search all her pockets. The expression on her face suddenly changed. She stopped her hysteria for a moment. She pulled her hand out of her pocket and there, in the palm of her hand, was a ring. A man's gold ring with a stone in it. "A gold ring," the women around her shouted, "a gold ring with a stone in it, yet." Everyone around her closed in to see this amazing discovery. Everyone was excited and almost in unison shouted, "The thief's ring. That's the ganef's ring. It must have fallen off his finger when he reached into her pocket for the money. It's a miracle," they continued, "it's a miracle."

By this time, I was so breathlessly happy, that I ran all the way home, forgetting entirely about the Passover pepper, and bursting to tell Mamma about this wondrous thing that happened at the market place.

God works in mysterious ways, it is said, and this was a perfect example. With my own eyes, I saw it!

No Latkes at Chanukah??!!

By Rose Romberg

It was an 18-inch flatbread pizza, topped with feta cheese, mushrooms, tomatoes, black olives and a potpourri of herbs. I resisted an insatiable desire to bite into it.

What a treat it would be for the children at my brunch celebrating the last day of Chanukah. Especially since Edward had emphatically warned me, "Mother, no latkes. We're all on diets. Remember, No latkes."

"OK, OK!" I answered, mimicking his tone.

Imagine, no latkes on Chanukah! Unheard of! I had even made the applesauce. That extra ingredient I had added turned it into a gastronomic tour de force.

Of course, I knew their real concern was for my welfare. It was only two weeks since my eye surgery. Lynn had given me quite a battle insisting that the brunch be held at her home. But I convinced her I was fine.

During the past few days, I gingerly put up the decorations, prepared food and baked an apple torte. The fridge and freezer were filled to bursting with containers of tuna, salmon patties, eggplant, pickled beets, vinegar cucumbers and fresh vegetables for the tossed salad, not to mention "strudel and mandelbroit."

Ricki, my daughter-in-law, was bringing her famous yam and pineapple casserole. Lynn, my daughter, was contributing a tray of lox. Lori-Ava, my granddaughter, had dropped off a huge wicker tray filled with an array of dried fruit that could grace a royal table. Yet here was I in the bake shop just to buy a challah, when my hungry eyes saw this mouth-watering flatbread. I purchased both.

Driving home from the bakery, all I could think of was that scrumptious flatbread. I could almost taste it. Back at my apartment, to my chagrin, I realized that there was no way to get this flatbread into my fridge or freezer. I knew this before I purchased it. Then I thought, what were balconies for, if not for storage? It's freezing out there.

Then I remembered the squirrels; how they had destroyed my garden, digging out bulbs and kicking out earth all over my new, green indoor-outdoor rug.

"I'll outsmart those destructive little rascals." I knew there was a good reason why I saved those two sturdy cardboard boxes, I thought.

I wrapped the flatbread in several layers of plastic bags, placed it in a carton and sealed it with strong tape. Then I placed it in a second carton, taped and roped it securely and set it in a protected corner of the balcony. I covered the boxes with a heavy rug, put a large stone on top and surrounded it with six large stones. I then pushed the chaise lounge against it for further protection. Even a raccoon couldn't get at it, let alone little squirrels. With that in mind. I went back into my apartment, satisfied that for the next two days it would not spoil.

On Sunday morning, I got up at 5:30. Ever since I entered the realm of the Golden Years I require very little sleep. I brushed my teeth, showered, tidied the bathroom and bedroom, and in a fresh cotton duster, I headed for the kitchen. I drank my usual two cups of boiled water with fresh lemon.

I had set the table the night before with my best china, crystal and cutlery. My musical brass menorah on a tray surrounded by fresh flowers served as the gleaming centrepiece. I turned on the dining room chandelier to get the serving trays from the buffet drawers, to have ready in the kitchen. It pleased me to see my festive table.

With everything organized, I went back to the bedroom to dress for the occasion.

It was 9 a.m. The sun shone through my peek-a-boo curtains. It was a glorious sunny, but very cold day. I donned a heavy cardigan to bring in the carton with my gastronomic pièce de résistance – the flatbread pizza. I reached out to unlock the sliding door when my eyes almost popped out of my head.

'I was outnumbered'

Just having had my cataracts removed, I thought, my God, what has the doctor done to me? It couldn't be snow I was seeing, because my balconies are protected with the wide overhangs. At first glance, it did look like snow. But no, there were six squirrels with huge beautiful, bushy tails nibbling and frolicking about, having a joyous time. The two large grey ones, I assumed, were the momma and papa squirrels. The four little ones could only be their kin.

Did they, too, know about Chanukah, because they were certainly celebrating. My green rug was blanketed with a substance that looked like little clusters of barley. Did those little rascals drag something on my balcony from another balcony to mess up my lovely, clean floor? Why me? Still in shock, but my eyes more focused, I also noticed their droppings were all over the rug among the food they were nibbling.

I began to shout and bang at the window to scare them off, but to no avail. The papa and the mamma stopped nibbling, stood on their hind legs, stared at me, not blinking an eye, as if to say, "How dare you?" Their bushy tails were like flags on a battlefield waiting for a signal to charge.

I was too frightened to go out. I was outnumbered. But then I realized I had to get my carton, and that motivated me. My mind snapped back into focus. I rushed to my utility closet, picked up the broom and charged out on the balcony. I swung left and right, left and right until they were gone.

"You miserable little…" I shouted. "I'll teach you to mess up my balcony. If I ever see you set foot on here again, I'll… I'll… poison you and not give a care!"

Then, with difficulty, I moved the heavy chaise lounge for my prize package. I stood frozen in shock. But not because of the weather. For a long moment, I stood riveted. Incapable of even crying. I just stood and stared. I couldn't accept what I saw. Then I burst out laughing.

The rascals had outsmarted me. Yes, they did manage to saw through all that heavy cardboard and protection I had so carefully applied, because that exotic flatbread pizza had aroused their keen sense of smell, as it had mine in the bake shop.

Back in the kitchen, I made haste. I gathered potatoes, onions, eggs, matzah meal, oil and reached for the frying pan. I made only 12 latkes. No latkes on Chanukah? Unheard of…

The Day I Struck Out Joe DiMaggio

By George L. Bernstein

I first saw Happy Svenson the day we moved in, sitting on the steps of his porch reading a magazine. He looked up and smiled when the movers cursed, as they whacked their elbows and knees against the furniture while unloading the truck.

Dad lost his business in Toronto during the Depression. After he successfully applied for a job as a teller at The First National Bank in Detroit, the family moved to Windsor. The manager told Dad he was overqualified and might get a higher salary elsewhere. Dad took the job because in the 1930s, elsewhere was really nowhere.

Our new house was a tiny but neat brick semi-detached on Windsor's west side, between the recently built Ambassador Bridge over the Detroit River and the salt mines, just this side of LaSalle. Dad could make it to work in 12 minutes on the bridge, compared to 30 minutes crossing the river on the old car ferry.

On weekends however, Dad would drive his Chevy, bulging with family, food and sports paraphernalia onto the car ferry for our international journey. Bert and I would race up the rails just to the stern of the ship's bridge. With our peaked admiral's caps shielding our eyes from the sun, we would peer ahead, keeping a sharp watch for subs and whales. I'd call loudly down to Dad, "Periscope off the port bow. Depth charges ready".

Bert would yell, "Killer whale 92 degrees starboard. All hands to action stations." Sometimes Dad, far below, would get into the act and aim Bert's baseball bat at the sinister targets.

Bert and I would cross the street and whistle for Hap to walk to school with us. Hap was two years older than Bert and me, who are twins. His mother had died when he was an infant. He was brought up by his dad and an older sister, a part-time usher at the Palace Theatre, and also not bad looking.

'We were devoted Tiger fans'

We were devoted Tiger fans and worshiped Tommy Bridges, the Detroit ace curveballer. Dad took us to Navin Field on every Sunday Tom started a game. We sat directly behind the catcher and gaped in awe as that curveball broke down and away, right at the knees, just catching the outside corner of the plate. Hitters waved their bats in frustration at the ball that was rarely there.

We practised pitching in front of the house, with the same motion and wind-up used by Tommy. Hap watched from his porch, elbows on his knees, chin in hands, looking as glum as a manager ready to send his pitcher back to the minors. We threw all summer long but couldn't get a single pitch to break.

Around the end of July, Hap shook his head, looking more glum than usual, let his magazine drop, climbed out of his chair and slowly crossed the street. Slouching over to me, he motioned for the ball, like a manager about to call for a relief pitcher in a bases-loaded-in-the-ninth situation. Hap was about an inch taller than me, but had a stoop that made us look even. His hair was wheat coloured with a shock almost covering his right eye, and he tilted his head when he looked at you. Gripping the ball, he spread his thumb and index finger widely apart. Then came the wind-up, just like Tommy Bridges, and he threw a real neat curve to Bert, who slapped the ball into his glove yelling, "Steerike three."

Bert fired the ball back to Hap, who flipped it to me. "Keep throwing just that way and soon the ball will do a rhumba for you." When we heard the pleasant lifting lisp to Hap's voice, Bert and I would smile at each other.

I kept throwing all of August but couldn't get a little two-step from the ball, let alone a rhumba. At the end of summer, I reluctantly decided I was really a fastball pitcher. When I threw my first fireball, Hap slouched more quickly from across the street and motioned for the ball again. "Mike, the elbow – jeez, the elbow; don't move it forward like that. Let the forearm move ahead." With Hap expressing so much emotion, I knew he was about to reveal his secret. "Elbow back, rotate forearm, palm down, roll the ball off your index finger – like this!" There it was. I threw the ball at Bert just like Hap showed me, like Tommy Bridges, like all the great curveballers of history, dating back to the pre-dinosaur age; a slow, tantalizing curve, breaking down and away, right at the knees, just catching the outside corner of the plate. The perfect pitch! Hap, Ben and I jumped up and down in glee and ran into the house for some chocolate milk that Mom had just made.

Hap was a frequent visitor to our place. We listened to the radio after school; all the great programs – The Shadow, The Green Hornet, The Lone Ranger and Jack Armstrong, the All-American Boy – sponsored by Wheaties, "the breakfast of champions." Hap's dad had been disabled in World War I and the family lived frugally on his veteran's pension. A radio was a luxury they couldn't afford.

'Hap had never known any Jewish kids'

Hap had never known any Jewish kids and was fascinated by some of our customs. He stood in reverential awe when Mom blessed the Sabbath candles, her auburn hair covered with a white embroidered shawl, hands held over her face and eyes as she whispered a short prayer. The mezuzah, however, cast a spell over Hap; watching our fingers touch it on the right post of the front door and then touching our fingers to our lips. Mom explained that the mezuzah contained a tiny roll of parchment on which a holy scribe had written, with a quill pen, God's sacred words from Deuteronomy. Hap gazed up at it, eyes wide with wonder.

When Bert and I reached our 13th birthday, according to our tradition, we would reach manhood. First, though, we must read my portion of the Bible in the synagogue, on the Sabbath of our bar mitzvah – our confirmation. Hap sat with the family in the front row, wearing a silk prayer shawl around his neck and shoulders and kippah on his head.

Bert did the reading beautifully. While chanting the sacred words from the holy Torah scroll, my soprano voice transmuted to a hoarse whisper as I suffered my first and only attack of laryngitis. The congregation, eyes lowered in understanding compassion, silently vocalized each word for me, coaxing me on, like one would with a faltering runner close to the finish line. I stepped back as I finished the reading, knowing full well I would never make it to the Met. The great Beniamino Gigli, the greatest according to Dad, was to have no pretender to his operatic throne. Just at the moment my raucous biblical soliloquy ended, Hap began applauding. The rabbi, cantor and congregation, including the pretty girl in the front row of the women's section, looked up, appalled. But when Hap's wheat blond hair and sky blue eyes shone in the morning rays of the sun coming through the large stained-glass windows, the congregants smiled and nodded in ecumenical rhythm.

On the way home, Hap nudged me. "Mike, sorry for the applause, but you did sound like a bullfrog and I was just trying to get the pressure off you." I looked back at my parents bringing up the rear. Dad was chuckling, but Mom had an earring-to-earring frown.

A few days later, Dad was reading the paper in his wicker chair on the front porch. Hap and I were playing checkers beside him. Bert was rooting for Hap to win because I hadn't shared exactly half of my Sweet Marie candy bar with him. Hap whistled exuberantly as he beat me with a triple jump.

'Hap's mezuzah rested in my tunic pocket'

Then he suddenly asked Dad if he could kiss the mezuzah, just once in a while. None of us had ever seen a non-Jew do this before and I figured that Dad was really cornered. This had to be the best curveball Hap ever threw. Hesitating only a second or so, Dad answered, "Hap, anyone who loves God can kiss the mezuzah." Dad was stretching things a bit, because, and I didn't know till later, when it came to religion, things were not that simple.

Bert and I started high school together, the year and month World War II began, September 1939. When Mom saw the giant headlines in the Detroit News that Dad brought home, she held Bert and me close to her and silently wept.

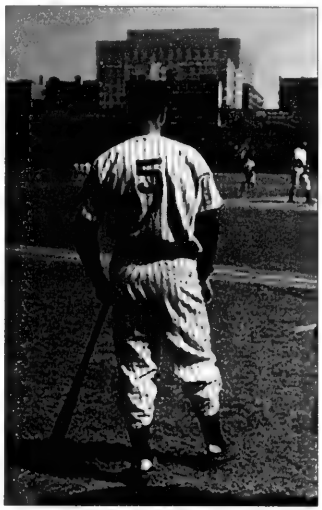
When Hap turned 17, he left high school and joined our Essex Scottish Regiment. After his last home leave, before being shipped to England, Mom and Dad were mystified by the disappearance of our mezuzah. Since it had to be replaced at once, they spoke to Rabbi Ben-David. The next morning, Dad proudly affixed a new mezuzah to the doorpost, one made of pure Jerusalem stone.

'My knees wouldn't stop shaking'

The Essex Scottish Regiment was one of the Canadian units that hit the beaches at Dieppe, a heavily defended French resort town. The daring cross-channel raid took place in the early morning of August 19, 1942. The Border Cities Star reported heavy casualties. After notification of the next-of-kin, the War Department would release names and casualty figures.

A few weeks later, Hap's father, Victor Svenson, walked up our steps, dressed as if for Sunday church and knocked. It was a Saturday afternoon. Bert opened the door asking Mr. Svenson in. He then ran to the kitchen. "Mom, come quick, I think Hap's dad is sick." Mom rushed to the hall and saw Hap's father, tears rolling down his cheeks.

"Mrs. Brodsky, Hap was killed at Dieppe." Mom held his hands and they wept together. Bert and I looked on in disbelief, eyes watering and stunned. My knees wouldn't stop shaking. "Hap never did any real wrong, he never hurt anybody. I received his effects this morning. Your doorpost prayers were found in Hap's tunic pocket." He returned the mezuzah to Mom. "The day he left to catch the train to Halifax, he was a frightened boy and must have felt more secure carrying the prayers. Wherever Hap is now, I know he'll feel better if you forgive him".



Joe DiMaggio

"There's no need to forgive Happy, Mr. Svenson. Carrying the mezuzah – the Lord's words, is no sin, it's a mitzvah, a blessing".

The following year, Bert and I left for England on a Liberty ship named the Compass Rose. These mass-produced tubs had one prime purpose – incapacitating soldiers for combat, by virtue of the loss of all intestinal contents, and the intestinal tract itself.

Hap's mezuzah rested in my tunic pocket. I had a strange feeling that he was watching me in his creaky chair, throwing curveballs from behind the moon, beaning the fellows taking potshots at me. I was nicked just once; likely, because of the only hanging curve Hap ever threw.

The years never end. Each year passes forward into the next and the next passes backward into the year before it. I still kiss the mezuzah when I enter or leave my house. When so doing, I'll sometimes think of Happy Svenson, who taught me, at the age of 13, how to throw that tantalizing slow curve, breaking down and away at the knees, just catching the outside comer of the plate, the perfect pitch, the pitch that struck out Joe DiMaggio in the ninth, with the bases loaded, gaining for me everlasting fame and immortality.

BURNING THE CHAMETZ

One of the last pre-Pesach preparatory acts is the burning of the chametz that was gathered the night before the seder. In these three photos we see different chametz-burning bonfires that are set up on the streets in many neighbourhoods in Israel to enable local residents to fulfill the mitzvah of ridding the home of all chametz in time for the holiday. The Jews of India through photographs

The interior of the Pardesi Synagogue in Fort Cochin, in southern India, as seen from the women's gallery. It is the oldest synagogue in India. The original structure, destroyed by the Portuguese colonialists, was finished in 1568.

As its smallest minority, the Jews of India may be an endangered species.

Sixty years ago, India was home to about 30,000 Jews. But today only 5,000 live in this immense country, mainly in Mumbai, which was known as Bombay until a few years ago.

The community continues to shrink as Jews make aliyah or immigrate to western countries. As a result, some synagogues have been closed or sold.

Though minuscule in size, Indian Jewry is astonishingly diverse.

There are Bene Israel Jews, Cochin Jews and Baghdadi Jews. In the past, they did not always get along.

Jews first arrived in India about 2,000 years ago as traders from the land of Israel. Later, they were joined by Jewish immigrants from Spain, the Middle East and Europe.

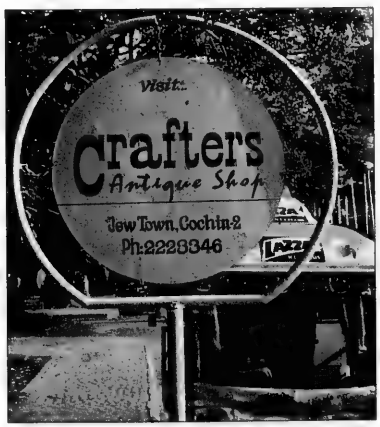
Indian Jews, whatever their origin, always say they have never been victimized by state anti-Semitism.

India, though locked in occasional ethnic violence between Hindus and Muslims, has always left Jews in peace and respected their religion and culture.

This collage of photographs was taken by Sheldon Kirshner, who visited India recently at the invitation of the ministry of tourism.

For further information, contact India Tourism in Toronto, 60 Bloor St. W., Suite 1003. Call 416-962-3787.

Some shops in Fort Cochin's Jewtown carry Stars of David to attract Jewish tourists.



Signs such as these are found all over Fort Cochin, whose Jewish population has greatly dwindled.

Joshua Shapurkar, a Bene Israel, stands in front of Shaar Harahamim, Mumbai's oldest shul. It was opened in 1796 and is in a Muslim neighbourhood today. Though never vandalized, the synagogue was protected by guards during the 1991 and 2003 Gulf wars.

The Jews of India

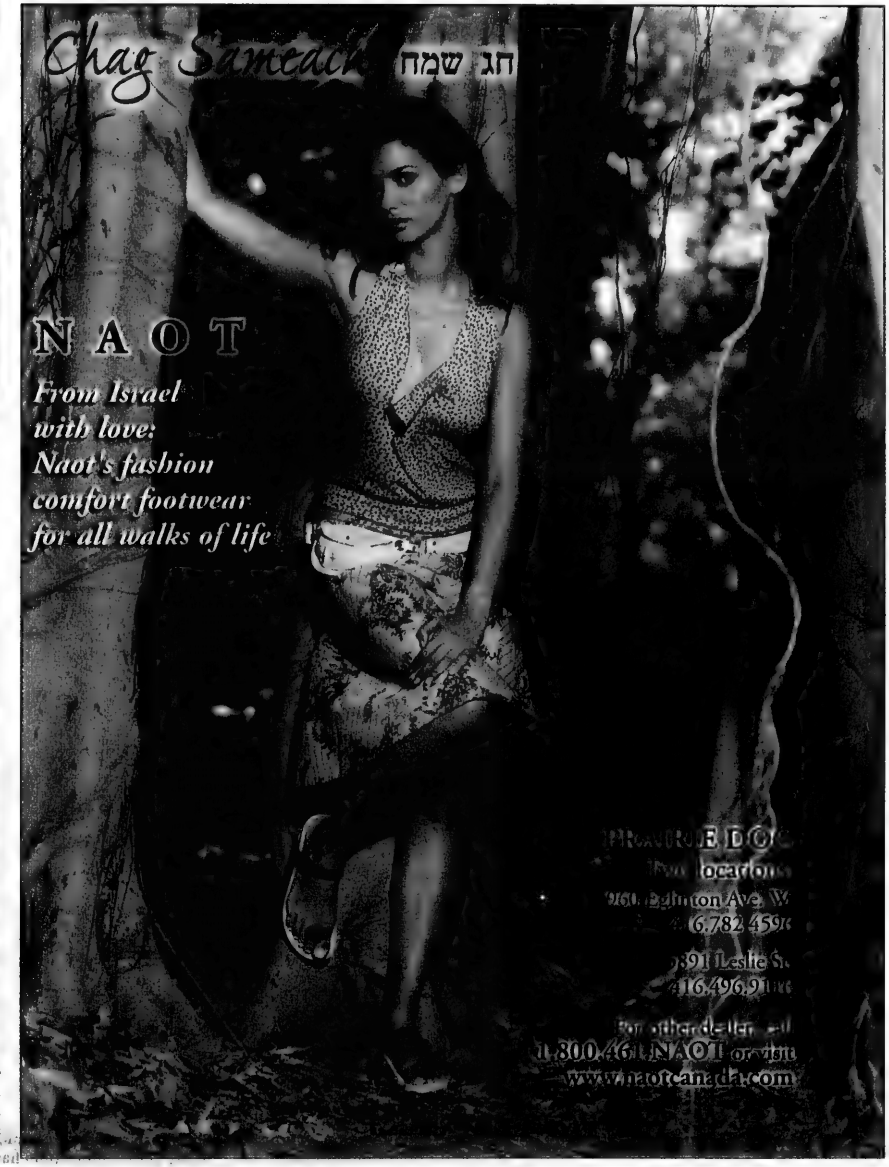
In Parur, 40 kilometres north of Cochin, a lone synagogue, painted in beige and green, stands abandoned in a largely Christian neighbourhood. The last Jewish family in Parur, population 75,000, made aliyah last year.

The Kottayil Kovilakam shul in Chennamangalam, 50 kilometres north of Cochin, is being renovated by the Indian government. It's at the end of a narrow road that cuts through a dense jungle. A decade ago, 20 to 25 Jewish families lived around here. Now there are practically none. In a gully near the synagogue, a Jewish cemetery overgrown with bushes and weeds moulders away. Six boys, all about 15 and divided between Hindus and Muslims, were asked if they knew anything about Jews. They shrugged their shoulders and giggled. When asked about Israel, they engaged in a mock sword fight. They thought Uganda is the capital of Canada.

The Kadavubagam Synagogue in Ernakulam, a big city adjacent to Fort Cochin, has been converted into a nursery. On the left side are bird cages and potted plants. The Munavirul Islam High School is across the street, in a mainly Muslim district.

A sign in Malayalam – a Dravidian language spoken in the state of Kerala – close to the Kadavubagam shul.

Benjamin (Benny) Issac, left, 62, is the director of ORT in Mumbai, India's largest city. Sharon Galsupkar, right, 28, works in ORT's Jewish educational department. Both are from the Bene Israel community. ORT offers vocational training programs and trains prospective immigrants to Israel. ORT also runs a kosher kitchen (which can supply meals to visitors) and a kindergarten and rents out a room to Jewish travellers.



Broken

By Tova Raz

The man wore an old gray sweater that was too long in the arms but too short in the middle; it had obviously been washed many times. His pants were made of a shiny blue polyester that had not been in style since the 1960s. The shoes he wore were a dulled brownish-orange colour and they ended with a pointy toe – those too were from the '60s.

Standing next to him in the checkout line, his wife was dressed only slightly better. She wore a narrow skirt in different shades of brown that ended in a straight line just at her knees and a coat made of an unrecognizable cloth, probably wool. Though her hair was once a mousey brownish colour, it had not been dyed in a long while – the white roots were at least three centimetres long and were clearly visible.

The couple were about 65 years old. The man held their basket of groceries, not a large cart like many of the other shoppers used, but rather the small hand-held red kind. In it, were two onions, one head of garlic, a bag of potatoes, a small bottle of oil, one cabbage, one litre of milk, a bar of soap, a bag of mixed dried fruit for a cooked compote, one box of plain matzah, a small bag of matzah meal, one jar of red horseradish and a frozen fish (it looked like a carp). They had not added their carton of eggs to the the basket for fear that the eggs would break. As a precaution, the wife carried it in her hands.

In a manner known only to couples who have been together a long time, the two turned toward each other at the exact same moment. Without warning, the red basket in his hands collided with the carton of eggs in hers. Taken aback, the woman let go of the eggs for a mere second, but that was enough to send the carton flying to the floor. Upon impact with the tiles, the carton opened and the eggs fell out. A large "omelette" now decorated the floor by checkout 3.

The man let out a cry of surprise, drawing the attention of the cashier, who briefly raised her eyes from the keys of her register. Blankly, she stared at their two faces and promptly returned to her duties without a second glance. The accident didn't distract her for even one short moment.

"Maybe she didn't notice," whispered the man to his wife in Yiddish as quietly as he could.

"Why are you speaking Yiddish?" the wife asked.

The man replied, "I think the workers here don't speak Yiddish. The cashier certainly doesn't understand."

"What do we do now?" the wife asked in a quiet voice, half whimpering half whispering, as if pleading with him to save her. She stood between the newspaper display on the right and the candy display on the left. On the floor at her feet lay the mess of the broken eggs. Two egg yolks remained complete while the others broke and their bright yellow colour spread across the tiles.

"Pick up the carton. Get it quickly," he said. "So she doesn't notice."

"It's dirty. I can't," his wife replied in a whisper. The woman bowed her head down in fear. She cast a quick, surreptitious glance at the cashier, trying to discover whether the other woman was looking at her and whether she knew what had happened.

"Quick. Pick up the carton so that she doesn't see and put it somewhere else. Fast. Go bring another carton," he urged. "And hurry! Our turn is coming up. Look, the woman ahead of us is about to pay her bill."

As she bent down to pick up the empty carton, her narrow, short skirt crept up, exposing the loose white skin covering the back of her thick thighs.

"Stand up. They can see everything," he whispered.

With her knees still bent, she looked up at him wide-eyed. "What can they see?" she asked as she rose.

"It's not important. Walk fast. Go already," he whispered anxiously. He stood in line at checkout number 3 and impatiently looked around from one side of the store to the other. He hoped that she would return promptly, before their turn came up at the register.

But she had yet to arrive by the time he stood in front of the cashier.

Without breaking her concentration and connection with the keys of her register, the cashier mumbled a quick "How are you today, sir?"

Though he understood the verbal greeting, he could not understand why a complete stranger would ask him about the his well-being.

"Thank you, thank you," he answered with a thick foreign accent and a nod of his head. His eyes roamed from the back of the store, where his wife had disappeared, to the front, where the cashier stood. All the while, he hoped his wife would finally reappear.

'There are some good people in this world, too'

As if recalling what had happened five minutes earlier, the cashier stood up on tiptoes, bent over the conveyer belt, looked at the floor on the other side and tried to estimate the size of the mess made by the broken eggs.

The man didn't notice this. At that moment, he was too busy looking to the back of the store, trying to hurry his wife by frantically waving his hands.

But she was still far from the front of the store, walking with her head bent toward the floor, her mind filled with worries: "How much would the broken eggs cost?"

She mentally reviewed the list of dishes she had planned to prepare for the following evening's Passover seder and tried to calculate what they would have to do without to cover the cost of the broken eggs. It would probably have to be the bottle of kosher for Passover wine. They would simply have to manage with the kosher grape juice for the blessings this year. The chocolate-covered matzah they would not give up.

At the front of the store, the cashier picked up the telephone receiver, placed it over her mouth, and said in a clear and commanding voice: "Johnny, cleanup at checkout 3. Cleanup at checkout 3. Thank you."

She hung up the phone and started scanning the contents of the red basket – the onions, garlic, oil, and all of the other items at what seemed to the man like an incredible speed.

The woman finally came up and stood behind her husband. "What took you so long?" he asked in a harsh whisper.

"I looked for something I could use to wipe my hands," she said.

> The chocolate-covered matzah they would not give up

"That's what's important to you? That's what's important to you now?" he scolded.

The cashier looked up from the register and casually asked: "Why don't you go get another carton of eggs to replace the ones that broke?" Didn't you want eggs?"

"Yo, Yo," he answered in Yiddish. So thrown off was he by what she said, he had automatically reverted to his mother tongue. "Eggs, eggs – right," this time he remembered to answer in English. He turned to his wife and carefully took the carton of eggs from her and handed them to the cashier.

Having scanned all of the basket's few items, including the eggs, she asked if they would need any shopping bags. Though he knew very little English, he understood the question and knew that each bag would cost another five whole cents. After having received his negative reply, the cashier pressed the "total" key and the amount appeared on her screen – $27.36.

He quickly took $25 in bills out of his wallet, but had to pick through the coin compartment to find the rest. By the time he was finished, all he wanted to do was gather his purchases and his wife, and walk out of the store.

But out of the blue, the small child who stood in line behind him pulled at his sweater. Surprised, he turned around.

"Michael! Stop!" said the child's mother, looking at the older man in embarrassment. "How many times have I told you not to bother strangers, and certainly not to pull at their clothing?" she asked, not expecting an answer.

When he turned his attention back to his wife, she was standing at the end of the checkout desk. She had taken three used plastic bags from her coat pocket, smoothed them out and was filling them with the newly purchased items. The man came and stood silently by her side.

The cashier adjusted a barrette in her hair and looked halfheartedly at the older couple. "Have a happy Passover!" she wished them, then immediately turned to the cashier on her right and said, "Claire, have you seen Johnny recently?"

As Claire answered only with only a shrug, the first cashier pulled out a roll of paper towels and walked around her station. She tore off a few towelettes, bent down, cleaned up the broken eggs and promptly returned to her position behind the register. She threw the soiled towelettes into the garbage pail at her feet. Looking up at the next customer, she smiled and said in an automatic tone, "How are you today, ma'am?" The mother of young Michael replied, "Good, thank you."

Outside the store, the couple in the old clothes stood still. Wrapping his scarf around his neck, the man said, his voice filled with surprise: "Did you see how they weren't angry?"

The woman, coughing slightly, answered him: "There are some good people in this world, too."

A second look at The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky

By BILL GLADSTONE

Sonny Lapinsky, the memorable hero of Karen X. Tulchinsky's engaging novel The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky, is a Toronto boxer who wins the world middleweight crown at Madison Square Garden in 1948 and again in 1954.

Like a champion boxer, the novel itself has impressive staying power and seems nowhere near ready to leave the ring. If the literary sphere were anything like boxing, the book would have reached the intermediate rounds by now.

Raincoast Books of Vancouver, which published it in 2003, produced a Canadian trade paperback version in 2004 and plans to release a first edition this month in the United States.

As well, movie rights have been sold to Ocular Productions, a Winnipeg film company that has hired Tulchinsky – a former Torontonian who teaches screenwriting at the University of British Columbia – as principal scriptwriter.

Because it draws so fully upon the characters, settings and myths of Toronto's Jewish community from the 1920s through the 1950s, The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky may be likened to Mordecai Richler's celebrated novel The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, which was painted against the backdrop of Jewish Montreal.

The fact that Moses Lapinsky may soon reach the big screen, as Duddy Kravitz did three decades ago, is just one of several notable points of comparison between the two novels.

Both present lovable but emotionally crippled protagonists against a realistic social background that dips into the criminal underworld. Also, both are graced with colourful gangster kingpins: Tulchinsky's larger-than-life Checkie Siegelman with his fancy cars and fat cigars, and Richler's immortal Jerry Dingleman, feared and loved as the immortal Boy Wonder.

As well, both novels are relatively rare examples of Jewish tales set partially in the Holocaust era that do not deal centrally with the Holocaust.

Whether Moses Lapinsky packs the long-term clout of Duddy Kravitz remains to be seen, but it's certainly a worthy contender.

Presented as a sort of fictitious academic biography, The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky traces the history of Yacov and Sophie Lapinsky and their sons Sid, Lenny, Sonny and Izzy through the Depression, World War II and the postwar era. The story focuses on a genuine historical event, the Christie Pits riot of August 1933, as a pivotal occurrence that deeply affects the family's fortunes in the chosen homeland of Canada.

The narrator is Moses Nino Lapinsky, Sonny's middle child, a professional historian who probes into and embellishes his family's history and the city's Jewish past with an ironic edge, from the retrospective distance of half a century.

Karen X. Tulchinsky

"My father was a poor Jewish kid from an immigrant family, from the ghetto at College and Spadina, a neighbourhood in which you were more likely to grow up and become a thief, a bookie, a gambler or dead than a world renowned boxing champion," he tells us as he begins his colour commentary on the family's saga.

Although he purports to be delivering an objective biography, Moses shows little concern for sports-related stories. Instead, his concern is the family's deeply personal interior life and emotional background. Thus, while some scenes are set in the gym and boxing ring, many more take place around the Lapinsky dinner table.

Other scenes take place in bowling alleys, newspaper offices, department and grocery stores, delicatessens, restaurants and the sidewalks and back alleys of downtown streets such as Manning, Palmerston, Harbord, College and Spadina. The book offers wonderful and almost unparalleled depictions of the city's historic Jewish neighbourhoods.

The book also follows two Lapinsky sons overseas during World War II and provides impressively realistic descriptions of Dieppe and other battles. Several scenes of pogrom violence in 1913 Romania are also depicted through flashbacks.

However, the story's main battle occurs locally, in Toronto.

'Sonny is also a great lover'

It's the summer of 1933. In east-end Toronto, a gang of toughs form an organization, the Swastika Club, to keep Jews off their beach. Taking their animosity into a Jewish neighbourhood, the so-called Swazis unfurl a large swastika flag at a baseball game in Christie Pits park. The action provokes a riot that draws in thousands of people and goes on for days.

Until that moment, the Lapinskys were just an ordinary family. But five-year-old Izzy is injured in the Christie Pits riot and left permanently brain-damaged. From then on, the event becomes a central traumatic episode in the family saga.

Eventually, through retelling, it is transfigured into myth and permanently floats above the family's mental horizons, like the Romanian pogrom that devastated Yacov's family two decades earlier.

Sonny, who was babysitting Izzy when the accident occurred, is consumed with guilt, rage and sorrow. "All the feelings under the sun, every emotion known to humans and God ricochet relentlessly through Sonny's battered nine-year-old body," the book explains.

Normally a charmer with a sweet crooked smile, he finds emotional release only through punching and hitting. Finding a natural outlet in the boxing ring, he puts himself into training.

Daniel Mendoza, a real life champion boxer in 18th century England.

That's when Checkie Siegelman spots him, instantly recognizes his potential, and becomes his manager.

Tulchinsky provides highly realistic depictions of all aspects of boxing, a subject she admits she knew little about before writing the book.

But it was Sonny's choice – not hers – that he become a boxer, she explained in an interview.

"I knew nothing about boxing," she said, "but no matter how hard I tried to convince the character to do something else with his life, he was determined to be a boxer. So I had to educate myself on the sport… I wouldn't exactly say I am now an expert, but I do know a right uppercut from a left hook."

With his highly passionate nature, Sonny is also a great lover. When he meets Loretta Mangiomi, the sister of his sparring partner, she only has to look at him for that magical chemistry to take hold. "A force stronger than Johnny's hardest, meanest right uppercut swings from Loretta's eyes and pummels Sonny right where it hurts, in his heart, and somewhere deep in his lower belly."

Because she is an Italian Catholic, Loretta and Sonny are star-crossed lovers, faced with an instant impediment. But their attraction is too strong. After Loretta becomes pregnant, Sonny marries her at City Hall, then brings her home to meet the folks. Yacov, however, will not accept his son's marriage to a shiksa.

Years go by. Sonny and Loretta have one child and then another, but Yacov doesn't relent. His attitude tears Sophie apart. His anger and inflexible attachment to tradition give rise to the novel's central themes of acceptance, compassion and forgiveness.

One of the novel's key subplots revolves around Lenny, the second son.

Lenny is not athletic like Sonny. Rather, he's bookish and sensitive. As a child, he's victimized by street bullies, and as a teenager, he befriends older male librarians and turns them into role models. The author uses this character to introduce themes and issues related to gender politics, but wisely does not allow any whiff of postmodern ideology to intrude onto the page.

Keen on becoming a writer, Lenny initially works for the Yiddisher Zhurnal, but after he is fired for vague reasons, he joins the army. Ironically, his best army buddy is Charlie Bain, a former Swazi who, much to his subsequent shame, had participated in the Christie Pits riot. A far more tolerant and humane figure in his maturity, he deeply regrets his youthful acts of ignorance and malfeasance.

'Something inside him snaps'

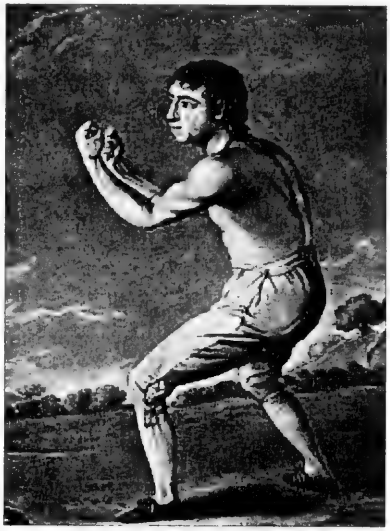
The book's central motif of social violence is echoed in the pogroms, the back-alley bullying, the Christie Pits riot, the blood-sport of boxing and the rising anti-Semitic cruelty in Germany. Unfortunately, the theme is also carried into the Lapinsky household as domestic violence.

For Yacov, the Christie Pits calamity is a cruel echo of the Tiraspol pogrom, when marauding Cossacks killed his five-year-old brother. Days after the riot, something inside him snaps – "the elastic band inside his gut, which stretches from the base of his throat to the centre of his belly" – and he attempts to regain his emotional equilibrium by whipping his children.

Sophie rises nobly in defence of her loved ones. At a time when men traditionally retained the upper hand at home, she orders Yacov out of the house. This key scene reveals Yacov at his worst and Sophie at her best. It also highlights the male-dominated sexual ethos of the times and foreshadows the sea-change that is soon to occur.

A remarkable woman, Sophie seems a bit reminiscent of Ma Joad in The Grapes of Wrath: a tough Depression-era mother, she's much stronger than she knows and is the glue that keeps the family together. A tireless scrubber of floors and peeler of potatoes, her natural domain is the kitchen and the home. She is the heart, soul, healer and caregiver of her clan.

Sophie eventually forgives Sonny for marrying Loretta and longs to see her grandchildren. But when she raises the subject with Yacov, he is inflexible. He recites the Mourner's Kaddish and "rocks back and forth at the table, like a rabbi on the Day of Atonement."



Chanpion boxer Daniel Mendoza in action

A key conversation with her best friend, Tessie, again demonstrates how fully the story is steeped in sexual politics. An independent-minded woman, Tess tells Sophie that if she really wants to see Sonny and his family, all she has to do is go see him.

"The trick," she explains, "is to do what needs to be done, and let him [Yacov] think it was his idea… You don't need his permission to meet your granddaughter. Believe me. A stubborn man is just waiting for his wife to make the move. Then he can blame you for it. So? What do you care about that? Pride shmide. Only men worry about silly things like pride."

This is a moment of empowerment for Sophie. She begins to see Sonny's family on the sly, cautiously taking the first steps that ultimately make all the difference in reuniting the family.

"History keeps repeating itself"

Although he plays no part in the central action of the novel, another family member is so important to it that his name is included in the title.

Moses Lapinsky, the narrator, is a generation or two removed from the story. A University of British Columbia historian, he says he was galvanized into writing his own biography of Sonny after a shoddy bio painted him as "a womanizing wife beater who neglected his children."

Normally mild-mannered and "not given to erratic emotions," Moses is angered by the unauthorized book and takes up his pen. It is Moses who shapes the story into five non-chronological books, overlaying key events from the present and the past as if time is cyclical. His interpretative notes add layers of irony, psychological insight and historical distance to the story.

"My theory," Moses writes, "is that it was in the aftermath of the riots that my father's family began to unravel, steeped in guilt and tragedy over what happened to the youngest son, Izzy. This was also the moment that strengthened my father's resolve to become a champion boxer. These feelings were buried deep inside the family. People didn't talk about their feelings in those days, and there certainly was no money for therapy.

"I surmise that after the riots my father realized two things. One, that with his fists he could hit his mark nine times out of ten, while easily dodging blows from the other guy. And two, that as long as he remained focused on the fire in his belly which came from his rage and sorrow, he would possess a natural ability, what boxers call 'the heart for fighting.' With this secret weapon, as a boxer, he was virtually indestructible."

For the Lapinskys, history keeps repeating itself. For example, Moses knows as a young man that he's cut from the same cloth as Lenny. For example, Moses also rejects the option of violent expression of rage. He can't forget the holes in the walls punched out by his father during his childhood. He records that his father "came close to reciting the Mourners' Kaddish over me, when at the age of 24, six months after discovering I was gay, I revealed the news to him."

To the author's great credit, all of the main characters contain contradictions that make them more human. Sophie has moments of rage, but keeps her anger under control. Sonny, who typically transmutes his inner rage into violence, also has a "deep inner knowing" about spiritual matters. There's a very satisfying unification of opposites here, as if each central character must unite with a shadow self that has always been suppressed.

What is the author's attitude towards the violence that's so pervasive in the novel? Clearly, she's not a pacifist. She strongly disapproves of Cossacks and Swazis, and she seems to have not the slightest admiration for boxing. However, she invites us to cheer when Sonny saves Izzy or Lenny from a bully, and she honours the brave regiments that fought the Nazis. In short, she's a strong proponent of social justice.

'Reunion of father and son'

The novel depicts a society rife with division and social prejudices: the message seems to be that there's a lack of compassion in the world. Many of its settings depict the dark underside of society – a shadowy realm of pool halls, racetracks, bowling alleys, bootleg joints and betting parlours.

The illustrious king of this underworld, at least locally, is Checkie Siegelman. He's a marvellous creation: partial to fancy suits, sparkling tiepins and spats, he smokes expensive cigars, drives expensive cars and carries a huge roll of money. He discovers Sonny in a bowling alley, where the nine-year-old was working as a monkey boy, setting up bowling pins in the bowels of the building. He then supervises his boxing career, sporting him all the way to the "holy shrine" of Madison Square Garden.

Because it peers into the lower depths, Moses Lapinsky is a work of low realism, composed of tragic and comic elements in almost equal proportion. Ultimately, does it lean more toward comedy or tragedy?

Essentially, in tragedy, a protagonist becomes estranged from the society around him as he loses a central contest: tragedy involves disintegration, death or destruction. In comedy, the protagonist wins a difficult contest and is embraced by the society around him. Comedy typically involves the integration or unification of separated or disjointed parts, most often typified by a happy wedding, to conclude the tale.

This second scenario best describes the action in Moses Lapinsky. As I see it, the story resolves as a comedy.

Two bookend scenes open and close the novel. In the first, Sonny is about to face his opponent in a championship match at Madison Square Garden. It's the bout of his life – and he spots Yacov and Sid in the crowd. He's been estranged from his father for 14 years and he turns his anger at Yacov into fighting energy. He wins the crown.

The scene that closes the story occurs two weeks later in Toronto, when the conquering hero steps into Manny's Delicatessen, where he knows Yacov and Sid are sitting with the guys. Tulchinsky achieves more than a technical knockout with this triumphant and understated closing scene. Despite their painful separation, Sonny and Yacov wordlessly reconnect.

This is the essential action of the novel – a coming together of parts, the reunion of father and son. Both Sonny and Yacov have slain their stubborn dragons to achieve this happy resumption of the natural order. The ending of Moses Lapinsky is essentially both comic and optimistic. It bodes well for the future of all humanity.

Karen X. Tulchinsky reads from and signs copies of The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky at the Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., on Thursday, April 21, 7:30 p.m. Admission $6 for members, $8 for non-members, includes light refreshments. 416-789-5502.

Jerusalem Girls

By Susannah Dainow

In Jerusalem
I wandered through the cobblestone streets and alleyways of Meah Shearim,
fascinated by the ultra-Orthodox girls in their secretive ankle-length skirts, the girls who loved God and the word so much that they kissed it every time they saw it.

I wondered how they could be so secure in their love.

I'd been to the Western Wall, been to Masada, been to the Holocaust museums, been to all the important sites and the major religious quarters.
I had no end of opportunities to do it.

I never did.

I never kissed a mezuzah
the way those girls in Jerusalem did.
I didn't know how.

Those girls…
I puzzled and wondered about them when I first saw them in Meah Shearim, and each time I saw them after that – in Tzfat, city of mysticism, or on the Orthodox moshav where I spent a silent weekend.
The image of all those girls has stayed with me, branded into my memory.
What did they know that allowed them to feel things I'd never felt?
What secret were they keeping inside their quiet, chaste hearts?
Those girls, mysteries wrapped in riddles wrapped in loose flowing black dresses, floating over Jerusalem roads and cobblestone pathways, spirits that the old world left behind…

Peace Earned

By Ruth Bernard

Bent over holy text pondering grey head in hand he sits unaware, his allotted hours retreating.
Well read words, yesteryear's buds burst into blooms, their fragrance replenish coffers emptied by human greed one man's holy war, a Tzaddik's way no gun fired or missile launched.

The Torah his source persistent striving, laws come alive.
His efforts not only for him,
impregnating mankind's spiritual void.
Silent righteous one whose gift unseen debt paid in full to life.
Soon he will travel home.
Rest in peace, Zaide mine.

I am self-taught in the art of memorized magic ancient incantations ignite in a moment
bloom at once bright yellow flickering petals spike halos run off into the air

my grandmother would be proud again and again lighting her candle sticks pray respectfully with mellowed hands weighted with worries beneath salt water and scars

my Hebrew is a pretense
I have created myself wrapped in a Canadian shawl on a dead end street move lips in moral denial

Seraphic Vision

By Pearl Adler Saban

As the moon crescents in the night sky
And the stars wink up above
HaShem's evening majesty is revealed.

And closer to home
you, with your dark eyes,
that familiar, warm, nut-brown shade, remain deep in prayer, immersed in learning, wearing your cloak of piety wrapped lovingly around you and worn proudly
like a family heirloom passed down through the generations.

You, with the gentle yet impassioned soul.
Proud like a lion – Ari – but humble in your manner.
With one purpose: to serve family and HaShem.

Your bright eyes are inquisitive; they also smile behind their seriousness
because they know the secrets of the angels, the first order of angels who sit by the majestic throne of HaShem
serving his needs, coming to his aid.

You, like the seraphim, meet the needs of others.
It is you who answers the questions, but doesn't ask them.
You, who seeks to share your knowledge, your wisdom,
ready to impart all with others.
It is you who comforts like a father when you are but only a child.

It is you who brings meaning to life – to Chaim.
It is you who breathes life into words, helping to shape them into tangible ideas,
ideas, that, too,will carry through the generations.

Avarechicha – and I will bless you.
V'yishmerecha and I will keep you.

Pomegranates

By Donia Clenman

I hung you on branches of poems, spiced dreams with saffron and henna.
Just feasting on your lilting sound, knowing your colour is ruby,
that your Hebrew name, "Rimon," sings like bells on the Levites' gowns, took me back millennia
to beginnings.

Casually we met in Israel.
A yellow touristy bus,
a guide with a sharp eye for detail;
Or pride of a nation divorced from the soil?
"A pomegranate tree at the roadside and a ripe fruit on it," she exclaimed, then plucked it and shared it democratically.

Through a narrow incision
we peered into your heart:
a field of crimson kernels,
rows of fetile furrows,
each grain a moist harvest.
Why did the monotheistic Jews choose you for their adornment?
You would do proud fertility goddesses –
Isis, Astarte, a Canaanite Pantheon.
Our lips and hands hennaed,
we sucked uncertain, intrigued.

No pomegranates have graced my table and on my return, I shied away from a friend's brimful plate.
Just gazed at the curved pattern of seeded infinity and dreamt of "Rimon" before the knife had shorn us of innocence.

A World Away

By Ken Kalman

Sitting here so far away
I think of what you must be doing
Late afternoon here in Tel Aviv
Mid-morning in Montreal.
I sit and dream then let it go
I see soldiers arrest a troubled Muslim boy
You see a rabbi escort a young Jewess back to her parents
I see the sun setting on a pro-Palestinian peace rally
You see the sun rising on a pro-Israel student demonstration
I am exhausted from a swath of endless threats and sirens
You are refreshed watching our girls board the Hebrew Academy bus
I feel the cool breezes of evening,
For a moment I feel safe.

You feel the warm winds of morning,
You always feel safe.
I watch the news of a car bomb's devastation this morning
You are living this morning
I drink a relaxing cup of tea to calm me down
You drink a pick me up coffee to get you going
I am tired and weary of all this violence
You are energetic and ready for each new mission
And yet we are both here and there
What is a mile or two or a thousand or more
When we are both here together
You are in my heart this evening
I am in yours this morning.

The Telling

By Brenda Spigelman Ajzenkopf

Why is this night unlike all others
Are questions the youngest must say
We recline, we pray, we ask the Almighty
Please deliver us from Egypt this day.

Bitters and herbs are ours to consume
To remember the Exodus then
We eat, we drink, we cross the waters
Are pursued by Pharaoh and his men.

The Haggadah reading commands that we tell
How our ancestors toil, how they cry
We plead, we bend, we climb with Moses
And receive the tablets at Mount Sinai.

Elijah is here my father sings out
All bear witness as he flies
We tremble, we hide, we wait as he nears
We peer down through his ancient eyes.

Panorama

By JC Sulzenko

At seventeen, I claim my starched maid's uniform
Pack, then travel for days and nights across the country by train
Arrive after dark, impatient to view "Perfect Lake Louise"
The next morning disappoints – mist rides the mountains
A tease of milky jade hints at the famous waters

In the hotel lobby – my domain for the summer –
I walk along walls of windows, between brocade chairs, a rag in one hand, a bag for ashes, wrappers, old gum in the other Six days a week, I vacuum, dust the high halls
Scrub sinks, floors, toilets
Cease to see the georgette greens of the lake

All day, people stream past, stop to sit or take photos just like postcards in the gift shop
Sometimes they say, 'hello,' offer me a tip
Otherwise, I feel invisible

Mid August, the lake turns emerald, clear
A tour bus belches blue-rinse women asking for igloos and one man in brown checkered shorts
Chewing a stogy, he approaches

"Do you have many Jews here?" his voice polite
Heat rises up my neck, fills my throat
"Do you have many Jews here?" He's smiling.
Smiling!

I can't take a step
My eyes fix on the plush tartan carpet
"How can you tell ?" The words so quiet
I hear my blood rush to their aid

"You can smell them!"

No time to think. I face him.
"Can you smell any now? Take a deep breath!
No? Well, here's one!"
I point to my heart

He opens his mouth
The cigar drops to the floor

I bolt through a mirrored door
Rush down hidden corridors to my one friend in this glacier summer

I tremble in his arms –
the first time afraid for who I am

The Musical Kabbalist

By Carol Katz

Spiritual revelations
Are foremost in his mind.
A mystical experience
A poem so divine.

Song of the souls
Swaying in the wind
Drinking from the well
Of the Almighty King.

Joyful and blissful
He dances to the moon
He enters a paradise
On the wings of his tune.

He hums a joyful melody
Arms lifting in the air.
He prays to HaShem
And forgets all his cares.

Song, the soul of the universe
The realm of heaven sings
Niggunim without words
To a higher sphere it brings.

Connectiveness to others
How the heavens roar
Chanting and singing
The inner rhythms soar.

To attain a prophetic state
Is the Kabbalist's goal
A musical journey
Of our sages long ago.

Body meets soul
Ruach and nefesh
Anatomy of the spirit
A higher form of rest.

ONE IS BETTER THAN TWO: These two youngsters have a different technique. They prefer to share their piece of matzah. [Israel Sun photo]

Bellow restored soul to American literature

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Nobel laureate Saul Bellow, a master of comic melancholy who in Herzog, Humboldt's Gift and other novels championed and mourned the soul's fate in the modern world, died early in April age 89.

Obituary

Bellow's close friend and attorney, Walter Pozen, said the writer had been in declining health, but was "wonderfully sharp to the end." Pozen said that Bellow's wife and daughter were at his side when he died at his home in Brookline, Mass.

Bellow was the most acclaimed of a generation of Jewish writers who emerged after World War II, among them Bernard Malamud, Philip Roth and Cynthia Ozick. To American letters, he brought the immigrant's hustle, the bookworm's brains and the high-minded notions of the born romantic.

"The backbone of 20th-century American literature has been provided by two novelists – William Faulkner and Saul Bellow," Philip Roth said last week. "Together they are the Melville, Hawthorne and Twain of the 20th century."

He was the first writer to win the National Book Award three times: in 1954 for The Adventures of Augie March, in 1965 for Herzog and in 1971 for Mr. Sammler's Planet. In 1976, he won the Pulitzer Prize for Humboldt's Gift. That same year Bellow was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature. In 2003, the Library of America paid the rare tribute of releasing work by a living writer, issuing a volume of Bellow's early novels.

"If the soul is the mind at its purest, best, clearest, busiest, profoundest," Ozick wrote in 1984, "then Bellow's charge has been to restore the soul to American literature."

Saul Bellow

In spite of or perhaps because of all the praise, Bellow also had detractors. Norman Mailer called Augie March a "travelogue for timid intellectuals." Critic Alfred Kazin, a longtime friend who became estranged from Bellow, thought the author had become a "university intellectual" with "contempt for the lower orders." Biographer James Atlas accused Bellow of favouring "subservient women in order to serve his own shaky self-image."

Old-fashioned but not complacent, the author strove to ward off the "Nobel curse," not to be softened by literature's highest honour. He kept writing into his 80s and, hoping to make his work more affordable, had his novella A Theft published as a paperback original in 1989.

His recent works included The Actual, a sentimental novella published in 1997, and Ravelstein, a 2000 novel based on the life of his late friend, Allan Bloom, author of The Closing of the American Mind. Also in 2000, Bellow was the subject of Atlas' acclaimed biography.

Bellow had a gift for describing faces, and the author's own looks - snowy hair, aristocratic nose and space between his front teeth – were familiar from book jackets. His personality was equally distinctive.

In Humboldt's Gift, the narrator's childhood sweetheart refers to him as a "good man who's led a cranky life." His longtime agent, Harriet Wasserman, once described him as being as "deeply emotional as he is highly intellectual and cerebral."

After teaching for many years at the University of Chicago, Bellow stunned both the literary and academic world by leaving the city with which he was so deeply associated. In 1993, he accepted a position at Boston University, where he taught a freshman-level class on "young men on the make" in literature.

Like his characters, Bellow's life was an evolution from the unbearable but comic passion of the Old World to the unbearable but comic alienation of the New World.

The son of Russian immigrants, he was born Solomon Bellows on July 10, 1915, in Lachine, Que., outside Montreal. He dropped the final "s" from his last name and changed his first name to Saul when he began publishing his writing in the 1940s.

When he was 9, his family moved from Montreal to Chicago. Bellow learned Hebrew and Yiddish as a young man, and the Bible was a living text. His family life was one of violence (his father), of sentiment (both parents) and of humour (everyone). Nothing was left unsaid.

The classic Bellow narrator was a self-absorbed intellectual with ideals the author himself seemed to form during the Depression. While he would remember the fear most people had during those years, Bellow found them an exciting and even liberating time.

"There were people going to libraries and reading books," he told the Associated Press in a 1997 interview. "They were going to libraries because they were trying to keep warm; they had no heat in their houses. There was a great deal of mental energy in those days, of very appealing sorts. Working stiffs were having ideas."

He was a contributor to the Partisan Review, along with Kazin, Mary McCarthy and the poet Delmore Schwartz, whom he would re-imagine as Von Humboldt Fleisher in Humboldt's Gift. He debuted with Dangling Man, in 1944.

From the beginning, Bellow was determined to tell a different kind of American story, to depart from the tight-lipped machismo of Ernest Hemingway.

"Do you have emotions? Strangle them. To a degree, everyone obeys this code," Bellow wrote in Dangling Man. While the Hemingway hero keeps his problems to himself, Bellow declared, "I intend to talk about mine."

While the Bellow themes were in place from the start, his prose matured later. As the author himself would acknowledge, his early books were too prim, too careful. Only in 1953, with The Adventures of Augie March, would readers see another Bellow: the funny Bellow, the immigrant Bellow and Bellow, the son of a bootlegger.

"There was a way for children of European immigrants in America to write about this experience with a new language. I felt like a creator of a language suddenly and was intoxicated. It was truly intoxicating and I couldn't control it. It took me several books to rein it in."

Augie March and the books that followed – Seize the Day, Henderson the Rain King and Herzog – established him as a major writer.

Among his most personal novels was Humboldt's Gift, which Bellow described as "a comic book about death," culminating in a graveyard scene as emotional as anything he wrote.

He had five wives, three sons and, at age 84, a daughter. In December 1999, Bellow's fifth wife, Janis Freedman, gave birth to their daughter, Naomi. Bellow, quipped about finally having a girl: "If I didn't succeed at first, I'll try again."

Appreciating Saul Bellow's Jewishness

By JOHN J. CLAYTON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

It disturbed me to hear on U.S. public radio and read in the New York Times that Saul Bellow was to be seen as simply an American writer – which, of course, he is – and not significantly a Jewish writer.

Maybe they think they're doing him a favour? I think they're bleaching out a lot of the substance of Bellow, who died April 5 at 89.

The Times quoted him as saying he had no wish to be part, along with Roth and Malamud, of the "Hart, Schaffner & Marx" of American letters. Well, who would? No good writer wants to be pigeonholed or limited in scope. But he is a deeply Jewish writer – not just a Jew by birth.

Jewish culture, Jewish sensibility and a Jewish sense of holiness in the everyday permeate his work.

As a child, Bellow attended Jewish schools and grew up in a Jewish family, where he learned Hebrew thoroughly and spoke Yiddish as a primary language. It's a Yiddish that never went away.

Isaac Bashevis Singer's Gimpel the Fool is read today in Bellow's great translation. Yiddish phrases and syntax are found in many of the novels. In Herzog, the protagonist is snobbish about the Yiddish of his wife's lover.

But more important is Bellow's Yiddishkeit sensibility: never a schmaltzy echo of Sholem Aleichem, but a reliance on the eastern European Jewish heart against which to measure life. I'm thinking, for example, of Schlossberg in The Victim, the old Yiddish journalist who makes the beautiful speech that defines the moral vision of the book.

It's a great speech and central to Bellow's vision.

Attacking those whose suspicions of human life turn it into something cheap and empty, Schlossberg says, "I am as sure about greatness and beauty as you are about black and white. If a human life is a great thing to me, it is a great thing. Do you know better? I'm entitled as much as you… Have dignity, you understand me? Choose dignity. Nobody knows enough to turn it down."

Saul Bellow

Bellow has said of the "Jewish feeling" within him that it resists the claims of 20th-century romanticism, the belief that man is finished and that the world will be destroyed.

The world in Bellow's fiction is, on the contrary, sanctified. The sanctification is often ironic, often in struggle against the neurotic patterns of characters and the foolish, vulgar, meretricious quality of contemporary life. Herzog, for instance, resists "the argument that scientific thought has put into disorder all considerations based on value… The peculiar idea entered my (Jewish) mind that we'd see about this!"

Of course, Moses Herzog, like so many of Bellow's Jewish characters, feels ashamed that he can't live up to his ideal, his Jewish ideal of a mensch. But it is a Jewish ideal – for Herzog and for Bellow.

In novel after novel by Bellow, there are Jewish characters in a significantly Jewish milieu. The Victim concerns a character facing anti-Semitism and his own neurotic defences as a Jew. Seize the Day deals with a son who wants love from his cold, un-Jewish father. The novel ends at a Jewish funeral with the protagonist weeping for the dead stranger and for himself. Herzog is centered on the complicated world of a Jewish childhood.

Even the late short fictions, especially A Silver Dish and Something to Remember Me By, are deeply Jewish. A Silver Dish, for example, sets a Jewish world view against a Christian one.

Bellow has given us a rich Jewish-American world. But he has also given me, as a writer, a complex style, a way of handling contemporary reality, that he derived from both Jewish and American fiction.

You find in Sholem Aleichem, in I.L. Peretz, in Isaac Bashevis Singer, a way of finding the beautiful, the holy and the meaningful in the midst of the comic, the ordinary and the tragic. Bellow is a poet who works with laughable, vulgar materials and works them in the service of a noble vision.

Irving Howe quotes these famous lines from the great Yiddish writer Mendele Mocher Seforim: "Israel is the Diogenes of the nations; while his head towers in the heavens and is occupied with deep meditation concerning God and His wonders, he himself lives in a barrel." But Bellow has added to this mixture the grace and rhythms of the art novel in English, such as those by Henry James and James Joyce, and the speech rhythms of American writers like Mark Twain. He has given us a new kind of sentence, composed of street talk and philosophy, mixing language of the heart and language of moneymen, machers, American sports and con men.

This new sentence has been taken up by all American writers, Jewish and non-Jewish. If Israel is a blessing to the nations, Saul Bellow has been a Jewish blessing to all writers.

John J. Clayton, a retired professor of modern literature and fiction writing at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, is an award-winning and widely published author of novels, short stories and literary criticism. His work Saul Bellow: In Defense of Man won awards in literary criticism. His collection Radiance was a finalist for the National Jewish Book Award in 1998.

Jewish groups welcome new pope

CJN wire services

Canadian Jewish groups joined their global counterparts and Israel in adopting mostly positive responses to the election of a doctrinaire, German-born pope last week.

Pope Bendedict XVI

Only hours after Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger was elected leader of the world's one billion Roman Catholics, Jewish organizations around the world were quick to note that the new pontiff had made a point of atoning for his wartime membership in Nazi Germany's Hitler Youth by helping to champion Jewish-Catholic relations.

> Hope for continued reconciliation and brotherhood

"The Jews have nothing to worry about," said Tel Aviv Chief Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, a Nazi concentration camp survivor who last year heard then-Cardinal Ratzinger deliver a speech against anti-Semitism in New York.

"Though as a teenager he was a member of the Hitler Youth, all his life Cardinal Ratzinger has atoned for the fact," Abraham Foxman, national director of the U.S. Anti-Defamation League, told Reuters.

As guardian of church doctrine for a quarter of a century, Ratzinger played a key role in Pope John Paul's pilgrimage to Israel in 2000, where the pontiff prayed for forgiveness for historic Christian abuses against Jews.

In a statement, Israel's President Moshe Katsav congratulated the new pope and expressed confidence that he will "continue the path of the late John Paul II regarding reconciliation and brotherhood between the religions and peoples of the world."

Israel's foreign minister, Silvan Shalom, said he hoped the pontiff will be "a strong voice against anti-Semitism in all its forms."

Ratzinger, who took the name Benedict XVI upon his election last Tuesday, has been called a hard-line conservative, a vigilant watchdog and an enforcer of strict church orthodoxy.

"We hope that under Pope Benedict XVI, the doors to communication between Jewish and Catholic leadership will remain wide open,

Canada changes votes at human rights body

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A little-noticed change in a vote by Canada at the United Nations is being heralded as an important departure from Ottawa's Middle East policy.

Earlier this month at a session in Geneva of the UN's Commission on Human Rights, Canada abstained on one resolution critical of Israel and voted against another. Both were repeats of Canada's stance in years past, when the same standard measures were introduced.

But Canada's vote shifted on a third resolution, from support to abstention. The resolution expressed "grave concern at the continuing Israeli settlements and related activities, in violation of international law," and "demanded that Israel, the occupying power, comply fully with its legal obligations."

The measure referred to settlements in the "occupied Palestinian territory, including East Jerusalem, and the occupied Syrian Golan." It also specifically condemned Israel's recently announced plan to build 3,500 additional housing units in Maale Adumim on the outskirts of Jerusalem.

The resolution passed by a vote of 39 to two, with 12 abstentions, including Canada.

In his explanation of the vote, Paul Meyer, Canada's ambassador to the commission, said Ottawa considers the establishment and maintenance of Israeli settlements, and the construction of Israel's security barrier, as "contrary to international law and against a permanent and comprehensive settlement to the issue."

There was "much" in the resolution that Canada could support, Meyer stated.

The News in Brief

CANADA

New Terror Victim Bill

OTTAWA — Tory foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day tabled a private member's bill last week that would allow Canadian terror victims to sue their attackers, as well as governments and groups that sponsor them. The bill is being backed by families of victims of Palestinian terror – including the family of Yehezkel Goldberg, a Toronto-born doctor killed by a suicide bomber in 2004 – as well as families of victims in the Sept. 11 attacks and the 1985 Air India bombing. They are being supported by a new group called the Canadian Coalition Against Terror. B'nai Brith Canada strongly praised the bill, while Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, called it "the first step in a process to see that the planners, recruiters, financiers and propagandists are made responsible for the fallout of their actions." A similar law exists in the United States.

New B'nai Brith Prez

MONTREAL — Longtime Montreal Jewish community volunteer Gerry Weinstein is the new president of B'nai Brith Canada, the advocacy organization announced last week. Weinstein, who had been serving as B'nai Brith's national senior vice-president, was asked to take on his new post after Harold Davis resigned due to an illness in his family, B'nai Brith said.

WORLD

Church Pushes Peace

CHICAGO — The Evangelical Lutheran Church in America says it will invest in a strategy to promote Mideast peace. At a meeting earlier this month in Chicago, the church council – the governing board, of the five million-member group – approved $100,000 (US) to fund the campaign "Peace Not Walls: Stand for Justice in the Holy Land." It aims to promote Israeli-Palestinian coexistence, reduce Palestinian poverty and achieve a negotiated settlement that includes shared control of Jerusalem. The group also wants Israel's West Bank security fence to be dismantled.

L.A. Jews Targeted

LOS ANGELES — Dozens of Jewish residents, businesses and synagogues in the Los Angeles area have been barraged by hate mail in recent weeks. The FBI, the U.S. Postal Service and Los Angeles police are investigating the large manila envelopes, some of which had "Die Jews Die" scrawled on them. The letters were part of mass mailings and did not seem to be targeting anyone individually, the Anti-Defamation League said.

New Shoah Memorial

BUDAPEST — Hungary's Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany dedicated a new memorial to Holocaust victims in Budapest. Unveiled April 16, it consists of 60 pairs of shoes cast in iron, alluding to some of the thousands of victims shot into the river by the Arrow Cross, the Nazis' Hungarian allies in World War II. April 16, was national Holocaust Memorial Day in Hungary, recalling the day the ghettoization of Jews in the countryside began in 1944. Also April 16, 200 people marched outside the German Embassy in Budapest to support Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, who is in jail in Germany for spreading hate.

Rallies Against Israel

JAKARTA — More than 10,000 people attended anti-Israel rallies in Indonesia on April 17. The rallies came days before African and Asian leaders were to meet in the capital Jakarta to discuss aid for Palestinians. Speakers at the largest rally, held in Jakarta, called on the United States to end its support for Israel.

CanFor Families Get Share of Record Award

VANCOUVER — Descendants of the founders of CanFor, Canada's largest forestry firm, including five children of current chair Peter Bentley, are sharing in a record $21.8-million (US) award from a fund set up by Swiss banks in 1998 to settle a class action suit by Jews who had assets seized by the Nazis, the Globe and Mail reported.

A U.S. judge made the award earlier this month from the $1.25-billion fund in a claim involving the takeover of an Austrian sugar refinery once owned by the Bloch-Bauer and Pick families. In 1938, as the Nazi takeover of Austria loomed, Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer and Otto Pick tried to protect their shares in the refinery by transferring them to a Swiss bank. Under Nazi pressure, the bank sold the shares to a German.

The claim was filed by Maria Altmann, 87, Bloch-Bauer's niece, and another two dozen heirs, including those of refinery shareholders Leopold Bloch-Bauer, who fled to Canada and changed his surname to Bentley, and his brother-in-law John G. Pick, who changed his name to Prentice after also fleeing to Canada. The pair founded Pacific Veneer and Plywood, a forerunner of CanFor, in New Westminster, B.C.

Michael Bentley and Prentice's daughters Elizabeth Jarvis and Marietta Hurst are among the beneficiaries of the award, the Vancouver Sun reported.

Varied Israel experiences lead youth to aliyah

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

They have carried out missions in Israel's army, fallen in love, toured the land and volunteered as emergency workers. Through these experiences, five young Canadian Jews have come to the same conclusion – it's time to make aliyah.

"I've been a Zionist all my life," said 19-year-old Joey Lightstone, who is primed to make aliyah this summer.

"I feel that if you're going to support something, you should support it all the way… and the best way [for me] to do that is to join the Israeli army."

Lightstone recently joined fellow young prospective Canadian olim at the Israel Aliyah Center in Toronto to discuss the allure of Israel and the dreams they have for new, improved lives in the Holy Land.

The history major's desire to serve in Israel's army was cemented in 2004, when he engaged in simulated army training through the Marva program (see sidebar).

With his flight just a few months away, he is understandably anxious.

"I'm very excited, but absolutely petrified," said Lightstone, a former participant in the Magen David Adom ambulance volunteer program.

"Leaving everything I know is intimidating."

For Zach Shamir, a 21-year-old student in the York University-Sheridan College design program, moving to Israel can't come soon enough.

"I was ready to go two years ago," said Samir, who participated in Marva two years ago and visited Israel last summer.

"When I'm there, I feel like I'm at home – accepted and completely at peace."

Eddie Walker's love affair with Israel is steeped in romance and serendipity.

In 2004, the Toronto native ventured on a Birthright Israel trip and became smitten with a guide named Romi on his trip.

"We fell in love on the trip," Walker said, a head-over-heels glint evident in his eyes.

"I cried like a baby when I left."

These young people from Toronto feel the time is right to make aliyah and are gearing up to move to the Holy Land. From left, in the top row, are Zach Samir and Jordana Goldbloom and in the bottom row are Eddie Walker, Ari Wexler and Joey Lightstone.

Iran is not to be trusted

From the editor's desk

Two weeks ago, on April 13, an article appeared in the National Post reporting that the government of Iran was about to launch a multi-billion-dollar campaign to encourage tourism, especially from the West, to the Islamic republic.

On the same day, the Globe and Mail reported that Iranian judicial authorities had "formally rejected Ottawa's renewed request for a forensic examination of Zahra Kazemi's remains." Kazemi was the Canadian Iranian photojournalist who was tortured and murdered in Iranian custody in the summer of 2003. The Iranian judiciary, it must be recalled, first denied Kazemi had been killed in custody, then said she died of a fractured skull and brain hemorrhage, but acquitted the individual charged with Kazemi's death.

The juxtaposition of the two articles on the same day could have comfortably fit into the pages of Alice in Wonderland, so surreal was the unintentional twinning of the stories.

But, alas, there are no childlike saving graces to the behaviour of the Iranian rulers. They are dangerous. They harbour deep-seated contempt for the ways of the West and fanatical hatred for the sovereign Jewish state. They bear strict watching. Ultimately, they will have to be confronted.

The question is where and how.

When Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon visited U.S. President George W. Bush earlier this month, the majority of the media's coverage dealt with the impending Israeli civilian withdrawal from Gaza and with an apparent difference of opinion between the two leaders on the subject of the announcement by Israel that it would accommodate the natural growth of Ma'aleh Adumim – on the outskirts of Jerusalem – by allowing the addition of some 3,500 homes there.

But the two men also spent a great deal of time discussing the question of Iran's nuclear program, though western media attention on this issue was scant.

The Israeli media, not surprisingly, covered this aspect of the summit meeting widely.

They reported that Sharon presented Bush with the latest Israeli intelligence assessments of Iran's nuclear weapons program. He called on Bush to expedite diplomatic efforts to prevent Tehran from developing a nuclear weapon.

Israel believes that Iran is prone to economic and other pressures from the international community. An aide to the prime minister said it is still possible to influence the behaviour of the Iranian government, although he added "there is very little time."

Israel wants the subject of Iran's nuclear program brought urgently before the Security Council. The U.S., however, is not rushing to act. It is hesitating, Israeli media reported, "out of concern over difficulties in garnering a council majority for sanctions."

Great Britain, Germany and France are negotiating with Iran to persuade the mullahs' regime to abandon aspirations to develop a nuclear arsenal.

But to no avail.

Moreover, the Americans and the Israelis both believe the Iranians are prevaricating, merely playing for time, and stringing the Europeans along under a facade of bona fide bargaining, while their scientists feverishly try to resolve technical difficulties that are believed to have developed in the Iranians' program.

Israeli media reports suggested that the U.S. and Israel disagreed on the state of Iran's nuclear readiness.

Some American analysts believe there is still a considerable period of time before the Iranians can successfully build a nuclear weapon.

The Israeli evaluation, on the other hand, according to Ha'aretz, "says it it is only a matter of a few months from the moment Iran solves its technological problems until it can produce its first nuclear bomb. Israel has therefore proposed [to the U.S.] that futile negotiations, which the Iranians are taking advantage of, be stopped, and sanctions be imposed."

Meanwhile, Iran appears to be trying to immunize itself against the eventuality of its nuclear program being brought before the Security Council. As reported in the New York Times this week, "Iran's ruling clerics are meticulously arranging energy sales and building partnerships with influential countries, including China and India, as a way to win stronger friendships around the world." Iran is offering the two countries very favourable terms for securing its oil and natural gas needs far into the future,

In other words, Iran is cultivating China's veto power in the Security Council to stop sanctions from being imposed against it.

At the end of his visit to Bush's ranch in Texas, Sharon was asked whether Israel would take unilateral steps to protect itself against Iran.

"We are not planning any military attack on Iran," Sharon answered. "I think that here it should be a coalition of democracies who believe in the danger, led by the United States, in order to put pressure upon Iran."

But what if the democracies prove incapable of putting pressure on Iran?

Iran is not to be trusted. The family of Zahra Kazemi will attest to this. So too should the government of Canada.

MONKEY BUSINESS: It is quite clear that the big apes at the Ramat Gan Safari Park are no respecters of tradition. Jewish tradition stipulates that matzah (unleavened bread) should not be eaten in the month before the festival of Pesach (Passover) itself, but only at the Seder table on the eve of the festival. But some folks just can not wait to get their teeth into a nice crispy matzah, while others just will not share their matzah at all. [Isranet photo]

Parents work to form new school after UCS announces closing

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Parents of children currently attending United Congregational Schools have mobilized to create a new supplementary Hebrew school following a recent announcement that UCS will cease operations after this school year.

"The group has totally become very proactive," said parent Andrea Pines. They hope to have a new school up and running by September and are looking for new families to join them, she added.

The parents were notified of the school's impending closure in an Apr. 10 letter from UCS board co-chairs Pearl Rosen and Gary Gottlieb. The decision followed the withdrawal of "significant" financial support for the coming year by one of UCS' two sponsor synagogues and the likelihood of the second shul doing the same.

The existing school was formed as a joint effort of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue – the school's current home – and Beth David B'nai Israel Congregation (now Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation) in 1974, but became an independent school in 1992. It experienced a month-long teacher's strike in 1995, and has suffered from declining enrolment for at least the past decade.

At its height in the late 1980s, UCS had classes at both locations, as well as at three Thornhill sites, with more than 700 students in total.

The two-day-a-week school currently serves more than 80 students, representing 69 families, from Junior Kindergarten to Grade 7.

A group of about 30 concerned parents met twice last week to weigh their options and plan a course of action. A representative of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, with which UCS is affiliated, was there to offer support.

"We're trying to design a program of quality," said Ari Levy, who has three children at UCS. He added that the parents are working on a business plan and intend to meet the requirements of Conservative synagogues for pre-bar and bat mitzvah education.

For some parents who live within walking distance of Beth Emeth and are unable to drive their children to a more distant school, a nearby location is also a consideration.

The BJE gave the school "a little extra [financial] help" to survive the year, said Seymour Epstein, the BJE's executive director. "We clearly didn't want the children to suffer and have the school close mid-term."

Other donations also helped the school meet its financial obligations this year, according to the UCS board letter.

At one meeting attended by The CJN, parents questioned why the UCS board did not let them know earlier that the Beth David board had decided to withdraw its funding for 2005-06 last September. It was only recently, when Beth Emeth had also not committed to funding for the coming year, that the board contacted parents. Rosen said they had been waiting for a decision from Beth Emeth.

Although there were a couple of references to feelings of anger and frustration at the meeting, parents were more focused on dealing with the situation and making plans.

Rabbi Philip Scheim, Beth David's spiritual leader, told The CJN the decision not to continue to fund the school was a difficult one that was put off for a long time. Currently, only a handful of children of members attend the school and there are no longer classes on Beth David's site.

"It was a painful decision, but I understand it," he said of the shul board's decision.

"We weren't serving the Beth David community well if only three [members' children] were attending," Beth David president Jay Harris said.

Likewise, Beth Emeth president Pearl Grundland said her board had to make "as prudent a decision as we could. We've been struggling with how to deal with this as a synagogue. It's really a disappointment that it's come to this."

Rabbi Howard Morrison, Beth Emeth's senior rabbi, stressed the synagogue's commitment to Jewish education. He said the synagogue would be "more than glad" to be involved in an "action plan for after UCS."

The rabbi believes the school's closing is "symptomatic of a larger problem" and that it ran into difficulty in part because of increasing enrolment at Jewish day schools.

Strike averted at El Al Airlines

Union leader calls agreement 'a positive step forward'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There will be no strike at El Al's Canadian operations.

El Al Israel Airlines and the union representing 12 of its office and airport workers reached a collective agreement last week that was subsequently approved in overwhelming numbers by the employees.

Dave Neale, president of local 1976 of the United Steelworkers of America, which represents the employees, said the union and El Al worked diligently to come to a settlement, and he called the new three-year collective agreement "a positive move forward."

Stanley Morais, general manager of El Al's Canadian office, agreed that relations between labour and management remained amicable and professional despite a tentative strike mandate adopted by the union.

The Steelworkers had demanded that employees be paid if Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur fell on a worker's day off. They also asked El Al to revise its schedule so employees would not have to come back for work only five hours after the end of a previous shift, and they asked El Al to pay the Ontario Health Premium levied by the provincial government on employees.

Neale said that under the new collective agreement, employees will be paid for the High Holy Days only if they fall on a work day. In a letter of understanding between the parties, El Al and the Steelworkers agreed to meet within 30 days to continue discussion of the scheduling issue, and El Al also agreed to write to the Ontario minister of health and to Premier Dalton McGuinty to ask that the health premium be dropped.

While it appeared the union backed down on the last few issues that divided it and the airline, Neale said the complete package provides workers with several improvements over the last collective agreement, which expired in December 2003. Wages will increase by the cost of living and the agreement includes improvements in health benefits. In addition, the old collective agreement allowed for only one day off for Rosh Hashanah if it fell on a work day, he said.

Morais said in the talks leading to the collective agreement, the airline acknowledged that its employees had made sacrifices when business dropped as a result of the 2000 Palestinian intifadah. At the time, workers had their hours cut back by 20 per cent, resulting in a substantial reduction in take home pay.

Stanley Morais

El Al recognized that sacrifice by workers, and in 2004, it returned its Canadian employees to a full schedule, Morais said. El Al agreed to cost-of-living increases in salaries and to other benefits, a far cry from the situation at other airlines, where employees have been forced to take wage cuts, he added.

As well, the airline agreed prior to the strike vote to give employees two days off for Rosh Hashanah if they fell on a work day, Morais said.

For new school to succeed, it has to balance budget: Epstein

Epstein, however, said that not all supplementary schools are hurting. Some, he said, are "doing quite well."

There are more than 40 supplementary schools –with about 4,500 students in total – affiliated with the BJE, he noted.

For a new school to succeed, it has to balance its budget, Epstein said.

"It's clear that the union is not the only issue here," he added, referring to a suggestion that union salary levels worsened the school's financial problems.

"If you can't change your costs, you have to increase your revenue," Epstein said.

Rosen said the decision to close the school breaks her heart. "I was hoping there would be some option… My only concern now is the education for the students and keeping this precious community we've had all these years together."

With a daughter still in the school and a son who has graduated, Rosen feels the school has fostered good friendships and that the students have learned "so much."

Hoping Benedict XVI will bring blessing

Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger was chosen last week in Rome as the spiritual leader of the world's 1.1 billion Roman Catholics, nearly one-sixth of all the people who inhabit the earth, by a conclave of his scarlet-robed peers. He is the 265th pope in the church's history. The power that runs with his responsibility is awesome. But the history that has run with that power these past 2,000 years has, for Jews, been mostly a troubled, wary one.

After World War II, with the selection of Pope John XXIII, the relationship between the Catholic Church and Judaism began to change. The wariness began to abate.

With the papacy of John Paul II, there was a virtual sea change in attitude by the the Church towards Judaism as a religion and toward Israel as a sovereign Jewish state. The great hope among Jewish leaders and spokespeople is that Pope Benedict XVI will walk on the inter-religious road paved by his predecessor.

In congratulating Cardinal Ratzinger on his ascension to the papacy, Israeli President Moshe Katsav expressed confidence that the new pontiff "would continue the path of the late John Paul II regarding reconciliation and brotherhood between the religions and peoples of the world."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa, Canadian Jewish Congress' chair of religious and inter-religious affairs, echoed Katzav's laudatory assessment of the Pontiff's predecessor and implicitly asked the new pontiff to continue what John Paul II began. "We are grateful for the strides that have been made under the church's previous leadership to place religion at society's centre as a force for good in transforming the world," Rabbi Bulka said.

In an address last Wednesday to cardinals gathered in the Sistine Chapel, Benedict gave a clue about his intentions for the future of inter-religious relations by emphasizing his desire for dialogue between the church and other religions.

"I address everybody, even those who follow other religions...

"To all, I turn with simplicity and affection to ensure that the church wants to continue weaving an open and sincere dialogue with them, in the quest for the real good for man and society.

"I will spare no efforts and dedication to continue the promising dialogue with different civilizations that was started by my cherished predecessors, so that a better future for everybody" can "originate from mutual comprehension," he added.

In the fullness of time, we will know Benedict XVI by his deeds as well as his pronouncements. Until then, we lend our voice to the many that have been raised in good faith and great hope bidding the new Pontiff a vigorous papacy marked by personal good health and understanding and peace among all religions.

We truly hope that Benedict XVI will bring blessing upon all mankind.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

McGuinty and Olmert together (1)

I was very disturbed to see the smiling photo of Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty alongside Israel Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on the front page of The CJN ("Israel, Canada firm up industrial ties," April 14), given the recent history of our premier. It was not that long ago that McGuinty rescinded the education tax credit, returning the province of Ontario to the status of funding only Catholic schools to the exclusion of all other religions. In addition, the way in which he revoked the credit, doing it retroactively, was very mean-spirited and anti-democratic. We need to constantly remind the community of the injustice that has been done to us by this government and particularly by this premier.

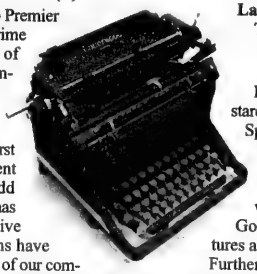
McGuinty and Olmert together (2)



On seeing the smiling photo of Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty beside Israel Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on the front page of The CJN (April 14), one might get the impression that our premier is a warm and supportive friend of the Jewish community of Ontario. Oh, would that this be the case! This is the premier who made it his first order of business to revoke any government funding of our Jewish day schools. To add insult to injury, he did it retroactively, and has to date refused to consider any alternative forms of funding our schools. His actions have brought untold suffering to the middle class of our community, who are buckling under unaffordable tuition fees. He has inflicted severe damage on the cause of Jewish continuity by creating a situation in which many families are abandoning or not considering Jewish education because of the oppressive fees. With friends like this premier, who needs enemies?

Abbas' Holocaust-denying PhD thesis

Journalist Shmuel Segev has claimed that in private correspondence with Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president told Segev that in his doctoral thesis, he said the Holocaust was an exaggeration because he had to write what the Communists wanted to hear, in order to earn a PhD from a Soviet university ("Muslim's criticism of Abbas rebuffed by Jewish journalist," CJN, March 31). If Abbas is genuinely a negotiator for peace, why was this information shared only by him and Segev? Surely, any unbiased observer, as well as those who are pro- or anti-Israel, would agree that if Abbas came forth and renounced his thesis, he would obviously be a man of courage, truth, and an absolute mensch. The lack of such a declaration speaks far more eloquently than I.

Response to Lockshin

If Martin Lockshin wants to take issue with our complimentary newsletter, Israel News, now entering its 11th year of weekly publication ("Offensive material at shul steps over the line," CJN, April 7), one would have thought he could have chosen a better context than my friend Arthur Rosenzweig's literal quote from Sefer Devarim of the Chumash. If Lockshin has problems with the quote, rather than call for censorship of our newsletter, perhaps he should be calling for censoring of our Torah.

Crucifixes are not idols

In his letter to the editor ("Jews forbidden to stare at crucifixes," CJN, April 21), Rabbi Shalom Spira suggests that Jews are forbidden to stare at crucifixes. The Torah, officially written about 2,000 years before crucifixes were thought of, talks of idols. At present, no western Jew is in danger of losing his faith in God by looking at an idol. Pictures and sculptures are no longer a threat to our faith.

Furthermore, a crucifix is not an idol. It, and Jesus, is the way that Christians use to communicate or get in touch with God – a God that is also our God. I think it is appropriate, and in accordance with true Jewish tradition to respect those who have different ways and customs for worshipping our one God.

John Paul II's legacy: 'One step forwards, two steps backwards'

By JACK CHIVO

Feminists, AIDS activists, reform Catholics, equal rights advocates, victims of sexual abuse and members of other faiths opposed to the Catholic Church's practice of proselytizing have expressed critical views of the papacy of Pope John Paul II since his death.

They bring some balance to the assessment of the impact of a papacy that has shaped the history of the world for more than a quarter century. John Paul was known for his strongly held beliefs on many theological, societal or social issues.

Any significant criticism emanating from Jewish circles, however, has been absent, either due to gratitude for a few of the late pontiff's gestures toward our people, or a deliberate desire to disregard a significant number of anti-Jewish, anti-Israel attitudes that emanated from the Holy See during John Paul's papacy.

Lenin wrote a book titled One Step Forwards, Two Steps Backwards, and this is, in my opinion, the tenor of John Paul II's 26-year reign. While everyone remembers his visits to a Rome synagogue and to Israel, there is much that raises critical questions about the relationship between the Catholic Church and the Jews over the past three decades.

During his first trip to Poland, as the pope, in 1979, John Paul made a point of visiting Auschwitz, where he barely acknowledged the Jewish victims, but highly honoured the memory of a priest murdered there, Father Maximilian Kolbe. Soon after, he started the process of sainthood for Father Kolbe. In doing so, the the late pope totally ignored the dark past of the Polish cleric, who was the publisher of the most anti-Semitic newspaper in prewar Poland. Among his activities, Father Kolbe was a firm promoter of the forged Protocols of the Elders of Zion, which he published and propagated, while calling Jews whom he considered Zionists "the cruel, crafty, little-known Jewish clique." To quote the Jewish historian Rabbi Robert Gordis, "If this is a saint, who needs sinners?"

Even today, the most anti-Semitic radio service in Europe – operated by the Catholic authorities in Poland – is Radio Maria. It has dozens of local stations across Poland and hundreds of thousands of supporters and listeners.

During a recent visit to Israel, the Polish prime minister was questioned by students at Yad Vashem about the anti-foreigner, anti-Semitic propaganda spewed by the station. He defended his government by saying it was a church-run broadcasting organization, but its content was being reviewed.

Despite the fact the station is based in the Vatican and started operating two decades ago, there seems to be no hurry in Warsaw or the Holy See to control its anti-Semitic outbursts.

In Poland, Father Henryk Jankovski of Gdansk, a former senior adviser to the Solidarity movement, once a frequent visitor to the Vatican, but also a rabid anti-Semite, delivered sermons in which he accused the Jews of "satanic greed" and stated that "there is no room for a Jew" in the Polish government. We can read in the Polish newspaper Zycie that for the Easter celebration of 2001, Father Jankovski "decorated" his church with huge banners reading: "The Jews killed Jesus and the prophets" and "Poles [must] save Poland."

For almost 20 years, he continued unimpeded with his anti-Semitic rhetoric. Only last October, as reported by the U.S. Catholic News, did the archbishop of Gdansk, Tadeusz Goclowski, ask Father Jankovski to "resign" – not primarily for his anti-Semitism, but for "questionable activities with young people," which is code used by the Vatican to describe the pedophilic scandals presently rocking the Catholic church.

Nonetheless, Father Jankovski is still in his position, with no action being taken for his removal. It appears that both the late pope, and the Vatican, who were adamant about quickly removing and defrocking priests who opposed the church's positions on abortion, birth control, ordination of women or social activism, continued to show a lot of tolerance when it came to anti-Semitic propaganda and sex scandals with children.

Polish Primate Cardinal Jozef Glemp, in his anti-Semitic speeches, blamed the few thousand Jews left in his country, for, among other sins, the "alcoholism" among his brethren. And for many years, Polish Carmelite nuns defied court orders and world condemnation and continued to erect huge crosses at Auschwitz in their effort to remove the Jewish memory from the death camp.

In the same vein as Cardinal Glemp, another Catholic leader, Cardinal Oscar Rodriguez of Honduras, has blamed the revelation of the sex scandals involving molestation of children by Catholic priests on the Jews. Neither cardinal was ever censured by the Holy See, and they both fully participated in the election of the new pope, along with Cardinal Barnard Law, the disgraced former head of the Boston Diocese. Cardinal Law resigned from the diocese in December 2002 in the wake of accusations that priests had sexually abused children and allegations that he did not take strong action to deal with the problem.

The late pontiff was very forceful in criticizing world leaders such as U.S. President George W. Bush, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Cuban leader Fidel Castro, and the Americans, the Russians and the Israelis, for alleged moral failures. If he would have applied the same high ethical standards to his own people, and to his own church, the stigma of anti-Semitism might have been erased from Polish soil and from among church leaders.

Looking back at John Paul's papacy, we can find even more troubling events, which cast a shadow over some significant developments in the Vatican's relations with Jews. In September 1982, John Paul broke with a long tradition of not acknowledging known terrorists by receiving former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, during a time when the then PLO leader was involved in many terror attacks all over the world. The late pope did not visit the synagogue in Rome until four years after receiving Arafat, in 1986, which speaks volumes about his priorities.

Over the years, Arafat was an honoured guest at the Vatican 10 more times. When he died last year, the official comment from the Holy See was that he was "a leader with great charisma," while John Paul spoke of an "hour of sadness." Compare that with the terse statement from the Holy See after the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and the total silence after the passing of prime minister Menachem Begin, who won the Nobel Prize for peace.

Another case in this list of troubling events is the gracious treatment former UN secretary general Kurt Waldheim received from the Vatican. For years, Waldheim covered up his heinous crimes as an SS officer in Croatia and other parts of former Yugoslavia. The Yugoslavian Commission on War crimes concluded, in 1947, that he "was responsible for the preparation and issuing of criminal orders" that led "to murders, massacres and hostages executions".

In 1987, after the world learned about Waldheim's many years of lies and deceit, he became persona non grata to western governments. Former U.S. president Ronald Reagan signed a decree declaring him an "undesirable alien," which meant he wasn't permitted to enter the United States. Unmoved by the world opprobrium, however, John Paul received Waldheim in June 1987, a few months after visiting the Rome synagogue. Adding insult to injury, several years later, the late pope awarded Waldheim, in 1994, a papal knighthood, making him a member of the Ordine Piano, and celebrating him as a "soldier of the faith."

In an interesting footnote to the Waldheim debacle, an article published by the Lehman Foundation of New York after the award was announced suggested that Waldheim might have been involved immediately after the war in the smuggling of Croatian war criminals to South America, through secret Vatican channels, and the recognition was either a late reward, or an attempt to guarantee his silence about the role of the Holy See in that murky enterprise.

In the Vatican statement of 1965, Nostra Aetate, the Catholic Church, for the first time, distanced itself from the millennia-old deicide accusation against the Jews. The statement speaks of the bond that ties the people of the "New Covenant" (Christians) to Abraham's stock (Jews). It states that even though some Jewish authorities and those who followed them called for Jesus' death, the blame for it cannot be laid at the door of all those Jews present at that time, nor can the Jews in our time be held as guilty: "The Jews should not be presented as rejected or accursed by God." The declaration also decries all displays of anti-Semitism made at any time by anyone.

Thirty-five years later, on the eve of the late pope's visit to Israel, the Vatican's leading historian, German-born Jesuit Karl-Peter Gumpel, declared in an interview with the CBC on March 17, 2000: "It is an undeniable [historical] fact that the Jews killed Christ."

Was Gumpel reprimanded, chastised or removed from his position? Rather he was promoted and is still in charge of the group of "experts" appointed by the late pope to speed the beatification of Pope Pius XII, another controversial Catholic pontiff. Pius XII chose to remain silent after 1,259 Jews in Rome were rounded up by the Nazis on Oct. 16, 1943.

Was John Paul II an anti-Semite? Most probably not. In my opinion, he simply viewed the Catholic Church's relationship with the Jews as a minor item, often an irritant, in his global strategy that is meant to enhance and strengthen the role of the Church in the world, especially through closer ties with its more than one billion Muslims. He might have also been influenced by the pro-Arab, often anti-Semitic, high-level staff and clergy at the Vatican.

When Jewish matters and sensibilities clashed with the Vatican's agenda, we became irrelevant.

Which we should always remember.

Jack Chivo is a former journalist who lives in Vancouver.

The power of no

We hate the word "no." It's negative. It represents denial and prohibition. In a world of instant gratification, the word no is taboo.

Unfortunately, no is underrated. Self-denial is the foundation of civilization. Thinkers from Plato to Freud have recognized the importance of impulse control in the formation of society. Community and camaraderie depend on our ability to say no to self-ishness.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

The power of no is also a critical part of personal development. Self-mastery is a prerequisite to human greatness. Rav Joseph D. Soloveitchik explained that in Judaism, the heroic is not found in mere victory. A true hero must also be capable of self-defeat. The Mishnah says: "Who is powerful? The one who controls his urges." With discipline comes power. A mighty warrior may win battle after battle, only to be addicted to victory. Genuine heroes are masters of their own victories, people who can sacrifice the very object of their ambitions.

Heroic discipline is becoming a lost art. Film critic Michael Medved tells of a visit to a TV show he made several years ago. He brought along his then 6-year-old daughter Sarah. The show's producer offered her a candy bar. Before accepting, Sarah brought it to her father to check if it was kosher. The candy bar didn't have a hechsher, so Sarah reluctantly returned it to the producer.

The producer was shocked, and she berated Medved for denying his daughter a little enjoyment, declaring that his insistence on kashrut would emotionally cripple his daughter when she got older. This producer, an influential pop culture personality, could not understand the idea of self-discipline. To her, any form of self-denial was unhealthy.

Pop culture celebrates self-indulgence, and self-discipline is seen as repressive and depressing. That's why we no longer have role models. Character doesn't matter anymore. Contemporary heroes possess fame and fortune, but little else. Michael Jackson and Monica Lewinsky are modern icons, while the army private in Iraq is a forgotten misfit.

It's time to reclaim the power of no. As self-ishness has become more respectable, family and community have suffered. Marriage and family are based on discipline, character and self-sacrifice. But in a "me culture," leasing a BMW is a higher budgetary priority than a third child. Self-indulgence is more important than an established spouse. Community depends on generosity, a value that is incomprehensible to the selfish, who ask "Why give away anything you might enjoy yourself?"

True heroes don't question generosity. They understand that self-defeat is sometimes the greatest victory, that giving is sometimes greater than taking. They understand there is more to life than candy bars and BMWs.

They understand the power of no.

Let's join our Israeli cousins in their mourning

On Tuesday evening, May 10, and all day on Wednesday, May 11, the entire Jewish world should come to a standstill. In honour of Yom Hazikaron, Israel's Memorial Day, every Jew should light memorial candles at home and contemplate the many lives extinguished by decades of Arab assaults against Israel. Jews throughout the world should mob our often under-attended memorial services. This year – and in all subsequent years – Jewish community calendars should frame those 24 hours in black, marking this as a time when no galas are held, no fundraising takes place, no Jewish sports teams play and theatres go dark. It's the least we can do to honour the many Israeli sacrifices for the Jewish people.

Gil Troy in Montreal

This year, Yom Hazikaron is particularly important, because, while it is not politic to shout it out loud, Israel won this ugly war. The Palestinians miscalculated. Israelis rallied when attacked, demonstrating unexpected unity, discipline and grit.

While Israel must win every war, any war imposes unfathomable losses. North Americans cannot appreciate the ubiquity of the pain, especially when we taste the vitality and joy of Israeli society. But anyone watching closely senses the omnipresent anguish, even when the mourning immediately dissolves into Israel's Independence Day celebrations.

To those saying, "I have no one to mourn, I don't know any Israelis who suffered," we should say, "Shame on you! How could you have lived through these last four years and not opened your heart, your soul, and yes, your pocketbook, to our suffering brothers and sisters? What stopped you from reaching out to those thirsting for solace?" But simultaneously, we must also say, "It's not too late. There remain many bereft families, maimed children, crushed individuals. Now is the time to start not just mourning, but healing."

So this Yom Hazikaron, let us mourn by numbers: more than 21,000 killed defending Israel since 1948; and more than 1,000 Israelis murdered since September 2000, with 10,000 injured.

Let us also mourn the heroes one by one. Let us mourn Benny Avraham, an Israeli soldier murdered by Hezbollah terrorists who tied to kidnap him, then covered up his death to extract political concessions, further scarring Benny's family. Let us mourn Benny's uncle, also named Benny Avraham, who was killed in the Yom Kippur War and is now buried just metres from his nephew. Let us remember Eli Cohen, Israel's man in Damascus, whose information helped Israel win the 1967 War – and whose body the Syrians continue to hold. Let us embrace the families of 1948's Palmach warriors, young men and women frozen in time as their comrades – and the state they founded – grew. Let us make sure that someone says Kaddish for the final generation of the Weiss family, childless Holocaust survivors killed during the 2002 Netanya seder massacre.

Let us envelop all the grieving families with love and even a timely donation. Money is our feeble, yet frequently useful, way of telegraphing our support. But this Yom Hazikaron – and subsequently – we should also join in the mourning rituals that Israelis have developed – the moment of silence, the public meeting, the mass Kaddish, the evening of quiet singing, the personal visit to those whose grief and memories never end.

Heroism is an odd thing – most true heroes are reluctant ones. John F. Kennedy, when asked how he became a war hero, said: "It was involuntary. They sank my boat." Israelis share this matter-of-fact ambivalence. For a small country forced to keep an active army ever vigilant, Israelis have miraculously resisted an addiction to militarism. The hopes of Shir LaShalom, the song of peace – not vengeance – will resonate through the streets of Jerusalem on Yom Hazikaron. We should echo them here, too.

Israelis say "Anachnu mishtatfim betzareichem," we participate in your sorrow. Traditional Judaism has taught the world how to ritualize memory, from profound mourning rituals, to smashing the glass at weddings, to reliving the Exodus each year on Pesach. This Yom Hazikaron – and in future – let us mourn those who have suffered and hope for peace.

Anyone who has ever endured a shivah knows the power of being comforted by a community. After everything our brothers and sisters have endured, how dare we fail them, individually or communally.

World of our mothers

How did they do it?

Hauling yet another carton of bubble-wrapped dishes up from the basement, to place it alongside the bags and bags of groceries my husband had brought home the week before, I found myself thinking: how did my grandmothers, my great-grandmothers, and their mothers before them manage to make Pesach?

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

My Bubbie raised four children in a cramped apartment in Williamsburg, Brooklyn. My great-aunt – bubbie's widowed sister – also lived with the family, sharing a bed with my mother where they both slept, one's feet resting by the other's head. What rare and secret storage space did Bubbie use to store the sets of dishes that came out to grace the table for one week a year?

Each year, overwhelmed by the process of turning over the kitchen, getting a jump on seder preparation and continuing to feed my family, while preparing classes and grading student papers, I envy the select few who have a special Pesach kitchen. If only, if only. It would be capacious, this wondrous kitchen of my imaginings, with ample space not only for dishes and pots, but for the cooking tools that ease the preparations: a food processor, a stand-up mixer, a juicer. What culinary marvels I would turn out with such a kitchen.

Bubbie made gefilte fish from scratch. At the local fish market, she sealed the destiny of several of its scaled denizens who were living out their last moments in great glass tanks. I was about three years old when she took me with her to select the fish. It so traumatized me that I would not eat gefilte fish until I was well into my 20s.

Bubbie chopped the fish in a large wooden bowl with the half-moon blade of a heavy knife. My mother learned to make fish from her, continuing this Pesach tradition for many years. It is intensely difficult work. One year, my sister persuaded her to put the fish through a grinder instead. Another year, my sister proudly presented my mother with the first food processor to hit the market. These time-saving aids greatly accelerated the process of making gefilte fish. We always laughed when my mother insisted that the fish tasted differently, that it was not as good as it was when chopped by hand in the wooden bowl. Her resistance to modernity amused us.

Today, fine-schmeckers like me who pour over cookbooks or watch the parade of cooking television programs nod sagely when the great chefs tell us the importance of chopping – rather than tearing – the delicate flesh of fish. Food mavens affirm – as my bubbie knew – that different procedures can alter the texture and taste of food. Cooking is alchemy, not chemistry. With the right ingredients and the correct process, everything turned to gold in their roughened hands.

This is not simple nostalgia. Like many of my friends, I feel stretched to the limit by Pesach. We marvel at the generations of women who preceded us. In smaller spaces, without our labour-saving appliances and sources of prepared foods, often with more children and more meagre financial resources, they pulled it off year after year. Like most of us, many of them worked outside the home, as well. And their husbands rarely shared in the work, as ours do. But they made Pesach – with greater panache, I dare say, than most of us do today.

We joke that Pesach is proof of God's gender – that only a man would inflict such work on women. (No, in my right mind I don't actually believe in a gendered Divine Being.) Or that the sages who devised and evolved the laws of this holiday might have worked in closer consultation with their wives. (Yes, I know about Bruriah and Rabbi Meir.) Or that the Festival of Freedom enslaves half its celebrants.

You may sometimes hear people say that feminists diminish the traditional role of Jewish women. Nothing could be further from the truth. Particularly at this time of year, we remember with awe the generations of women who preceded us, and honour their memory. My Zaide always led the seder, but Bubbie made it happen. This is the alchemy of the Pesach kitchen: women turned food into gold, and gold into love to nourish the spirit.

The Kirshner File

The Vatican and the Holocaust in Italy

The election of a new pope, Benedict XVI, a German who lived through the Third Reich, brings to mind the still-simmering controversy revolving around one of his predecessors, Pope Pius XII.

Shortly after Rome's liberation on June 4, 1944, Jews from all corners of the world began circulating stories about the help that Pope Pius XII had purportedly extended to Jews during the Holocaust.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A Jewish chaplain with the French Expeditionary Force in Italy spoke of his "incomparable charity."

An official with the World Jewish Congress thanked him on behalf of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities.

And with his death in 1958, Israeli foreign minister Golda Meir paid tribute to him for having "raised his voice in favour of the Jews."

At around the same time, the chief rabbi of Rome declared: "More than all others, we had the opportunity of experiencing the great compassionate goodness and magnanimity of the pope during the unhappy years of the persecution and terror, when it seemed that for us there was no longer an escape."

How can so many people have been so wrong?

The fact of the matter is that Pope Pius XII, who reigned from 1939 onward, was not quite the philo-Semitic saviour he was made out to be. Neither was his predecessor, Pope Pius XI, who presided over the Vatican when Benito Mussolini's fascist government passed the first of Italy's anti-Jewish laws.

Pope Pius XII

Susan Zuccotti, in Under His Very Window: The Vatican and the Holocaust in Italy (Yale University Press), claims that Pope Pius XI's intervention in the 1938 anti-Semitic edicts was limited almost exclusively to Jewish converts to Christianity. "Vatican spokesmen," she writes, "objected only to laws affecting the church's authority to determine who could marry and who could convert and thus be considered 'Aryan.'"

As for his successor, Pope Pius XII, Zuccotti observes that his intercession on behalf of Jews in the Italian-occupied territories of Croatia and southeastern France, with two or three exceptions, was "perfunctory, polite and dilatory."

And after 1,259 Jews in Rome were rounded up by the Germans on Oct. 16, 1943, Pope Pius XII chose to remain silent.

A full week after the roundups, L'Osservatore Romano – the official organ of the Vatican – published a fulsome article about the pope's charity, which "does not pause before boundaries of nationality, religion or descent."

Less than two months after this event, the same newspaper condemned an infamous Italian police order consigning Italian Jews to camps within the country. But, as Zuccotti – an American historian – points out, the objection was never repeated publicly.

The pope, she explains in this revealing book, believed that public denunciations of the terror unleashed by Germany and Italian fascists would only make matters worse and touch off reprisals against Catholics throughout Europe.

Pius XII, however, alluded to the Holocaust. In a 1942 Christmas message, he spoke of the need for "a just society," referring to civilians who had been harmed by reason of their "nationality or descent." Then, in a 1943 address to the Sacred College of Cardinals, he spoke of his compassion for those who had been subjected to "exterminatory measures."

In none of these speeches, Zuccotti observes, did he ever use the words "Jew" or "anti-Semitism."

Zuccotti, however, gives the Vatican credit for having saved thousands of Jews from certain death after Germany's occupation of Italy in 1943.

The Vatican's attitude toward Jews can best be understood by examining its pre-Holocaust record.

On April 28, 1928, Pope Pius XI issued a decree attacking anti-Semitism, by far the strongest, most public statement on the subject from the Vatican in the interwar period.

Yet Adolf Hitler's rise to power, just five years later, evoked no papal admonition. Nor did the Vatican express disapproval of the 1935 Nuremberg laws, which disenfranchised German Jews and forbade mixed marriages.

According to Zuccotti, the pope's thinking about Jews was reflected in the reactionary pages of La Civilta Cattolica, a bimonthly publication edited and published by conservative Jesuit priests with papal funding.

Founded in 1850, La Civilta Cattolica regarded Jews as "the most relentless enemies and persecutors" of the church. In the same article, published in 1928, a writer lambasted Jews for their decisive role in the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution and their control of international banking, finance and politics.

Jews thus bore a responsibility for all the ills of modern society: communism, atheism, liberalism, socialism and capitalist exploitation. But to give them their due, the editors of La Civilta Cattolica never indulged in racial anti-Semitism. They ascribed Jewish faults to their religion and culture, not their race or blood.

In line with this philosophy, Pope Pius XI excoriated racism based on biological criteria. But in principle, Zuccotti writes, there is no evidence that he objected to Mussolini's anti-Semitic edicts.

Instead, he broadly asked Mussolini for slight alterations in the laws, so that all offspring of mixed marriages, if baptized at birth and raised as Christians, could be recognized as "Aryans."

In addition, he requested that couples engaged to be wed before the prohibition of mixed marriages be allowed to marry, that mixed families should have the right to employ Christian servants and that Jewish teachers who had converted be permitted to teach in private schools.

Zuccotti says the Vatican was apprised of the Holocaust. Through reports from priests and German and Italian businessmen, bureaucrats, journalists and soldiers, Pope Pius XII was supremely well informed of massacres in Nazi-occupied Europe.

Nevertheless, wartime Jewish issues were not given high priority by the Vatican's Secretariat of State.

During the Badoglio era, the 45 days between Mussolini's fall and Germany's occupation of Italy, the pope rarely attempted to influence Italian policy toward Jews.

For example, the Vatican rejected overtures by Italian Jews and their supporters to press for a total revocation of the anti-Semitic laws. "The refusal should come as no surprise," Zuccotti scathingly observes, "for… the enforced legal separation of Christian and Jews was a policy not displeasing to the pope."

But during this period, the Vatican was intensely concerned about the situation of Jewish converts to Catholicism.

In the wake of Germany's occupation, the Vatican encouraged Catholic institutions – convents, monasteries, churches, schools and hospitals – to shelter Jews.

By one estimate, 4,447 Jews, some of whom were converts, were thus saved.

And in passing, Zuccotti pays tribute to individual priests and nuns who went out of their way to rescue Jews, sometimes with little guidance from the pope.

But all in all, she argues, the Vatican did not distinguish itself during the Holocaust.

Perhaps that accounts for its reluctance to allow a panel of international Catholic and Jewish historians unfettered access to its wartime archives.

Obviously, the Vatican wishes to preserve some of its unsavoury secrets. It will be interesting to see whether Pope Benedict XVI, a conservative, hews to this policy.

Jewish motorcyclists to join Yom Hashoah program

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

A group of Jewish motorcyclists from Toronto will join other Jewish bikers from North America in a ride to the National Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. as part of a unique memorial to commemorate Yom Hashoah.

Called the Ride to Remember, the event is a first for the Jewish Motorcyclists Alliance (JMA), a loose association of four Jewish bike clubs in the United States and the Yidden on Wheels (YOWies) from Toronto.

Proceeds from the ride, which is intended to honour the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps, will be donated to the Holocaust Memorial Museum and the Friends of the Israeli Defence Forces.

"We are riding to rally at the Holocaust Memorial in Washington in recognition and memoriam of perhaps the single most tragic event in humankind," said Jeff Mustard, president of the JMA and founder of the Florida-based King David Bikers.

"This event will capture the attention of the media, and hopefully the world, and serve as a reminder of the Holocaust so that people never forget."

The idea for the event was conceived last October in Delaware, during a meeting of Jewish bike clubs from the United States, and the Toronto YOWies. The JMA was also formed at this meeting.

With over 500 JMA members, Mustard said he thought the group's size meant they could do something that would have a large impact.

"I thought that with our numbers we could make a statement. We have a voice, and we have media power because we are not just motorcyclists, we are a pop culture anomaly. That makes us interesting and newsworthy," said Mustard.

Jewish motorcyclists from Toronto will take part in a Yom Hashoah memorial in Washington, D.C.

Certainly, a Harley Davidson-riding rabbi who will be joining the ride is one of its more interesting aspects. Rabbi Zachery Betesh, spiritual leader of the King David Bikers and an associate rabbi with Chabad Lubavitch Synagogue of Fort Lauderdale, will bring with him a Torah that was written in 1929 and used secretly during the Holocaust.

The Torah was preserved and delivered to Jerusalem and will make the journey with Rabbi Betesh to the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

The Toronto contingent, which is comprised of about 20 YOWies, will set out on May 4 with a departure ceremony at the Holocaust Memorial at Earl Bales Park.

At the ceremony, Prof. Adam Fuerstenberg, director of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, will present the YOWies with a letter from the centre endorsing the event.

A few members from the Jewish War Veterans of Canada will also attend the ceremony and will present the YOWies with a letter of greeting that the group will then present to the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

From Toronto, the YOWies will head to Harrisburg, Pa., and will then meet up with the Tribe Motorcycle Club on May 5 in York, Pa.

Later that day, the two groups will connect with the Chai Riders and Hillel's Angels at the Delaware Memorial Bridge. The groups will then meet up with the King David Bikers in Falls Church, Va., before proceeding to the National Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

In all, between 150 and 200 Jewish motorcyclists will be making their way to the memorial in Washington on May 6, which is recognized worldwide as Holocaust Remembrance Day.

Lionel Spector, president of the Yidden on Wheels, said he feels it is important for his club to take part in the Ride to Remember.

"If we just go about our daily lives and don't pay attention to the commemoration, we would do a terrible disservice to Judaism, so it's incumbent upon us to take part," he said.

The Ride to Remember will also serve as a reminder that events like the Holocaust are possible and can happen again.

"I hope this event will achieve a greater awareness of mankind's tendency to do horrendous things," said Spector. "These things repeat themselves through history."

Temple Sinai celebrates its 50th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Temple Sinai, Toronto's second-largest Reform congregation, will hold the last major event of its year-long 50th anniversary celebrations next month – the dedication of a new Torah.

Other events this year have included concerts, an 80th-birthday tribute to Founding Rabbi Jordan Pearlson that took place last June, and a joint adult education program with Asbury United Church, where the temple's first services were held before ground was broken for its current building on Wilson Avenue. An upcoming Shavuot service will include the performance of a new piece written for the anniversary by composer-in-residence Ben Steinberg. A commemorative book is expected to be released next fall, based on the anniversary theme of "Values, Voices and Vision."

"Everybody's picked it up and run with it. It's quite amazing," said Isla Adelson-Chertkoff, co-chair of the 50th anniversary with Harvey Zimmerman.

Adelson-Chertkoff was married at the temple 31 years ago, her children "went through the whole life cycle" there and her son Noah is now a rabbinical student at the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati. "It's been very good to me," she says of the congregation.

"When I joined, there must have been 800 families," she recalls. "Now there are 1,800, [but] it still feels like a family."

Rabbi Michael Dolgin has been senior rabbi since 1997, and Rabbis Lori Cohen and Erin Polonsky round out the temple's rabbinic team, joined by Cantor Gershon Silins and Cantor Emeritus Severin Weingort.

Music has always been an important aspect of the temple, noted Adelson-Chertkoff.

The Torah project "encompasses all the things the temple stands for," said Adelson-Chertkoff. "It's a year-long project. Everybody is being given an opportunity to participate. There has been lots of learning around it."

For Rabbi Dolgin – now in his 13th year at Temple Sinai – the specialness of life-cycle celebrations at the temple was epitomized at a recent wedding ceremony, where – as is the custom instituted by Rabbi Pearlson – the bride, who grew up at Temple Sinai, added her name to the congregation's wedding book, a permanent record of life-cycle events.

"Next to the wedding book, I put the bar/bat mitzvah book where she had put her name at age 13," Rabbi Dolgin said. "Next to that was the book that showed when she was named, and next to that book was the book with the record of her parents getting married, and next to that was her father's bar mitzvah.

"It illustrates in a very personal way how the synagogue is [the congregants'] second home and gives them a clear sense of their place in the world at a very meaningful Jewish moment in their life."

"Our goal over the next 50 years is to deepen the identity we've already created," he said. "We see ourselves as a place of community and learning, of prayer and support for Israel, and in the best of the Reform Jewish tradition, a place where new learning and insights from the world around us are brought together with the ancient traditions of our people."

For Rabbi Polonsky, whose family joined Temple Sinai when she was four years old, the temple truly is a second home. At the tribute to Rabbi Pearlson last year, she spoke of the "uniqueness" of Temple Sinai Jews.

"I believe it is a combination of many things," she said. "We embrace tradition and each other; we take our tasks as Reform Jews seriously and study and learn before we make choices; we learn in order to do, not just for academic exercise; and we have the 'not yet' attitude."

She credited the latter attribute to Rabbi Pearlson, who taught her that "when asked if I do a particular mitzvah, the answer ought to be, 'not yet.' He taught me always to leave the door open to the observance of more mitzvot and to a more meaningful observance of the ones I already embrace."

Kibbutz communities offer best of both worlds

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Bo Habayta project, an initiative of the Kibbutz Movement, Israel's Absorption Ministry and the Jewish Agency for Israel, is offering returning Israeli citizens and new olim the best of two worlds.

They are being invited to live in kibbutz community neighbourhoods that offer the benefits and advantages of kibbutz life while they retain their autonomous standard of living.

Prigat Nadia, director of the Ministry of Absorption's division of returning citizens; Etty Tishkoff, her assistant; and Ruthie Rozaly from Bo Habayta were on a recent North American tour to present the project.

Members of the new communities own their own property and keep their salary but become part of the joint municipal association responsible for the daily running of the kibbutz. That includes such areas as sanitation and lighting, as well as educational, cultural and recreational programs.

In general, Nadia said, kibbutz members are aging, and "these new communities are a way to attract new people."

Many Israelis left kibbutzim because they wanted independence, she said. "Their ideology has changed. They want to own their own home and car, and not live exactly according to community rules.

Members own property and get to keep their salary

"These communities offer them what they need. The kibbutzim are opening their hearts to new residents."

The general criteria for the program, states a press release, are families who have school-age children and proven economic ability to earn a living autonomously. Individual kibbutzim decide on additional criteria.

Rozaly said that about 30 kibbutzim already have community neighbourhoods, and about 160 are going through the process.

Moving to a kibbutz community makes the transition back to Israel much easier, she said. "We do anything we can to help.

"They know that they're moving to a community where they'll be welcome, and where everyone else is in the same position. They feel calmer about coming home."

Nadia said that since 2003, there has been a 20 per cent increase in the number of Israelis returning.

"Since we launched our website, we've had [thousands and thousands of hits] and hundreds of people have attended our meetings. People are showing a real interest in participating in our project.

Although people do not have to move to a kibbutz community through Bo Habayta, said Rozaly, "it does have its advantages. The project is designed to serve all a person's needs, from the first stage of gathering information until they are in Israel. We have staff in Israel and abroad that is always available to help."

Many Israelis who grew up on kibbutzim have wonderful memories, she said. "They want their children to have the same experience," she said.

One of the ministry's major tasks, Nadia said, is to keep in touch with Israelis who live abroad. "One way they've done this is by establishing 'Israel Houses' that work in co-operation with the Israeli consulates.

"By running programs for Israelis, the Israel House – the director here is David Gidron – strengthens their identity and sense of belonging to Israel.

"We realize that it is a mobile world, and that people travel a lot, but we want Israelis to know that they're always welcome back. We want them to feel welcome to come home."

Losing sight of the right direction

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

The Torah tells us that when the Israelites left Egypt, they were guided by a visible symbol of God's presence: a pillar of cloud by day and a column of fire by night.

Two questions come to mind. First, why was there any need for these guides when the Israelites already had a human one? Yitro, Moses' father-in-law, acted as the Israelites' "eyes" in the wilderness. Second, why was there any need for a column of fire by night when the Israelites did not travel by night?

The first question might be cleverly deflected. Yitro did not join the Israelites immediately at the time of the Exodus. He arrived later. Accordingly, the pillar of fire was required in the interim. But this clever answer leads to a further problem. If the pillar of cloud was merely a temporary guide until the arrival of Yitro, it should have dissipated after his arrival. Yet the pillar of cloud remained with the Israelites for the duration of their travels. It appears, then, that neither the pillar of cloud nor the column of smoke was completely necessary. That is, of course, if they were intended to be geographical guides.

An alternative way of looking at these two phenomena is to consider them as theological guides. God was indeed trying to prevent our ancestors from losing their way. But what concerned God was not their geographical direction, but their moral direction.

The pillar of cloud and the column of fire were visible reminders that the same God that liberated them from bondage had a claim on their behaviour, and the Israelites had to remain perpetually true to that claim.

The greatest danger facing the Israelites would be the loss of their moral compass – that is, forgetting that claim and forgetting their mission. The danger was real, as the subsequent narrative attests. But the pillar and column remained a constant reminder to aim higher and to do better.

Anyone who follows the news will find example after example of people getting lost in a moral maze. Without an absolutely clear direction ahead, they waffle on issues or abandon what is right in favour of what is popular or self-serving. As Jews, we must always keep in sight the principles of the Torah that ought to inform our lives. Freedom is valuable only when we follow the proper direction.

To be politically free but morally lost is an insult to freedom itself.

Counting the Omer on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's somewhat ironic that on the second night of Pesach, with the holiday barely underway, Jews are already beginning to prepare themselves for yet another festival. Sefirat HaOmer, the counting of the Omer, began on the second night of Passover and culminates seven weeks later with Shavuot. This period is a fascinating one, long associated with spiritual, even kabbalistic growth.

Just what is an "omer?" According to the Torah, an offering consisting of an omer (a specific measure) of barley was brought to the Temple on the second day of Passover. You'll find the story at Torah.org. [www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/omer/] Until that offering was made, no grain from the new year's crop was to be eaten. From that day onward, it was necessary to count 49 days until Shavuot, the feast of the wheat harvest (Leviticus 23:15). [http://tinyurl.com/3fgal]

After the destruction of the Temple, the practice of bringing barley was discontinued, but Jews continued to count the Omer period. Ohr Somayach's website calls this period a spiritual journey of 49 steps. The kabbalists' interpretation of the Omer was based on the various permutations (seven times seven) of the sefirot, or mystical emanations. These sefirot denote the ascent from the 49 "gates" of impurity of the Egyptian bondage to the purity of the revelation at Sinai. Each day and week is given its own mystical attribute, such as chesed (loving-kindness), gvurah (restraint) and tiferet (beauty). [www.ohr.org.il/special/omer/index.htm]

For example, the phrase for the fourth day of counting is Hod Shel Chesed, meaning endurance in loving-kindness, which Aish.com explains "Is my love enduring? Does it withstand challenges and setbacks? Do I give and withhold love according to my moods, or is it constant regardless of the ups and downs of life? Exercise for the day: Reassure a loved one of the constancy of your love." [http://tinyurl.com/3q4pl] You can read more essays at Havienu.org on the various permutations and how each of the 49 days has its own unique quality. [http://tinyurl. com/4uwgt]

The Omer season has also been associated with many national tragedies, so it has become the custom to refrain from holding public celebrations during this period. Eliezer Segal looks at the various tragic events that have occurred during Sefirat HaOmer, as well as at related prohibitions such as wearing new clothes, getting married and playing music. [http://tinyurl.com/6xkbq]

How do you keep your days straight throughout the 49 days of counting? By downloading a program to keep track of time for you. You can print off the daily chart at the TorahTots site. [http://tinyurl.com/9jb7z] And in a case of old meets new, take a look at "The Homer Calendar." Keeping track of the daily count can be confusing but if "H'Omer Simpson" can do it, so can you. There are articles about the reasons for counting the Omer, appropriate charts and illustrations of Homer and Bart. [www. jvibe.com/homer] And if you're still worried about missing a day, you can register to have an e-mail reminder sent to you daily by the Orthodox Union. [www.ou.org/chagim/sefira/]

Of course, you may not be near your computer when night falls. But you can always count on your Palm. [www.pen ticon.com/omer.html] The free Omer program automatically displays the correct information for each day and can track the days that you have already counted. You can even set an alarm to automatically remind you daily. That way you'll never forget about the Omer, even when you're out for the count.

Although counting the days can often feel mechanical, for Rabbi Malka Drucker it takes on a special spiritual – and practical – significance. "When I count the Omer, my intention is to empty myself of the day's irritations, its problems, even its joys. I do this by becoming conscious of how the day has been spent, and this process helps me to think of the evening as a prelude for the morning... I grow more aware as I count that seven weeks is a long time. Much can be accomplished in that time. I will begin to get up early, give up an addicting behaviour, start a new project, or simply remember to number my days more often." [www.malkadrucker.com/days.html]

Jewish Life

Help needed: in Darfur and by Ethiopian Jewry

By JUDIE ORON

Guest Voice

At the beginning of the year – the Jewish New Year, that is – there was a lot of press coverage about Africa, including the 20th anniversary of the Ethiopian famine, the 10th anniversary of the massacre in Rwanda and the premier at the Sundance Film Festival of Hotel Rwanda, with its accompanying coverage of Canada's new senator, Lt.-Gen. Roméo Dallaire. One of the highlights for me was Prime Minister Paul Martin's visit to Africa and his assurances that Canada would not stand idly by while massacres took place in Darfur.

In the interim, the United Nations debated on whether the crisis in Darfur was bad enough to be called genocide and decided it wasn't. But Canadian politicians stood firm, and a steady stream of UN and other foreign dignitaries visited the refugee camps set up in neighbouring Chad. It was starting to look as though we were gearing up for an outpouring of aid to that benighted area. I had real hopes that the world would not dally while the people in Darfur suffered the destruction of their villages, rape, violent assaults and death.

Just before Christmas, the Asian tsunami hit. The extent of that disaster and my compassion didn't stop me from thinking, "Once again, the rest of the world's tragedies will inevitably take precedence over those in Africa." Unfair, you'd probably cry, and perhaps justifiably so. But the world responded to the Asian tsunami with an outpouring of generosity never seen before, while, at the same time, the crisis in Darfur sank to the bottom of the media agenda and seems to have almost vanished from the agendas of our politicians. Months have passed since that African hoopla, and we are now celebrating Pesach, with its call to all who are needy to partake of the bread of affliction.

I guess this is the time to admit to a personal bias. I am the adoptive parent of two Ethiopian Jewish girls who, in the trek from their native land to Israel, found themselves first spending two years in refugee camps in Sudan with their parents. They were then cast adrift, the two of them alone, in the deserts of eastern Sudan.

Joyfully, I can report that today they are both adults, safe and sound and living productive lives. But it has been a long road for both of them to physical and psychological health, and I have been a witness to their suffering as well as to their enormous bravery.

It is not my wish here to bring forth their story. That is not for me to tell. But remembering the oh so promising words of our prime minister, I can't help thinking of what my kids endured in Sudan and now find that only with great difficulty can I watch the reports coming out of Darfur. It's all too familiar, all too raw.

If ever there was a masochistic streak in me, I guess it was working overtime recently, the day I decided to see Hotel Rwanda. It's a beautifully made film. For those of you with strong stomachs, I highly recommend it. But for me, having spent time in Ethiopia just before the Marxist regime fell and having seen the bodies in the streets with my own eyes – many of them so small they were hardly distinguishable from a crumpled-up piece of newspaper – it was a terrible reminder of the troubled continent that gnaws at me.

> 'Can we not draw upon our Jewish compassion?'

It is already too late for many of the people of Darfur. Weary though we may be with issues of our own, can we not draw upon our Jewish compassion? In 1984, a great movement for aid started with a BBC report of the famine in Ethiopia. Canadians played a decisive role in galvanizing the world to alleviate the misery of the famine. I ask you to find the will to do so again, this time for the people of Darfur.

You'll probably think it a terrible chutzpah – I have lived too many years in Israel – but if we're already on the subject, I have another favour to ask. Canadian Jews worked long and hard to provide assistance in the aliyah of Ethiopian Jewry. I am happy for the opportunity to say thanks to all of you on behalf of my daughters for that much- needed aid. So now we have in Israel a community of more than 90,000 Beta Israel.

Ever since I came back to Canada seven months ago, I have been wondering, have you asked your favourite Jewish organization recently what they are doing to help this struggling community? I cannot compare the conditions in the refugee camps of Sudan or in Marxist Ethiopia to their situation in modern Israel. But I can compare their status to that of the rest of Israeli society, and in doing so, I say, "Gevalt!"

You have all probably heard or read last year's statistics coming out of Israel: one in five children there lives below the poverty line. Hard to believe, eh? Well, I can surely vouch for that. I guess I didn't realize way back then, that by adopting my two kids I would acquire, as family, their close relatives – all of them, numbering more than 300 people (the Beta Israel count seven generations as being immediate relatives). Taking into account the many friends I have in the community as well, I have thus had the privilege of spending a lot of time in development towns and city slums – for that is where you will find most of the community.

Don't misunderstand me, please, I am not saying that little or nothing has been done to help the community make the cultural, religious and technological journey from rural Ethiopia to modern Israeli life. Nor am I implying that the Ethiopian aliyah has failed. That would be foolish. Much has been done and many are succeeding beyond our wildest dreams, my own two kids among them.

But after unrelenting years of intifadah, the lower strata are sinking, daily, further into economic desperation. If one out of five children in Israel is desperately poor, just imagine how many of them are of Ethiopian Jewish descent.

So forgive me if I ask for two major favours instead of one. They are very clearly connected in my mind and they are both issues that have been of great concern to the Jewish community in Canada in the past. So my hopes are high on both counts.

I ask for your help in mobilizing intervention for Darfur. Write to your political representatives, write to our prime minister – speak out on this pressing issue.

And, with energy and will, please ask our community leaders the following question: what is this organization, this synagogue, this conference, symposium or fundraiser event doing to help the Beta Israel live reasonable lives in Israel in our lifetime?

And – "sheyiheye behatzlachah" may we be successful!

Reena breaks ground for second elderhome

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Reena held a groundbreaking ceremony on Weldrick Road in Richmond Hill last Sunday, for its second elderhome for seniors with developmental disabilities.

The David and Luba Smuschkowitz Reena ElderHome, named after the couple for their generosity and leadership in raising the funds to build the home, will accommodate 10 people and will be fully equipped to meet their increasing needs as they age.

Reena's first elderhome, the Al and Faye Mintz Reena ElderHome in Thornhill, which opened in 2000, has 15 residents.

Campaign co-chairs for the new home, who were responsible for raising $2.3 of the $2.5-million goal, were Alex Eisen, and Saul and Toby Feldberg.

At the ceremony, attended by federal, provincial and municipal politicians as well as Reena families and board members, Reena chair Carolynn Morrison said the agency is building much more than a house.

"Reena has reached into the community and is building a home [in which] clients can live in independence."

She paid tribute to Rabbi Joseph Kelman, Reena's founder, "for having the vision to care for a community of people that needed caring."

Monte Kwinter, MPP for York Centre and minister of community safety and correctional services, said that in his 20 years as a politican, his life has been intertwined with Reena.

"David Smuschkowitz, who was a partisan in Poland, came to Canada and became a model of what immigrants can do. There could not be a greater remembrance than to name this home after him."

Thornhill MP Susan Kadis recalled the early days of Reena and said she "saw the seeds being developed. These types of facilities are integral to our quality of life."

In a written statement read by the Smuschkowitzes' son-in-law, Harry Kichler, David said that "Alex Eisen would not give up, and got me involved in raising money for the home. Although it is dedicated in our names, it honours all of us."

Organization helps disabled kids on kibbutzim

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Avi Pascal, director of overseas relations for Ahada, an Israeli network for parents of children with disabilities on kibbutzim, credits his son with changing his life.

Here recently to promote the organization, Pascal, 50, said that in raising Ilan, 22, who is developmentally delayed, he and his wife have been forced to "explore energy and strength we didn't know we had in us. We owe him a lot. We're more tolerant and socially sensitive. We see life differently."

They became involved with Ahada when Ilan was 10, Pascal said, "because it took a few years to get to the point where we were ready to join an organization.

"My wife said something was wrong [early on], but I was in denial. It was like a great punch in the face to me.

"[When I finally acknowledged it], I began reading all the books I could, and realized that my biggest concern was building a life for him," said Pascal, who has three other children, one of which has learning disabilities.

The goal of Ahada, which is run by volunteers, is to support parents in the day-to-day problems of bringing up a disabled child, and to offer children the possibility of a secure future.

It works closely with Israeli organizations that assist the physically and mentally challenged. It has representatives on the Knesset's law and rights committee, so Ahada's 650 members are regularly updated on relevant legal issues and on their legal rights, Pascal said.

Among Ahada's activities are publishing a monthly newsletter, sponsoring lectures and seminars, tutoring, and administering a bar/bat mitzvah program.

"People also look to us to help them get the government benefits to which they are entitled," Pascal said. "Sometimes people just don't know where to begin."

He said that recently the group has started to recommend an insurance policy, put together by Migdal Insurance and Financial Holdings Inc., that includes a pension for people with disabilities when they turn 45.

"This pension is revolutionary. It means that people with special needs will have a more secure future. We recommend it, because we are committed to the population we represent.

"As parents of children with disabilities, our biggest concern is what is going to happen when we're not around. The policy – it took seven years to develop – came about because of conversations with had with parents. We get a lot of information from sharing with each other."

When Ahada representatives speak to parents, Pascal said, "we don't only say nice things. We try to ask the hard questions. Because of my experience, I come to them as another parent. We come from the same place. I tell parents that they are the case managers of their child."

On his North American tour, which also includes visits to Boston, Detroit and Philadelphia, Pascal is trying to get people to develop a long-term relationship with Ahada.

"We need money, and we can provide people with a small organization to which they can target their [charity] dollars.

"We are a small organization, and people will know exactly where their money is going. I envision [such endeavours] as a bar mitzvah project – which could involve people on both sides of the ocean – in which both interests could meet."

For information, e-mail Pascal at ahada@bezeqint.net, or visit Ahada's website at www.ahada.org.il.

INSPIRING LEADER: Eva Dessen and her grandson, Meyeer Pearl, are surrounded by Grade 5 students from Associated Hebrew Schools, Kamin campus, who recently honoured her late husband, Harold Dessen, with a special assembly on Israel. The students worked with artist Batia Kenet creating artwork depicting different geographic regions of Israel. As well, the classes competed against each other in an Israel quiz and a special assembly, including an audiovisual presentation and choir performance. Harold Dessen was a volunteer who supported Associated for many years. He was a past president of the school and chaired various committees. The Israel program was made possible by a generous gift from the Harold Dessen Memorial Fund.

Emunah Women to honour Kahns at May 17 dinner

Jack and Susan Kahn will be honoured at Emunah Women of Toronto's annual Mother-in-Israel (Family in Israel) dinner at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue on May 17.

The Kahns, who have been actively involved in the Jewish community for more than 30 years, were instrumental in the establishment of B'nai Torah Congregation.

Susan has been active in the congregation's sisterhood, served as co-chair of the parents association of Eitz Chaim Schools, and has represented Emunah as a deputy delegate at a number of World Zionist Conference meetings in Israel.

Jack, who served as president of B'nai Torah for two two-year terms, was also national president of Mizrachi Organization of Canada, and is vice-president of Canadian Zionist Federation.

He is an elected member of World Zionist General Council and Jewish Agency Assembly, where he serves as chair of the world Mizrachi delegation. He was recently appointed a committee member of the board of governors of the Jewish Agency.

Emunah's keynote speaker for the evening is Bernie Farber, chief executive officer, Canadian Jewish Congress. The evening will also feature a Holocaust remembrance tribute.

All proceeds from the dinner will be designated to a therapeutic clinic at Neve Michael Crisis Centre for Children at Risk in Pardes Chana, Israel.

Men and women are welcome to the evening. For further information and reservations, contact the Emunah office at 416-636-0036.

Remembering details that are often overlooked

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

With so much media coverage focused last week on George Bush's criticism of Israeli settlement expansion in the West Bank, there has been almost no attention given to the Palestinians' obligation to disarm and dismantle terrorist organizations, a primary obligation of the 2003 "road map" peace plan that both Israel and the Palestinian Authority accepted.

Exceptions were New York Times Jerusalem correspondents Greg Myre and Steve Erlanger. On April 18, Myre wrote that "Israel argues that the Palestinian leadership has failed to crack down on armed factions as is required under the [road map] peace plan and therefore the road map has yet to take effect." Erlanger reiterated the same point the following day.

Too often, journalists merely say that the PA's obligation to crack down on terrorism is an Israeli demand. Myre's reference to the road map, however, reminds us that the internationally-sanctioned "Quartet" – the European Union, the United Nations, Russia and the United States – insisted on the requirement.

The road map is unequivocal. Its preamble states: "A two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict will only be achieved through an end to violence and terrorism, when the Palestinian people have a leadership acting decisively against terror."

Phase I of the plan is specific: "Rebuilt and refocused Palestinian Authority security apparatus [is to begin] sustained, targeted and effective operations aimed at confronting all those engaged in terror and dismantlement of terrorist capabilities and infrastructure. This includes commencing confiscation of illegal weapons and consolidation of security authority."

Israel also has firm obligations in this phase. It must immediately dismantle settlement outposts erected since March 2001 and freeze all settlement activity (including natural growth of settlements).

Although PA chairman Mahmoud Abbas has made some moves to control the militants, he has publicly declared that he will not directly confront terrorist organizations. Instead, he prefers to achieve a sort of cease-fire (interpreted only as a temporary time out by groups such as Hamas) and to co-opt rejectionist factions within the PA.

Not only were such moves not stipulated in the road map, they were arguably prohibited.

In Ha'aretz (April 18), Moshe Ya'alon, IDF Chief of Staff, detailed an increase in violence during the past few weeks in Gaza and the West Bank. He predicted terrorism would increase significantly after the Gaza disengagement and insisted that Abbas act decisively to dismantle its infrastructure.

In the Jerusalem Report (April 18), analyst Ehud Ya'ari agreed that "because there is no shake-up [in the Palestinian security] services, there is also no serious attempt to face up to the threat of renewed terror. All the existing agencies are doing is to plead with the known terrorists to restrain their impulses to attack Israelis."

In the meantime, Hamas, whose rejection of Israel is a violation of the road map's vision of a two-state solution, has declared its intention to run in the PA elections scheduled for July. According to several Palestinian analysts, Hamas may gain the greatest share of the vote, in large part as a protest against corruption within Abbas' ruling Fatah party.

In Ha'aretz, Danny Rubinstein discussed the possibility that Hamas might become the largest Palestinian political movement ("You can't get rid of us," April 14). He also questioned whether Hamas would conduct talks with Israel.

Mahmoud Abbas

Rubinstein quoted West Bank Hamas leader Sheikh Hassan Yousef: "The political and social platform of the PLO and Hamas platform differ."

Rubinstein elaborated: "The PLO recognized Israel and the principle of two states… whereas Hamas continues to advocate establishing a Palestinian state in the entire territory of pre-1948 Palestine, because the entire country is a Muslim Waqf (Muslim religious trust) of which not even one inch can be given up. In other words, the State of Israel has no right to exist."

In this atmosphere, many Israelis including those who support peace with the Palestinians are not perplexed that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon feels unfettered on the question of expanding existing settlements near Jerusalem.

About 400 Canadians expected to make aliyah this year

Back in Canada, Walker, an aspiring chef, happened upon a chef's supply store that was staffed by a former student of an Israeli cooking school and learned about a training program in Israel.

"He said the program here is Mickey Mouse compared to Israel. Plus, the school [in Israel] is two doors down from where Romi's dad works. And it's right on the beach!"

Romi now awaits her chef.

A different kind of love has prompted Ari Wexler, 21, to take the aliyah plunge.

His love is for the army.

"I grew up in a Zionist family," said Wexler, who previously took part in a year and a half stint in the army.

"As a kid, I always wanted to be in the army; that was my dream… It's something that's been inside me all this time."

The lone female of this group is Jordana Goldbloom, a Birthright alumna who dreams of studying fashion design in Israel.

"I've never really felt at home except for in Israel," Goldbloom said.

"My parents don't fully understand, but they are supportive and… they're firm believers in experiencing everything the world has to offer."

A significant supporting character in this cast of olim is Dina Gidron, who is aliyah shlichah of the Israel Aliyah Center of the Jewish Agency.

"It's really nice to help other people make aliyah," said Gidron, who made aliyah from England at the age of nine.

"If they meet the right people and find the right career, they will have a wonderful life experience."

Canadian immigration to Israel in on the rise, jumping from 228 people in 2003 to 312 in 2005. The Israel Aliyah Center expects some 400 individuals to make the move this year.

The Canadian olim are a heterogeneous lot, with 50 per cent Orthodox, 15 per cent Conservative, 10 per cent Reform and 25 per cent secular.

Close to half are from 18 to 30, and they represent the full spectrum of professions.

While the reasons for leaving Canada vary, many people caught the Israel bug from positive experiences on organized programs.

"Last March, four people went on our programs and this year, 41 people went in March," said Orna Hollander, regional director of the Israel Program Center.

"The idea is that once people go to Israel and have an experience… with these programs… they may then come to a conclusion that this is where they can see themselves living."

Israel programs for Canadians

Here is a sample of the some Israel programs that are popular with Canadians.

• Magen David Adom: The Israeli equivalent of the Red Cross, Magen David Adom, provides volunteers with the opportunity to learn and practise first-aid services while experiencing real life in Israel.

• Marva: This army-centred program offers a range of activities from navigation and topography, to lectures and seminars. The emphasis is on Israel's security situation and exposing participants to the complexities facing the Israeli Army. Marva is not army service and is not part of the Israel Defence Forces.

• The Israel Professional Internship Program: Participants work in placements for two to six months, where they get hands-on experience in their fields. Examples of placement locations include hospitals, hotels, law firms, government offices, TV stations and high-tech companies.

• Kibbutz Ulpan: A particularly popular program, Kibbutz Ulpan combines Hebrew-language instruction with the experience of working and living on a Kibbutz.

Greater Toronto Area

CHINA STUDIES: As part of their unit on ancient civilizations, Grade 5 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School recently presented their research on ancient China, with costumes, maps, dioramas, food and facts about this period. Standing, from left, are Myles Dichter, Daniel Baum, Samantha Seligman, Arly Sutton and Jessica Silverman.

PESACH CELEBRATION: Children at Torah Tots Pre-School celebrate Pesach.

BIRTHDAY GIRL HELPS MAZON: Thornhill resident Danya Baird, centre, who recently celebrated her seventh birthday, asked her friends to deposit cash donations into a "model restaurant" at her party instead of buyng gifts. In the end, she raised $800 for MAZON Canada, to "help feed people," she said. This is the third year Danya has chosen to use her birthday to help others. Last year, she raised $900, which went to the Hospital for Sick Children, and the year before a $900 donation was sent to Habitat for Humanity.

UJA Federation announces nominees

Ralph Shedletsky, nominations committee chair for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has announced the nominees for the federation's board of directors and individual representatives to council.

Elections will be held during UJA Federation's annual meeting on June 8 at 7:30 p.m., at Adath Israel Synagogue.

In accordance with federation bylaws, the governance consists of a council, a board of directors and an executive committee. The board of directors will be elected by the members of the council. The executive committee will be elected by the board of directors from among the directors. No nominations can be made from the floor during the annual meeting. However, any member of the Jewish community may be placed in nomination by complying with the following by-laws:

"Only members of the federation who have made a financial commitment to the United Jewish Appeal in respect of the previous year, and are in good standing with the United Jewish Appeal, shall be eligible to serve as an individual or group representative on the council.

"Any 20 representatives may nominate any individual member of the federation for election to the board of directors and the positions of chair and vice-chair, provided that: (a) any one individual representative may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the board of directors; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of council.

"Any seven members may nominate any individual member of the federation for election to the council provided that: (a) any one member may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the council; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of council."

Nominated for chair of the board is David Engel and vice-chair of the board is David Koschitzky.

Nominees for the board of directors include: Natan Aronshtam, Jodi Bager, Barbara Bank, Austin C. Beutel, Peter Cohen, Stephen Cole, Richard Diamond, Sheldon Disenhouse, Peter Ekstein, Linda Frum, Leslie Gales, Leo Goldhar, David M. Goldstein, Sheldon H. Goodman, Toddy Granovsky, Alison Himel, Marshall B. Kesten, Warren Kimel, Julia Koschitzky, Joseph Lebovic, Glennie Lindenberg, Baila Lubek, Guidy Mamann, I. Berl Nadler, Neil Nisker, Adrienne Offman, Morris A. Perlis, Ariella Rohringer, Miriam Rosenberg, Jacques Sayegh, Honey Sherman, Eileen Silver, Ted Sokolsky, Carole Sterling, Mark Waldman, Alan Winer, Elizabeth Wolfe, Henry Wolfond, and Cecile Zaifman.

The following individual representatives are to be elected for a two-year term, for 2005-2007, to the federation council: Irving Abella, Rosanne Ain, Stephen Altbaum, Tammy Anklewicz, Calvin Avertick, Karen Basian, Brent Belzberg, Eric Bornstein, Morley Brown, Michael Buckstein, Gloria Clamen, Robert Cohen, Samuel H. Cohen, Sharon Cohen, Ethel Cooper, Helen Daniels, Lori Disenhouse, William Draimin, Wendy Eisen, Ruth Ekstein, Judy Engel, Leslie Erlich, Steven Farber, Michael Florence, Bradley Fox, Stephen Freedhoff, Robert Furman, Henry Goldbach, David C. Green, David Y. Green, Norman Grill, Aaron Grubner, Robert Harlang, Sabrina Kerbel, Jules Kronis, Susan Maldoff, Michael Miller, Karen Morton, Harvey Naglie, Paul Nightingale, Allan Offman, Clifford Orwin, Elisa Palter, Murray Perelman, Sarah Perlis, Joel Reitman, Andrea Ritter, Brooky Robins, Michael Rosenberg, Lorraine Sandler, Mark Sarner, Mark Satok, Helen Silverstein, Miguel Singer, Marsha Slavens, Howard Stevens, Francie Storm, Barry Tissenbaum, Elaine Todres and Dodi Weill.

The following individual representatives are to be elected to fill vacancies for a one-year term, for 2005-2006, to the federation council: Louis Greenbaum, Stanley Kugelmass and Eleanor Mintz.

In addition to the individual representatives listed, each group member of the federation is entitled to two representatives on the council (group representatives). Any group member that has a membership in good standing in excess of 100 people living in the Greater Toronto Area is entitled to one additional group representative on the council. "Group" means any charitable, educational, social, cultural, religious or recreational agency, organization or congregation, unincorporated or incorporated (without share capital) whose activities are carried out primarily in the Greater Toronto Area (including the main Greater Toronto Area branch or division of national organizations), having a Jewish membership of at least 25 people, or such other agency or organization that may be accepted by the directors.

Student art show

Hillel of Greater Toronto's annual student arts festival was held this year from April 14 to 21 at the Mind Control Gallery. Ceramic artist Michelle Mendlowitz, left, of the Ontario College of Art and Design (OCAD) and Danielle Kishlyansky, also an OCAD student and one of the organizers of the show, are seen at the show's opening, which was attended by 200 people. This year's event was titled "Hineini" (Here I am)," and focused on expressions of Jewish identity. It included visual art, spoken word, creative writing, film, dance, music and integrated media art. Special foods to celebrate the Moroccan custom of Mimouna

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Unless you have Sephardi friends, you've probably never heard of Mimouna. I never had until I spent a Pesach in Brussels, Belgium, with friends and was taken to a Mimouna festival at the home of the community's rabbi.

Mimouna is celebrated by Moroccan Jews at the close of Passover. It is a festival devoted to the celebration of community, friendship and hospitality. For the holiday, people open their home to friends, neighbours and even strangers, with parties and sharing. A large portion of that sharing involves food. It is a festival of peace, kindness, and human warmth.

Whether in private homes, at neighbourhood-wide parties, or even parties held in huge tents to which all are welcome, food plays a major role in the holiday, for there are few better ways of sharing than with food. The tables will invariably be covered with white tablecloths, flowers and stalks of wheat, and displayed will be symbolic foods: milk, flour, eggs, honey, butter, fruits, nuts, yeast cakes, sweets, five dates, five coins, five beans, wine and plain yeast. And of course, stacks of the famous mofleta (the first leavened bread eaten after Pesach), which resemble French crepes, eaten hot with butter and honey added in the centre and rolled like a crepe. Other intricate dishes, all dairy, are on the menu, prepared by women wearing their embroidered caftans.

No less a part of the celebratory aspects of the holiday are the music, singing, dancing and exchanging of visits.

It is difficult to determine when the practice began, but the name Mimouna comes from the Hebrew/Aramaic word mamon, which means riches or prosperity. The underlying presumption is that an individual's productivity, the nation's bounty, and personal and national wealth are determined on Mimouna day. It also contains the Hebrew word emunah, or faith (that the redemption will occur in the month of Nisan, as freedom from bondage has occurred in the same month).

It is also said that Mimouna comes from the name Maimon. Maimonides' father, who had lived in Fez – where the Mimouna is said to have originated – died on that day at the end of Passover.

In contrast with the seder night, when everyone hurries home from synagogue to begin the seder, on the eve of Mimouna day, people take the time to greet each other at the Ma'ariv service with the formula, Tarbah (success); the special Mimouna blessing, Alallah Mimouna, Ambarka mas'uda, and stop on their way home to visit the rabbi's family, the cantor, their own parents, their friends and their neighbours, in that order.

Early the following morning, on Mimouna day, families in coastal cities get up and head for the seashore. They splash their faces with water, and step barefoot into the ocean – to replay, in a sense, the miraculous crossing of the Red Sea, which took place historically on the last day of Passover and ended in freedom and spiritual and worldly productivity. Those who live inland go to the local wells, springs, rivers or swimming holes.

When Pesach approaches, if you're fortunate enough to be invited to Mimouna in a Sephardi friend's home, be sure to accept.

CHAKCHOUKA (MOROCCAN JEWISH SALAD)

8 large tomatoes, preferably peeled and seeded
1 garlic clove, slivered
½ cup olive oil
4 green bell peppers
1 small green chili pepper, optional
1 tbsp. sweet paprika
1 tbsp. minced parsley
1 preserved lemon, cubed, optional

Heat olive oil in skillet over medium heat and cook tomatoes and garlic in it, stirring frequently, for 15-20 minutes, until oil separates from tomatoes.

Roast and peel the peppers and chili. Dice them. Add them to tomatoes, along with the paprika. Sprinkle with parsley (and preserved lemon). Serve at room temperature with bread for scooping. Makes 8 servings.

MOFLETA

3¼ cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. dry yeast
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. sugar
about 1 cup lukewarm water
2 tbsp. olive oil
butter and honey for serving

Food, Scrumptious Food

A festival devoted to community, friendship

In a bowl, combine the flour, yeast, salt and sugar. Make a well in the centre and add enough water to make a ball. Knead on a lightly floured board for 10 minutes or until silky and elastic, using the heels of your hands. Turn into an oiled bowl. Cover with a clean towel and let rest until the dough has doubled in size. Punch dough down.

Take pieces the size of an egg and roll out as thinly as possible on a lightly oiled surface. Heat a small, oiled, non-stick skillet or crepe pan over medium-low heat. Fry each mofleta for 2 minutes. Flip over and cook another minute until both sides are pale brown. Wrap in a clean cloth to keep soft. Eat as soon as possible as they quickly become tough. Serve with sweet butter and honey. Makes about 20 crepes.

ZABANE

One of the most cherished Moroccan recipes, zabane (pronounced za-ban), is made with whipped egg whites and sugar, beaten until the gooey consistency of caramel is achieved. Served in a bowl, zabane is a pareve confection eaten with a spoon and can be used for Pesach.

At every house during Mimouna, guests typically debate if the zabane is too hard or too soft, and who made the best batch.

4 egg whites
3 tbsp. sugar
chopped walnuts or peanuts to taste

Beat ingredients with an electric mixer until egg whites are very stiff, the consistency of marshmallow fluff. Place in a bowl. Sprinkle with chopped walnuts or peanuts. Keep at room temperature until ready to serve.

Rouziya, a mixture of currants, sugar, water, lemon, cloves and walnuts is a treat at a Mimouna feast as seen in The Scent of Orange Blossoms by Kitty Morse, Ten Speed Press publishers.

MOROCCAN MINT TEA

Mint tea isn't just a drink to Moroccans. It is a sign of hospitality and friendship and tradition. Because this drink is so popular – it is served all day long, after every meal and with every conversation – Moroccans take great pride in their tea. They also drink it very sweet. The sugar has been cut back in this recipe.

10 sprigs fresh mint, plus extra for garnish
3 tsp. green tea
3 tbsp. sugar (or more to taste)
4 cups water

Boil the water and pour a small amount into a teapot, swishing it around to warm the pot.

Combine the mint, green tea and sugar in the teapot, then fill it with the rest of the hot water. Let the tea brew for three minutes.

Set out glasses for the tea. A shot-glass is close to the slender glasses used in Morocco. Fill just one glass with the tea, then pour it back in the pot. Repeat. This helps to dissolve and distribute the sugar. Pour the tea.

Garnish with the remaining sprigs of mint.

More than 1,000 Canadians set to go on March of the Living

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The largest single delegation in the world taking part in the 2005 March of the Living trip to Poland and Israel is preparing to depart on May 2.

Montreal is sending 513 people on the two-week journey – the most from any one community, said Susan Laxer, chair of the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre (BJEC), which co-ordinates the Montreal part of the march with the Bronfman Israel Experience Centre.

That number includes 251 local high school students, 86 young adults, a 126-member adult mission, and a "chairman's mission" of 50.

"It's indeed a historic occasion," Laxer told an overflow final information session recently at Montreal's Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation.

Participants from Toronto and elsewhere in Canada, who will leave the same day, will push the national total to well over 1,000.

Included on the trip – for the first time – are several dozen non-Jewish Toronto high school students, as well as university students, municipal leaders, Canadian educators and Holocaust survivors.

Organizers said the record march number reflects the fact that this year is the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II. In January, hundreds from around the world came to Auschwitz to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the camp's liberation.

In Montreal, March of the Living national director Eli Rubenstein of Toronto, national co-chair Ralph Lipper and local chair Jeffrey Mandel were among the officials on hand to provide helpful tips and present the itinerary to a hall brimming with boisterous participants and doting parents.

"You will be seeing a sea of blue," Laxer said, referring to the 18,000 people from around the world dressed in the march's traditional colour who will walk the few kilometres from Auschwitz to Birkenau on May 5. "You can only imagine the power of that vision."

Israeli leaders, as well as Canadian Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, will join the march for its most solemn moment when all the participants are together for a commemoration ceremony at Birkenau.

The first week, the itinerary includes visits to Jewish centres in Poland where communities flourished before their total decimation – Krakow, Lublin and Warsaw – and trips to the infamous camps, including Treblinka, Majdanek, and Plashow.

"Those are the two themes," Laxer said. "Life as it was, and then its destruction."

March participants will leave May 8 for Israel, where the schedule will include visits to traditional tourist sites, including the recently rebuilt Yad Vashem. They will experience the commemorations of Yom Hazikaron, followed by the celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut.

The second week underscores the reaffirmation of Jewish life and nationhood after the Holocaust.

Sylvain Abitbol, president of FEDERATION CJA, which helps to fund the high school portion of the trip, said as the number of Holocaust survivors dwindle, the role of march participants will become even more vital in order to "keep the memory alive."

Before splitting up into groups and picking up their personalized duffel bags, participants heard a moving account on the nature of Jewish resistance from Beth Israel Beth Aaron's spiritual leader, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who, they heard, has gone on the march more often than anyone else from Montreal.

Rabbi Poupko said participants in the March of the Living will return home, "knowing more, but understanding less.

"You will only have more questions," he said. "But you will know that as Jews, you have every reason in the world to hold your heads high."

Cotler marks 20th anniversary of Charter rights

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The 20th anniversary of Section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a momentous occasion in Canada's history that's worth savouring and celebrating, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler said last week.

But Cotler lamented the fact the "equality rights" provision that gave unprecedented voice – what he termed a "panoply of rights and freedoms" – to the vulnerable and disadvantaged went almost unnoticed compared to the attention given the Gomery inquiry into the sponsorship scandal.

"All you hear about is Gomery," Cotler told a gathering of journalists on April 17, the anniversary of the date that Section 15 was adopted in 1982 and the date it came into effect three years later.

The clause states that all individuals enjoy "equal protection and equal benefit" under the law and cannot be discriminated against "based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age, or mental or physical disability."

Such principles might seem obvious today, Cotler said, but Section 15 gave "constitutionalized" rights and remedies to individuals and "historically disadvantaged" groups for the first time in Canadian history.

It also protected groups such as women, aboriginal groups, the elderly, and racial and religious minorities from "state-sanctioned discrimination" that has existed in Canadian history.

"It was a revolution not only in law, but in lives," Cotler said.

Section 15 changed Canada from a parliamentary to a constitutional democracy, made judges the "guarantors of human rights," and made citizens "rights-holders and rights claimants," Cotler said.

In addition, it made advocacy groups "change agents" for constitutional reform, and it opened the door to "dramatic jurisprudence" that allowed the concept of human dignity to become an element for judges to consider when assessing possible human rights violations, he said.

It also made the role of Canada's justice minister different, by obligating the office-holder to make sure that all activities or legislation emanating from the ministry are consistent with Section 15, Cotler said.

"The Charter trumps parliamentary privilege," he said.

Section 15 also gave the Canadian government a responsibility to educate citizens about the Charter as a way to make them more aware of their constitutional history, and to make them better and more informed citizens, Cotler said.

Taking questions, he said he believed that the Supreme Court has, in general, "come down the middle" on Charter challenge cases.

That means, he said, that the court has neither "usurped Parliament" as some critics think, nor been not activist enough, as others contend.

Despite that, "if you ask minorities: 'Are you more protected [by Section 15]?', the answer is invariably 'Yes,'" Cotler said.

"On the whole, I think the courts have had it right."

He noted that until 1982, as a human rights activist, he did not have the same "security" in using human rights arguments in cases before the courts, since such rights were not enshrined in Canadian law. The adoption of the Charter and Section 15, Cotler said, finally and belatedly gave redress to the people.

"As a whole, this can be considered a golden age in Canadian constitutional law," he said.

"Sometimes I wish I could go back in the trenches."

Asked about the Gomery inquiry, Cotler said the rule of law as well as the presumption of innocence for people implicated by the commission's work must both apply.

He noted that he was the one who approached Justice John Gomery to head the inquiry, in order to "get at the truth."

If the commission concludes there was individual malfeasance, appropriate action will be taken, Cotler said. But he strongly rejected a "collective indictment" of Liberals.

Cotler said he believe the "full truth will vindicate us," adding that Prime Minister Paul Martin has been determined to get to the bottom of the scandal, that his government has been completely transparent in getting at the truth, and that the Canadian public should allow the legal and judicial process to "complete its work" so it can make "fair and informed comment."

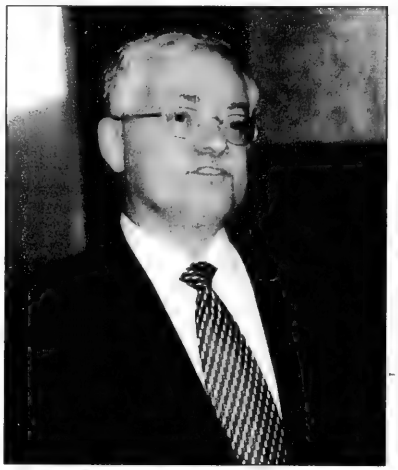
Lawyer named Hungary's first consul to Manitoba

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jewish lawyer Tom Frohlinger has been appointed Hungary's first honorary consul to the province of Manitoba.

In a reception held April 7 to celebrate the official opening of the new consular office – which will operate out of Frohlinger's downtown Winnipeg law office – the new consul recalled his arrival in Winnipeg as a 13-year-old refugee from Communist Hungary.



Tom Frohlinger

"I was able to make my way up through the ranks of Canadian society," he recalled. "I have worked hard to achieve what I have and enjoy a very good life here. This is a chance for me to give back to the community.

"I am hoping to make a difference in strengthening the relations between Manitoba, Canada and Hungary and, on the local level, hopefully help to bridge the divisions within the Hungarian community here."

Frohlinger estimated that there are about 10,000 Winnipeggers of Hungarian descent, including between 200 and 300 Hungarian-born Jews and their families.

Frohlinger, who has been practising law for 25 years, is an active member of both Winnipeg's Hungarian and Jewish communities. In the Jewish community, he is honorary counsel for the Board of Jewish Education, and he and his wife, Justice Heather Pullan, send their three children to the BJE's Gray Academy.

On the Hungarian side, he was one of the founding members of the Hungarian Canadian Businessmen's Association. He is also honorary counsel for the Hungarian Canadian Cultural Society and volunteers at the Hungarian Pavilion at Folklorama, Winnipeg's annual celebration of the city's ethnic diversity.

"The government of Hungary felt it needed to have a consular office in Winnipeg," Frohlinger said. "I do a lot of work in the Hungarian community, and I speak, read and write Hungarian fluently. That's why I was approached about the appointment."

As consul, Frohlinger expects to act as a liaison between local Manitobans of Hungarian descent and the mother country to authenticate and transmit documents, and to respond to inquiries from Hungarian citizens about Manitoba.

Among those present for the opening of the new consular office was Denes Tomaj, Hungary's ambassador to Canada. In an interview that focused on promoting trade and scientific exchanges between Manitoba and Hungary, he noted there are still about 80,000 to 100,000 Jews living in Hungary.

Although one openly anti-Semitic political party did have representation in the Hungarian parliament in the 1990s, Tomaj said the party was shut out in the last election in 2002. (It received just 1.8 per cent of the votes in a system in which parties must garner at least five per cent of the vote to win seats.)

Manitoba Aboriginal leader clarifies comments

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Manitoba chief who said Jewish-controlled media ignore violence against natives and warned of a rise in hatred of Jews by Indians apologized for his remarks last week.

But Chief Terrance Nelson, head of the Roseau River Anishinabe First Nation in south-eastern Manitoba, added that he didn't think his remarks were anti-Semitic, and he also criticized the National Post and its sister newspapers for being biased against aboriginal people.

In a statement distributed at a Winnipeg press conference, Nelson apologized to Jewish people in Manitoba and Canada for any "anger, offence or hurt" caused by his letter to the editor that appeared April 9 in the Winnipeg Free Press.

"I realize now that my approach, tone and some of my comments were deeply hurtful and offensive to some members of the Jewish community," Nelson said in the statement.

He told reporters he wrote the document at 1 a.m. the night before leaving the province to attend the National Indian Gaming Association convention in San Diego and did not spend enough time reviewing it properly.

His letter was commenting on the David Ahenakew case and said that coverage of Ahenakew's hate crimes trial in Saskatoon would dramatically increase natives' hatred of Jews and lead to Indians "killing police officers on a regular basis."

Nelson also wrote in his letter that he didn't agree with Ahenakew's 2002 statements to a reporter about Jews – Ahenakew called Jews a disease and said Hitler "fried" six million because they were attempting to take over Germany – but he said prosecuting the Saskatchewan native leader made it appear his views about Jews were correct.

Speaking to reporters last week, Nelson said, "I do not support, condone or accept Mr. Ahenakew's reported comments that Jewish people are a 'disease' or that Hitler was justified in engineering the Jewish Holocaust that claimed more than six million lives.

"For the record, I condemn these reported comments, but I will not condemn the man, as he is clearly not in the same league as a James Keegstra or an Ernst Zundel, and I doubt he will ever publicly make such comments about Jewish people again.

"Is my apology to the Jewish people for my comments total and unconditional? Yes, for my own comments and the way I said it, yes. You have an apology today, but I must be honest: that apology does not mean that I will be silent – absolutely not."

Nelson said he is concerned the Ahenakew case could become a native-versus-Jewish issue. Nelson said his door is open to B'nai Brith Canada or writers and editors from Jewish newspapers such as the Canadian Jewish News, "so that I might learn what anti-Semitism is.

"I say this because I truly do not know what is anti-Semitic in the press release I sent out. I sent out a warning to the Jewish people as I did to the late [CanWest Global Communications founder] Izzy Asper. I did not in any way preach, condone or incite violence against Jews. My purpose was clear, at least to me – perhaps only to me. My purpose was to ask Jewish people not to make the same mistake as has been made in the Middle East [with deceased Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat], that is to make a martyr out of someone who hates Jews."

He said he first aired his concerns with Asper in a July 2003 letter. Asper was scheduled to address the National Conference of Assembly of First Nations in Vancouver in September of that year, but he died suddenly the day before.

Nelson said he raised the issue again in his recent letter to the Free Press because of his outrage at a column by Jewish Winnipeg radio phone-in host and weekly newspaper columnist Charles Adler that made light of Saskatoon police officers dumping young native men on the outskirts of the city in winter, in one case leaving them to die of exposure.

The Manitoba chief is also angry at the National Post, which is owned by the Asper family through CanWest, for what he contends is its blatant bias against native people.

While Nelson spoke of "Jewish control of the media" in his original letter, in his press release he said his original comments were primarily directed at the Asper family, "who are Jewish and control the largest media empire in Canada," as well as at media personality and "CanWest employee" Charles Adler, "who is also Jewish."

"It was wrong to single out all Jewish people for the atrocious, deplorable behaviour of only a few," Nelson said last week.

"While I applaud the Asper-inspired [Canadian] Human Rights [Museum planned for Winnipeg], I will restate what I said to Izzy Asper in my letter – that a museum on human rights financed by the same people paying Charles Adler to promote hatred simply does not make sense. I sincerely hope that the Asper family who head this project will seek the absolute truth, even if it does not sit well with everyone.

"I do not intend to sit back if Jewish writers continue to write hateful articles or air hatred against my people. I challenge the Jewish people to help in maintaining peace in Canada. As our people have condemned David Ahenakew, so must you also confront your people when they say or write hurtful things about my people."

Alan Yusim, director of B'nai Brith's Winnipeg office, was not impressed with Nelson's latest comments. "That was no apology," he said. "And there are no excuses for ignorance.

"The comments in his original letter were poisonous," Yusim added. "He alleged that the media is Jewish-controlled. At his press conference, he repeated many of his original charges. It was a feeble apology that doesn't cut it. Clearly, he has no understanding of what anti-Semitism is."

Yusim said he "honestly feels that Nelson's and Ahenakew's views are not representative of most First Nations People."

He said their remarks must be condemned by other aboriginal leaders and that Nelson should be removed from office.

Israel and Canadian unions: A strained relationship?

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Special to The CJN

For years, Jews have played a prominent role in the trade union movement in English Canada, and at one time, their presence and contributions helped unions positively identify with Israel and Zionism.

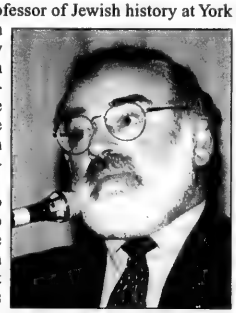
For example, David Lewis, a giant of trade unionism and social democratic politics in his day – and a proud Jew – helped form the New Democratic Party (NDP) party in 1961, and he later became its leader. His guidance of the NDP and its affiliation with major international unions in Canada in the 1970s helped maintain union sympathies for Israel. Along with Lewis, men such as Louis Lenkinski, a dedicated socialist and Holocaust survivor from Lodz, and Abraham Heaps, a founding member of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation and a labour politician, helped spearhead support for Israel within the English Canadian labour movement.

David Lewis

But today, it is condemnation rather than support that's being expressed toward Israel within English Canadian unions, and many critics say the disdain often veers toward thinly veiled anti-Semitism. And while some in the union movement still support a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, in many unions and leftist circles, it's now almost verboten to sympathize with Israel, because it's considered a colonialist and anti-democratic state that is oppressing the Palestinians by occupying their land – or worse, it's seen as an ethnic state that should never have come into existence in the first place.

This kind of thinking is justified with the slogan du jour for many anti-Israel bashers on the left: "Anti-Zionism, not anti-Semitism." They maintain that you can be against Zionism – meaning the existence of Israel as a Jewish state – and still not be anti-Semitic.

Irving Abella, Shiff professor of Jewish history at York University, takes issue with the distinction and the way it's made, saying that much of this thinking has anti-Semitic undertones, because unions often single out the world's only Jewish homeland for special attention.



Irving Abella

"By denying the right to the Jews that is given to every other people on the face of the earth – that is a right to a homeland, a right to a state, one, therefore, is singling out the Jews and making a special exception for the Jews and being hypocritical," Abella said.

"I would not say that criticism of Israel is anti-Semitic. In fact, the criticism of the Israeli government is more profound from Jews than anyone else in the world. But I do think that the refusal to accept Israel as an independent state or to recognize Zionism as the national movement of the Jewish people is probably anti-Semitic."

When it comes to English Canadian unions (this article will not deal with Quebec unions, where anti-Israel rhetoric and activity is arguably much stronger), some local observers see the attitude that Abella refers to being represented in the publicly vocal anti-Israel activities of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) local 3903 (the collective voice of York University contract faculty, teaching assistants and graduate assistants). For example, in December 2004, the CUPE-funded campus paper Critical Times printed a comic that called Israel's West Bank security barrier "the Apartheid Wall." Similarly, the CUPE 3903 stewards council has strongly supported Prof. David Noble's allegations that the York University Foundation, York's fundraising arm, is influenced by pro-Israel members of its board of directors.

But is the situation so black and white? Has the Canadian trade union movement become part of a growing leftist camp in North America and Europe that is at the forefront of criticism of the Jewish state? Has what was once a strong, natural alliance between the young, dynamic, and largely socialist Jewish state – as embodied by its expansive Histadrut Trade Union – and the trade unions of English Canada been overtaken by an increasing hostility toward Israel?

Before anyone rushes to easy conclusions, a closer look is warranted.

Mark Zigler, a Toronto lawyer and trade union adviser, cautions against lumping all unions in with some amorphous anti-Israel "left."

"It's a total misconception that the labour movement in Canada is anti-Israel and anti-Jewish," he says.

He points to the fact that, despite some rhetoric to the contrary, unions have shown tangible solidarity with, and support for, Israel.

"Many unions go further than just wanting to show support for Israel," says Zigler. "They invest in Israel [through State of Israel Bonds]. Not just for support, but because it's a good investment for them. And that level of support is probably stronger than it's ever been. It's just not advertised."

Indeed, according to information on State of Israel Bonds Canada's website (www.israelbonds.ca), more than 1,700 labour unions and numerous union pension funds in North America have invested in Israel Bonds.

And as Lawrence Waller – the long-time executive vice-president of State of Israel Bonds Canada who left in November to return to Israel – is quick to point out, this number represents private sector unions across Canada and the United States.

"[These unions] are mainly in the construction industry. They are labourers, plumbers, electricians, metalworkers, etc. These unions support the purchase of Israel Bonds for two reasons: First and foremost is because it makes good business sense for them."

The bonds are non-tradeable securities that must be held for 10 years and end up appreciating by almost 75 per cent at maturity. "The unions like this security because they can plan accordingly for their pension plans. They know how much money they will have in 10 years."

> 'The refusal to accept Israel as an independent state or to recognize Zionism as the national movement of the Jewish people is probably anti-Semitic.'

The second reason private sector unions continue to support Israel as much as ever, Waller said, is due to "a historical bond between Israel and the unions that dates back to before David Ben-Gurion [Israel's founding prime minister].

"We in Israel promote the fact that 100 per cent of our public works are unionized. So we are supporting them [the trade unions in Israel] and they [local private sector trade unions] are supporting us."

Jim Galfund, communications manager for Israel Bonds in Washington, D.C., notes that U.S. union investment has exceeded $50 million (US) – mainly by the AFL-CIO, the federation of U.S. labour unions that represents some 13 million American workers – over the last few years.

"What we traditionally do is have one big national dinner [annually] in Washington, where we honour the president of an international union, and that could typically result in as much as $20 million (US) in [sales of] Israel Bonds," he said.

According to Israel Bonds Canada, similar tribute dinners to honour members of labour management have been held in Canada since 1998. Cumulative sales for Israel Bonds Canada's labour division are roughly $20 million (Cdn). However, due to client privacy laws, Israel Bonds Canada is unable to disclose the specific investors. U.S. organized labour has been involved with Israel Bonds since the inception of the American Bonds organization in 1951. The Canadian labour division was founded in 1996-97.

Yet, despite this impressive level of financial investment in Israel by Canadian private sector unions, the situation is much different among public sector unions, which dominate the Canadian labour movement and its umbrella organization, the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC).

Louis Lenkinski

Indeed, public sector unions and the CLC, which represents more than three million workers and bills itself as "the national voice of the labour movement," seem to be increasingly critical of Israeli policies, often straying from a balanced view of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In November 2002, the CLC sent a delegation to Israel and the Palestinian territories on a four-day, fact-finding mission. CLC president Ken Georgetti, headed the mission. An executive summary, issued shortly after the group returned, began with an emotional plea.

"The CLC delegation felt the pull by both sides of this tragic conflict to see the situation from their perspective and sympathize with their losses. The streets of Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Gaza, Ramallah and Nablus are littered with memorials to those fallen to suicide bombers and military attacks. As these were pointed out to us, our hosts were obviously saying, 'Please see this tragedy from our perspective and help us.' As hard as it was, we did not take sides and we did not judge."

Or did they? While the report's summary acknowledges that "it should be obvious to everyone that one must accept the existence of the State of Israel as adopted and drawn by the United Nations" and that "there are still those Palestinians (Hamas, Islamic Jihad, etc.) who are unwilling to accept this and who will fight to the last drop of young people's blood who they can convince to blow themselves up in the name of religious fanaticism," the document still frames Israel as the aggressor in the current round of conflict.

Elsewhere, it contains references to "daily humiliations at military checkpoints" and says that the "expansion of Israel onto the land foreseen by the United Nations as the Palestinian state diminishes the hope for peace or peaceful co-existence." If Israel had not antagonized the Palestinians, the document suggests, the tragedy of the past 4½ years would have been avoided.

Special Feature

'The left has associated Israel with imperialism'

The CLC's international policy is decided every three years at a national convention. The current policies were ratified in May 2002 in Vancouver. At the time, there was an outcry by many Jewish members and organizations about the tone of a resolution on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that was brought forward by members of a CUPE local.

The document contained the following reference accusing Israel of state terrorism: "We must continue to condemn and deplore the violence and killings of Israelis by Palestinian suicide bombers. However, the violence perpetrated through a system of state terrorism by Israel is also completely unacceptable."

Alan Borovoy

Tabled as an "emergency resolution" at the CLC convention – a move that allowed it to bypass a vote at the local CUPE level – the document had many local Jewish CUPE members asking why a union dedicated to labour issues in Canada should be overly concerned with an international political agenda.

A May 2002 CUPE press release stated the resolution was a "pro-peace and not anti-Israel" document" while Sid Ryan, president of CUPE Ontario, strongly defended the document against accusations by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) that it was anti-Israel.

Still, Jewish CUPE members were upset. Carolyn Roberts, the president of CUPE local 2173, which represents workers at Jewish Vocational Services in Toronto, was disturbed by the proposed resolution.

"Our members were saying 'We thought we were a Canadian union concerned with affairs of labour issues in Canada. How is it… our name is being associated with the Middle East dispute and worded this way?'" she said. "[T]here are five Jewish agencies in the city, and not one of us was consulted or was aware of any of this."

While she said her initial frustration has dissipated over time, Roberts hopes the union learned some lessons and that it would proceed differently if a similar situation occurs at the next convention.

The scope and wording of the CUPE resolution was eventually toned down at the CLC convention. The CLC also adopted a resolution that called for an end to the killing of Israeli citizens, something other unions had been unwilling to do, but a resolution that is quite similar to the CUPE original was passed at the Canadian Union of Postal Workers' (CUPW) 2002 convention and remains union policy to this day.

It calls for Israel to withdraw from territories occupied in 1967, accuses Israel of violating the Geneva Convention and demands an end to Israeli military assaults. It also condemns Palestinian suicide bombings, but there is no call for action by the Palestinian Authority to rein in terrorists or acknowledged the PA's complicity in terrorism against Israel.

The following assertions about Israel were made in the CUPW document: "Israel has… illegally established Jewish-only settlements in these areas in further violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention; be it resolved that CUPW call upon the Canadian Government to demand that the Israeli Government immediately withdraw from the occupied territories and abide by UN resolution 242."

The CUPW resolution implies that Israel has no right to any of the territory it won in the Six Day War. But it makes no mention of the fact the United Nations resolution never called for Israel to go back to its pre-1967 borders (the resolution only says that Israel must vacate "territories occupied in the recent conflict" – not all territories – and only as part of a comprehensive and negotiated peace settlement with its neighbours).

Police separated two sides of protestors at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts in September 2003 where former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu was speaking. The president of a large CUPE local in Toronto was in the forefront of the anti-Netanyahu demonstrators. [Big Dipper Communications photo]

The CUPW resolution does make passing reference to the need for the killing on both sides to end, but it does not call upon the Palestinian Authority to put an end to terrorism. Nor does it explicitly accept the right of the State of Israel to exist. More illuminating is the fact that this resolution was passed easily and almost unanimously by CUPW delegates. What does this say about their understanding of, let alone support for, Israel and its history in the region?

Sympathizers say resolutions such as the CUPE and CUPW documents have their roots in the sense of solidarity that unions have always felt with perceived underdogs.

> 'There is something very wrong with the way Israel is held to account by its detractors'

Yet, Toronto labour lawyer Shalom Schachter, a member of the National Union of Public and General Health Employees, believes that the left may be a bit overzealous in its handling of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"When you see the world in black and white and no shades of grey, it's very simple to see one side as victim," he said. "None of the nuance that explains Israel's behaviour is taken into account."

As well, part of the animus against Israel has to do with its alliance with the United States, a frequent target of anger for what unionists characterize as its anti-labour policies both at home and internationally.

Schachter notes that unions and the left have always been concerned with, and have a history of fighting for, economic and social justice. But he laments the fact that Israel's strong labour movement, its peace parties, and its record of women's rights are being ignored due to what he describes as "a misplaced humanitarianism and anti-Americanism" by some unions and the left in general.

And as Abella argues, "the left has associated Israel with American imperialism. It is seen as carrying out American policy. Therefore, a large part of the anti-Israel animus of the left is based on anti-Americanism."

Yet, he stresses, the problem runs deeper. It is one thing to criticize policies you disagree with and another to suggest that Israel is the cause of all the strife in the Middle East. Such latent anti-Semitism is being expressed ever more frequently as anti-Zionism.

And according to Abella, there is something very wrong with the way Israel is held to account by its detractors.

"When one criticizes a government or government behaviour, it's usually sufficient to call for a replacement of government," he says. "In Israel's case, the conversation often changes into the replacement of the state. In no other situation does it happen where people who criticize the behaviour of a country call for its replacement, except in the case of Israel. I think that is anti-Semitic and it should be pointed out as such."

Alan Borovoy, general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, remembers the days when the relationship between the English Canadian labour movement and Israel was quite different.

Borovoy articled under David Lewis in the 1950s, and he fondly recalls how his mentor was as dedicated to Israel as he was to labour.

"[Lewis] became very supportive of Israel. His roots were Bundist [non-Zionist Yiddish socialist]. But as with a lot of people whose origins were that way… when faced with the reality of a functioning state, numbers of them became quite supportive. Louis Lenkinski was like that. Those were my old chaverim and were a joy to work with."

Given the current levels of animosity expressed toward Israel in today's labour movement, will we ever see a return to the days when it was supportive of the progressive aims of the young nation? Israel and its supporters hope so, perhaps assuming that a formal end to hostilities with the Palestinians will also bring about an end to hostility towafd the Jewish state, both in the union movement and left-wing groups in general.

The CLC holds its next convention in Montreal this June, which holds out the possibility of a change of heart – or at least official policy – in the labour movement.

Man aims to cycle across Canada – at age 77

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – On May 2 in Victoria, B.C., Martin Nadler, 77, and his son-in-law Pelle Stenbring, a mere 47, will begin the first leg of a cycling trip they plan to take across Canada to Halifax, about 7,000 kilometres away.

Don't talk about age with Nadler. The subject bores him.

"Can I do it? I think so. We'll find out," said the laconic Nadler.

The retired businessman has been an avid cyclist for many years. He and Stenbring, who lives in Ottawa, cycled Cape Breton's scenic and rolling Cabot Trail in 1998 to celebrate their 70th and 40th birthdays, respectively.

As well, each year, Stenbring cycles from Ottawa to Nadler's Ste. Agathe home in the Laurentians, a distance of more than 160 kilometres. Nadler meets him mid-way and completes the last half with him.

Nadler and his wife Sukie frequently take cycling vacations – once as far away as New Zealand – and last October, they biked around Greece.

He also does a lot of skiing, enjoys chopping wood at his Laurentian home and works out in a gym.

Stenbring is confident Nadler is up to the challenge. "You would not think Marty is 77, not only because of his physical shape, but more so because of his outlook on life. His way of being does not fit our preconceived notion of an older person."

Outside their normal regimens, neither man has done any special training to prepare. Stenbring cycles to work every day, even in the winter, and works out in a home gym.

Stenbring, who is married to Nadler's daughter Marla, is a physiotherapist at the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario. Many of his patients live with cystic fibrosis, so he and Nadler decided to raise funds for the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation through their ride. May is Cystic Fibrosis Awareness Month.

In addition to raising money to help develop a cure, they hope to share with Canadians stories about the courage and unwavering strength that children with CF use to fight the disease every day.

They expect to travel between 100 and 140 kilometres a day and arrive in Halifax at the beginning of August.

They plan to take a couple of days off when they reach Ottawa to attend the graduation of Pelle's son Michael from Hillel Academy.

They will be staying in motels and hostels, which will reduce their weight load compared to camping. "We hope to carry no more than 25 to 30 pounds in our panniers," Nadler said.

Both Nadler and Stenbring have long dreamed of taking on the challenge of a cross-country trip.

For Swedish-born Stenbring, the journey is an end in itself. "I really want to experience Canada outside the major centres. I want to see what's in-between and get a real feeling for the country. I think there's something thoroughly Canadian about a trip like this."

They have mapped out a general route, mainly along the Trans-Canada Highway, but they say they will be flexible, altering plans according to weather conditions.

"Obviously, we won't be covering as much ground through the Rockies, but we are hoping for a good tailwind across the Prairies," Stenbring said.

They will be staying in touch with their family using a Blackberry donated by Rogers Wireless. The gadget will allow them not only to phone and send e-mails, but also to keep a diary.

Reported plan for further withdrawals causes uproar

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Buoyed by American support for his plan to evacuate Israeli settlements from the Gaza Strip and northern West Bank, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon reportedly is considering a second unilateral "disengagement" that will determine Israel's permanent borders.

Analysis

Though Sharon strongly denies such a plan and U.S. President George W. Bush continues to insist on a negotiated Israeli-Palestinian agreement based on the internationally approved "road map" peace plan, the Israeli political establishment is in an uproar over the idea.

At their mid-April summit in Crawford, Tex., Sharon and Bush agreed on the potentially historic importance of Sharon's first disengagement, scheduled for the summer, and agreed that the next step should be Israeli-Palestinian peace talks based on the road map.

But Sharon fears the road map may prove unworkable. And though he denies that he is now working on plans for a follow-up, second disengagement, one of Sharon's closest aides has acknowledged that if the Palestinians are unable to deliver on their road map commitments, a second unilateral disengagement will be one option Israel considers.

Sharon fears the road map may prove unworkable

Such a plan is not without its problems: it's likely to meet opposition from the international community, the Palestinians and Israeli politicians on both the left and right of the political spectrum.

And, more significantly, leading members of Sharon's own Likud Party say they're determined to block any attempt to push through a second disengagement plan.

Nevertheless, speculation in Israeli political circles about a second disengagement is rife. Some analysts argue that it may yet prove to be Israel's best option, and that the Americans may come around to supporting it.

Though Bush has expressed great admiration for the planned pull-back from Gaza and the northern West Bank, Sharon insists that he has not broached the subject of a second unilateral disengagement.

On the contrary, he says he made clear to Bush at the Crawford summit that Israel will renew peace talks with the Palestinians if they dismantle terrorist militias and carry out promised security, economic and governmental reforms.

But if the Palestinians don't carry out their commitments, will Sharon accept a situation of political inertia that could easily degenerate into renewed violence? And if they do, will he embark on peace talks that he thinks are bound to blow up over the issues of Jerusalem and refugees?

In both cases, some members of Sharon's inner circle believe the way out could be a new Israeli initiative for an additional withdrawal. Like the first disengagement, the idea behind the second would be to pre-empt other "dangerous" peace plans and – because it largely would be a unilateral move – to give Israel control over precisely which territory it gives up.

The furor over the second disengagement idea came last Friday, when political analyst Shimon Shiffer, who covered the Crawford summit for Yediot Achronot, wrote that Sharon's close circle was considering such a move if, as they fear, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas proves unable or unwilling to carry out his road-map commitments.

According to Shiffer, the idea would be to evacuate isolated West Bank settlements, while annexing large settlement blocs, essentially setting Israel's permanent borders.

Benedict has 'special sensitivity' to Jews' 'tragic history' so that we can rise to the challenge of working together to address all-important global issues such as poverty, inequalities between peoples, crimes against humanity and HIV-AIDS," said Ed Morgan, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Victor Goldbloom, chair of CJC's national executive and a longtime interfaith activist, said Congress hopes that Ratzinger's upbringing in Germany "has given him a special sensitivity to the tragic history of the Jewish people, and that this understanding will be a source for continued interfaith outreach."

The new pope was born in Marktl am Inn, Germany, in 1927. He was ordained in 1951 and received his doctorate in theology in 1953, then taught theology and dogma at several German universities.

He was appointed bishop of Munich in 1977 and, just three months later, was named a cardinal by then-Pope Paul VI.

Since 1981, he has led the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, where he was responsible for enforcing church doctrine. He became known in this role for his conservative views, upsetting some Catholics with his vocal opposition to religious pluralism and liberation theology.

Ratzinger further maintains conservative views on such issues as homosexuality and the ordination of women as priests, earning him such sobriquets as "the enforcer" and the "panzer cardinal."

But he also used his position as the Vatican's chief theologian under John Paul II to play an instrumental part in his predecessor's historic rapprochement with Jews.

"John Paul was hugely appreciated for what he did for and with the Jewish people," said Britain's Lord Janner, head of the Holocaust Education Trust.

"If they were to appoint someone who was on the other side in the war, he would start at a disadvantage, although it wouldn't mean in the long run he wouldn't be equally understanding of the concerns of the Jewish world."

Ratzinger oversaw the 2002 publication of The Jewish People and Their Sacred Scriptures, which asserted that "the Jewish messianic wait is not in vain," and expressed regret that certain passages in the Christian Bible condemning individual Jews have been used to justify anti-Semitism.

In 2000, under Ratzinger's editorial direction, the Vatican released Memory and Reconciliation: The Church and the Faults of the Past, a watershed document that acknowledged church errors in its past dealings with Jews, asking "whether the Nazi persecution of the Jews was not made easier by the anti-Jewish prejudices imbedded in some Christian minds and hearts…

"That the Jews are connected with God in a special way and that God does not allow that bond to fail is entirely obvious," the statement said.

But it was the following line that raised many Jewish eyebrows: "We wait for the instant in which Israel will say yes to Christ, but we know that it has a special mission in history now… which is significant for the world."

> 'That the Jews are connected with God in a special way and that God does not allow that bond to fail is entirely obvious'

Also in 2000, Ratzinger signed off on a document that called non-Catholic Christian denominations "not churches in the proper sense," while non-Christians were "in a gravely deficient situation." Only Catholics, it stated, had the means for salvation.

He upset many Jews with a statement in 1987 that Jewish history and scripture reach fulfilment only in Christ – a position denounced by critics as "theological anti-Semitism."

But it was the new pope's past that drew much attention in Israel.

"White Smoke, Black Past," read a front-page headline in the daily Yedioth Ahronoth, referring to when Ratzinger served in the Hitler Youth, when membership was compulsory.

In his memoirs, Ratzinger wrote of being forced into the youth movement when he was 14 but that he was soon released to study for the priesthood. His biographers said he was never a member of the Nazi Party and his family opposed Hitler's regime.

The son of a rural Bavarian police officer, Ratzinger was six when Hitler came to power in 1933. His father, also called Joseph, was an anti-Nazi whose attempts to rein in Hitler's Brown Shirts forced the family to move home several times.

According to a profile in London's Sunday Times, Ratzinger's father retired in 1937 and the family moved to Traunstein, a staunchly Catholic town in Bavaria.

> 'He'll never forget the encounter he had with the living evil of anti-Semitism in his early years'

"Ratzinger was only briefly a member of the Hitler Youth and not an enthusiastic one," said John Allen, his biographer.

Two years after his release from the youth group, Ratzinger was enrolled in a German anti-aircraft unit that protected a BMW factory making aircraft engines. The workforce included slaves from Dachau.

Ratzinger has insisted he never took part in combat.

He was later sent to Hungary, where he set up tank traps and saw Jews being herded to death camps. He deserted in April 1944 and spent a few weeks in a prisoner of war camp.

He has since said that although he was opposed to the Nazi regime, any open resistance would have been futile – comments echoed last week by his elder brother Georg, a retired priest ordained along with his brother in 1951.

"Resistance was truly impossible," Georg Ratzinger said. "Before we were conscripted, one of our teachers said we should fight and become heroic Nazis and another told us not to worry as only one soldier in a thousand was killed. But neither of us ever used a rifle against the enemy."

Rabbi David Rosen, a Jerusalem-based official of the American Jewish Committee who helped negotiate rapprochement with the Vatican, said Ratzinger's German background helped shape his sensitivity toward the Jewish people.

"He'll never forget the encounter he had with the living evil of anti-Semitism in his early years," he said.

David Elcott, U.S. director of interreligious affairs for the American Jewish Committee, said it was "extraordinary that the Pope has personally experienced the evils of Nazism. "There's no cardinal whose life has been more entwined with that of the Jewish people than that of this cardinal."

Not all Jewish leaders welcomed Ratzinger's selection, however. Some said that it was precisely his role as ideologist under John Paul that made him ill-suited to be the next pope.

Michael Lerner, editor of Tikkun magazine and rabbi of Beyt Tikkun Synagogue in San Francisco, is among the new pope's critics.

"It was with great distress that we watched as Cardinal Ratzinger led the Vatican in the past 25 years on a path that opposed providing birth control information to the poor of the world, thereby ensuring that AIDS would spread and kill millions in Africa," Lerner said.

German Jews expressed some concern over Ratzinger's election.

"A few people who know him say he is not bad. He has good relations with some Jewish persons," Nathan Kalmanowicz, head of religious affairs for the Central Council of Jews in Germany and a member of Munich's Jewish community, told JTA.

"But the vast majority is afraid of what will happen. He is opposed to reform and not as familiar with Jewish issues" as the last pope, "and as far as we know, he is not interested in promoting issues like the Holocaust."

Canadian shift at UN called 'very significant'

"However, the reference to armed settlers' violence in the absence of any reference to Palestinian violence, and to the right of Israel to defend itself from terrorism, was not appropriate. Neither should the resolution quote selectively from the decisions of the courts. Canada would therefore abstain this year on the resolution."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) called Canada's shift a welcome development and "very significant."

Canada "had more reason [this year] to support it than in the past. [The abstention] is an important example of how Canada is sticking to a set of principles on decision-making."

Fogel said Canada's vote is part of an overall "modest recalibration" of the country's voting record on the Middle East at the UN, where ambassador Alan Rock last autumn delivered a sharp denunciation of Mideast resolutions, calling them "divisive" and lacking balance.

The CIC still has "profound concerns" with Ottawa's policy, and "we really wish Canada would ratchet up rallying like-minded countries to fix [the process]," Fogel said. "You can't keep saying the UN needs fixing and allow business as usual."

As in years past, Canada voted against a resolution on Israeli practices affecting Palestinians' human rights "in the occupied Palestinian territory, including East Jerusalem."

The resolution called on Israel to comply with its legal obligations under international law, and to cease construction of the wall "in the occupied Palestinian territory."

It also condemned "the use of force by the Israeli occupying forces against Palestinian civilians, resulting in extensive loss of life, vast numbers of injuries and massive destruction of homes, properties, agricultural lands and vital infrastructure."

The resolution was adopted by a vote of 29 to 10, with 14 abstentions.

Canada voted against the measure because it was "disconnected from the reality on the ground," Meyer stated.

Finally, Canada abstained, as it had done before, on a resolution demanding that Israel "desist from changing the physical character, demographic composition, institutional structure and legal status of the occupied Syrian Golan."

The resolution was adopted by a vote of 32 to two, with 19 abstentions.

Meyer explained that while there were elements of the resolution with which Canada agreed, it "did not provide the full context or a balanced assessment of the situation in the region."

Russia will arm Syria

Vladimir Putin stood firm on Russia's planned sale of anti-aircraft missiles to Syria. Speaking to Israel's Channel One television, the Russian president said there was no change to the plan to sell shoulder-launched Strela missiles to Syrian President Bashar Assad, despite Israeli objections. Putin played down Israel's concerns, saying the only impact the deal would have on the balance of power in the region would be that "Israeli jets will no longer be able to overfly Assad's palace." Israel, backed by the United States, fears the missiles could reach Hezbollah in Lebanon or Palestinian terrorist groups in Gaza.

Kabbalist backs withdrawal

An influential Israeli rabbi has backed the planned withdrawals from the Gaza Strip and northern West Bank. Rabbi Yitzhak Kadouri, a kabbalist revered in Israel, said in an interview with the religious journal Family that Israel must give peace with the Palestinians a chance. "If, in return for giving up something small, there is peace, then it is permissible to leave," Kadouri said. But while Israel could leave parts of Gaza and the West Bank, it must never give up Jerusalem, he added.

Sharon meets settlers

Ariel Sharon met with West Bank settlers slated for evacuation. The Israeli prime minister visited Homesh, one of four settlements in the northern West Bank to be removed under the summer withdrawal plan, for what residents described as a fruitful discussion. "We will resist evacuation in every way possible, but if this plan is implemented we would like to be relocated en masse," Homesh's secretary, Reuven Tabib, said he told Sharon. No representatives of the three other area settlements to be removed – Ganim, Kadim and Sa-Nur – turned up for the meeting.

Solidarity at sea

Israeli naval ships came to the rescue of drowning Syrian and Egyptian sailors. Four Israeli vessels joined the U.S. and French navies in responding to distress calls from a tanker that sank 35 miles off Israel's coast. Three of the crew were rescued and searches continued for four others. The tanker, carrying grain, was en route from Egypt to Turkey when it foundered.

The property lost

European Jewry lost as much as $320 billion (US) in the Holocaust, an Israeli government report found. The study determined that in terms of confiscated properties and unpaid income for slave labour, Jews lost between $230 billion and $320 billion, adjusted for 1997 rates of inflation. According to Ha'aretz, a panel under Israel's minister for Diaspora affairs, Natan Sharansky, concluded that outstanding reparations must be demanded not only from Germany, but also from banks and insurance companies in the United States and Israel that have unclaimed accounts belonging to Holocaust victims. With files from JTA

Putting food on the table

By ELI STUTZ
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Israel is currently dealing with a crisis that makes fewer headlines than the political situation, but is no less troubling – hunger.

A recent Israeli national insurance institute study found that more than 17 per cent of Israelis live below the poverty line and 30 per cent of Israeli children go to sleep hungry. At the same time, it's estimated that 20 per cent of the fresh and prepared food in the country is thrown out. Now, an Israeli non-profit organization, Table to Table, is making use of leftover food to feed Israel's hungry.

Table to Table was founded in the town of Ra'anana by Joseph Gitler, who now heads the organization. He was troubled by national statistics on hunger, as well as the amount of food that he saw wasted at weddings and bar mitzvahs. He and some friends began picking up the excess food and distributing it to non-profit organizations in the area.

Yonatan Ben Dor, director of operations for Table to Table, asks, "If there are so many hungry and needy people in Israel, then why are we throwing away food?

"Our philosophy is that if we can rescue just a small part of the food that's going to waste, then we can make a large dent in the number of hungry in Israel."

Table to Table has three refrigerated trucks and works with hundreds of volunteers. Its trucks arrive at large companies, such as Amdocs, Intel and Bank Leumi, after lunch to pick up the uneaten food. Army bases and restaurants are also on the list of stops. The common denominator: a cafeteria without people but loaded with leftovers.

Much food goes to waste long before it hits the buffets. "We also work with farmers and packing houses who are looking to get rid of Grade B unsold fruits and vegetables," Ben Dor says.

Table to Table recently began the Leket project, which brings groups of volunteers to fields of farmers who've decided not to pick all their fruit and vegetables through the harvest season. "Leket" means "picking" and it stems from the Biblical commandment that farmers allow the poor into their fields to pick fruit that has fallen out of the harvester's hand. "We see our project as a continuation of that commandment," Ben Dor says.

Table to Table doesn't distribute directly to the country's hungry. Instead, the food is donated to more than 50 Israeli charity organizations. "We distribute what we collect to homeless shelters, meals-on-wheels programs, youth clubs, senior homes – any organization that's doing good charity work," Ben Dor says.

"You can consider us like a trucking company – a company that fills the holes. We bring the food from those who have too much to those who don't have enough."

The quantity of food collected is impressive or shocking – depending on how you look at it. "We pick up 10,000 meals a week, in addition to 20 tons of fruits and vegetables. Also, through our partnerships with large corporations like Strauss-Elite, where we pick up products that are close to expiry, we collect close to 20,000 fresh products per week."

Ben Dor made aliyah from Canada two years ago. After being released from the army, he began working for Table to Table.

"There's a lot of work left," he says. "We've just touched the tip of the iceberg when it comes to the food that's being wasted in Israel.

"People in this country are particularly sensitive about wasting food, since the Bible prohibits such waste. That's why we see such great co-operation with our projects and so many who are willing to volunteer with us."

Ben Dor says the level of the kashrut of the food that Table to Table receives can be a problem. "Ninety-nine per cent of the food from halls and caterers in Israel is kosher, but some non-profits demand a stricter level of kashrut, and for them we have to be more careful, providing them only with food that meets their requirements."

During the Passover holiday, Table to Table arranged for school and youth groups to pick up fruits and vegetables from farmer's fields.

"We'll do our best to go strong throughout the holiday," Ben Dor says.

Sharon denies plan in the works

Well aware of the likely political fallout, Sharon vehemently denied that any such plan was in the offing. His office put out a statement saying the prime minister "is not planning another unilateral step of evacuating settlements in the West Bank, after implementation of the disengagement plan."

But Dov Weisglass, one of Sharon's closest advisers, was far less categorical. He said Israel's preferred option was to negotiate with the Palestinians within the framework of the road map, but if the Palestinians fail to carry out their commitments, Israel would consider other options.

A second disengagement, as outlined by Shiffer, was one of them, he declared in an Israeli television interview.

Top Likud leaders are taking the scenario seriously enough to come out strongly against it. Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom warned that the Likud "won't allow a second disengagement from parts of the homeland in Judea and Samaria," the biblical names for the West Bank. Further to the right, reactions have been even more scathing.

Despite the denials and criticism, right-wing moderates and some independent analysts continue to tout the second disengagement idea.

Mitzvah technique keeps body in proper alignment

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One tends to think of the spine as a rigid collection of bones and nerves that keeps us upright. Meir Cohen-Nehemia, referred to affectionately by his patients and disciples as just "Nehemia," has a different view of it.

He practises and teaches what he calls the mitzvah technique. The name, said University of Toronto chemistry professor Paul Brumer, a longtime client of Nehemia's, comes from the concept that a good deed done for another person is also beneficial for oneself. Similarly, if you do a good deed for your body by using the mitzvah technique, your whole being will benefit.

The mitzvah technique deals with postural and movement problems that, Nehemia said, are the root cause of pain.

A term he uses frequently is "rippling." The movement of the muscles and spine, he believes, should be a gentle rippling, and unfolding, rather than the quick, automatic actions common to most people.

The mitzvah technique, Nehemia said, was developed from a combination of the Alexander and Feldenkrais movement therapies, which are also based on re-education about body movement; Nehemia's observations of how Bedouins ride their camels; and the fluid motions of the Israeli Inbal Dancers.

Nehemia said bodily wear and tear and slouching lead to many problems, including pain in the neck, shoulders, back, hips, knees and ankles, breathing difficulties, jaw problems, headaches and spinal deformities.

Meir Cohen-Nehemia, left, helps musician Bill Berle keep his head, shoulders and back in proper alignment.

When the neck is tight and the head sits locked on the spine, or when the head is out of alignment with the spine, as when one slouches, postural rigidity, tension and stress result.

"We encourage the body's own ability to move and heal," he said.

Another benefit of the mitzvah technique, said Nehemia, is that it helps keep the hips and bones mobile, thus allowing healthier and more enjoyable aging.

That is something he knows about personally. At age 81, he still performs with the senior Inbal Dancers, and lectures extensively around the world.

At his clinic at Sheppard Avenue and Bathurst Street, clients lie on treatment tables and receive gentle, no-pressure treatments, and walk around practising proper body alignment. A musician afflicted with Parkinson's disease slowly raises and lowers himself with the help of an exercise bar. He says that with Nehemia's help his tremors and rigidity have much improved.

A young woman who has had Crohn's disease since she was eight, and whose joints were affected by the drug therapy prescribed for the disorder, was told she would be in a wheelchair, but she lies comfortably on a table while Nehemia pulls gently on her neck.

A former mother superior of the Sisters of St. Joseph has taught the techniques to fellow convent members.

Brumer, who calls Nehemia "an innovative creative genius," described how he had such excruciating sciatic pain that he had to cancel a research trip to Israel. "After one session, I could get rid of a steel back brace I had to wear."

The atmosphere is collegial, with everyone helping each other, critiquing their techniques, helping them move properly, and offering encouragement.

How often people come depends on their condition and how well they co-operate with the program and change their body habits. "We don't guarantee results," Nehemia stressed. "It depends on how well people follow instructions."

While the mitzvah technique is not covered by OHIP, some insurance companies will cover some of the cost, provided it is recommended by a physician.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. As the summer approaches, I am barbecuing more often and I am always unsure about whether meat is sufficiently cooked. When chicken is white and ground beef no longer pink, is it safe to eat?

A. It is very important to ensure that all meat is cooked thoroughly. You cannot guarantee that it is safe simply by its appearance. I find the easiest way to check is to use an instant-read thermometer. This way you can be sure without cutting into the meat and releasing juices or serving shredded meat. A chicken thigh should reach a temperature of 180 degrees Fahrenheit, a chicken breast should reach 160 degrees and ground beef should also reach an internal temperature of 160 degrees.

Q. I love goat cheese but I am sure that since it is so creamy and delicious, it is very high in fat. Am I right?

A. Good news! Goat cheese is actually not very high in fat because it has a high water content. It is also low in saturated fat. In addition, you can buy light varieties of goat cheese that are quite low in fat but still full of flavour. Enjoy!

Q. I read your column on the fruits and vegetables that are most contaminated with pesticides and I have been buying those only in organic form. I was wondering if you know which ones tend to contain low levels of pesticides?

A. The amount of pesticides in all fruit and vegetables can vary greatly and depends especially on the country where the fruit was grown and its pesticide practices. However, some that may have lower levels of pesticide residues are things like blueberries, bananas, watermelon, kiwi and some canned fruit.

Metallic Blues roars along at Jewish Film Festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The 13th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs from May 7 to 15 at the Bloor Cinema and the Al Green Theatre at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. Previewed here are five of the films.

Danny Verete's highly enjoyable road picture, Metallic Blues, is a cautionary tale about greed and dashed expectations set in Israel and Germany.

By turns amusing and tragic, this Israeli, Canadian and German co-production revolves around Shmuel Goldberg, a gruff Israeli auto-body dealer in Tel Aviv and the son of Holocaust survivors who's captivated by a metallic blue 1985 Lincoln Continental Town limousine.

The fancy vehicle, sporting an incongruous Quebec licence plate and furnished with every conceivable luxurious fitting, is brought to Goldberg (Avi Kushnir) by an Israeli Arab who has recently returned to Israel from Canada.

Having determined that the classic car is a rare collector's item, Goldberg convinces his doleful partner, Sisso (Moshe Ivgy), that they can make a killing selling it in Germany. They proceed to convince their skeptical wives that their plan is foolproof.

The pair ship their limo to Hamburg, and on the advice of a friendly customs officer, upgrade their wardrobe. Then they check into a swanky hotel. Goldberg, whose parents are German Jews, settles so comfortably into his new surroundings that he flirts with the notion of settling in Germany.

Avi Kushnir is Shmuel Goldberg in Metallic Blues.

To his misfortune, Goldberg is a fellow who counts his chickens before they are hatched. He is thus rife for a fall. Verete, a fine director, exploits the situation for all it is worth.

Once in Germany, they get off to an inauspicious start by ordering the wrong meal in a restaurant. It's the first of a series of shocks that will teach them a lesson in life's realities.

The second shock comes when Goldberg loses his wallet containing 2,000 euros and his credit cards. Suddenly, he is broke. In haste, they leave the hotel without paying their bill. At this point, Goldberg, wracked by guilt about being in Germany, has hallucinations about the Holocaust.

Much to Goldberg's further disappointment, an auto dealer in Dusseldorf offers them a pittance for the car. To add insult to injury, it is stolen. The police find it, but in damaged condition.

Sisso, having had enough, wants to cut his losses and go home. Goldberg, however, remains foolishly optimistic. He pays the price for his hubris.

Thanks to a compelling script, flawless performances from Kushnir and Ivgy and Verete's steady hand, Metallic Blues roars along like a finely tuned automobile.

Jazz bandleader's roots lie in sacred Jewish melodies

By SHAYLA GUNTER-GOLDSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Chicago-based jazz vocalist Kurt Elling accompanied by the Toronto Jazz Orchestra, a student band from the Royal Conservatory of Music, recently treated local fans to a long-awaited concert.

I attended the event – at the temporary home of the Royal Conservatory of Music (RCM) in Toronto's west end – to see Elling, but was amazed by the talent and enthusiasm of the Toronto Jazz Orchestra. This group of jazz musicians in their 20s was led by Joshua Grossman.

Grossman, 28, a Vancouver native who moved to Toronto with his family in 1985, is a graduate of the University of Toronto's jazz performance program. He studied trumpet at university with well-known jazz musicians Chase Sanborn and Kevin Turcotte and has performed in big bands with Canadian jazz artists Phil Nimmons and Paul Read and in the Whitney Smith Big Steam Band.

TV documentaries explore contemporary Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

To mark Israel Independence Day on May 12, Vision TV plans to broadcast two documentaries dealing with contemporary Israel.

The first, End of Days, which runs on Tuesday, May 3 at 10 p.m., turns on the complex and uneasy relationship between Christian Zionists and the Jewish state. The second, Shalom Abu Bassem, which airs on Tuesday, May 10, at 10 p.m., explores the Arab-Israeli conflict through the prism of a narrow street in Jerusalem's Muslim Quarter.

Shalom Abu Bassem, by Nissim Mossek, unfolds against the backdrop of Haladiya Street, a flashpoint of Arab-Jewish tension.

Jews in the Muslim Quarter abandoned their homes during the 1936-39 Arab Revolt. In the aftermath of the 1967 Six Day War and Israel's annexation of eastern Jerusalem, Israelis from mainly the national religious camp began moving to the Muslim Quarter. Muslims generally regarded their presence and motives with immense suspicion and animosity.

Mossek focuses on Danny Robbins, a Jewish immigrant from the United States, and Abu Bassem, an older Palestinian hummus vendor. Both live on Haladiya Street, a stone's throw away from the Western Wall and the Temple Mount. Robbins and Bassem treat each other with a mixture of wariness and civility. Ultimately, they remain estranged, being pawns in the greater struggle for political control of Jerusalem.

Shalom Abu Bassem, which covers the period between 1986 and the present, is unrelievably bleak in substance and tone. Abu Bassem comes under pressure to sell his modest home, where he resides with his extended family. He and Rafika, an elderly Arab woman who lives close by, resist all sales pitches.

Abu Bassem values neighbourly relations with Jews. "A good neighbour is better than a distant relative," he likes to say. But his efforts to be on cordial terms with Jews are doomed by the murder of a Jew in the vicinity, retaliatory Jewish attacks and Robbins' stabbing. The second Palestinian uprising worsens an already bad situation.

Judging by the undercurrent of turmoil on Haladiya Street, it seems clear that Jews and Arabs cannot enjoy normal relationships under current political circumstances.

In End of Days, Canadian filmmaker Martin Himel tackles a subject that remains extremely sensitive for both Jews and Christians.

Evangelical Christians such as Torontonian Donna Holbrook, chair of the International Christian Embassy-Canada, are among Israel's best friends today. They support Israel politically and work for aliyah, all out of a belief that Jews and Israel can play a pivotal role in the unfolding of Biblical prophecy.

If Diaspora Jews return to their ancestral land, as foretold in the scriptures, they will hasten the apocalyptic "end of days," the coming of the messiah Jesus, and thus usher in the mass conversion of Jews to Christianity.

Their hidden agenda is hardly a secret. Ellen Horowitz, a Jewish painter who sells her biblical canvases to Christian Zionists, realizes that their motives may be suspect. But she is sanguine they will not betray Jews.

Her confidence seems misplaced. Without blinking an eyelash, Clarence Wagner, a Christian Zionist, says that millions of Jews who reject Jesus will be killed during the end of days. Seconding his opinion, Holbrook allows that "more suffering" is in store for the Jewish people. Scott Johnson, a Christian Zionist based in Jerusalem, implies that Israel's strict anti-conversion laws, prevent proselytizing.

On a short-term basis, Israel's marriage of convenience with evangelical Christians, which was sealed by Menachem Begin when he was prime minister, appears to be paying dividends. As James Hutchens – president of Christians for Israel – points out, the base of the Republican party in the United States consists in large part of people like himself.

But as Horowitz warily concedes, there are "explosive issues" yet to be settled by Jews and evangelical Christians. To Himel's credit, he does not gloss over these worrisome imponderables.

Previews of five movies playing at the TJFF

Bulgaria courageously protected its Jewish citizens from German demands to deport them to death camps. Yet the pro-Nazi Bulgarian government subjected Jews to a variety of indignities, including the loss of their civic rights. These contradictory factors come into play as the film unfolds.

It's set in 1940, before Germany launched its systematic campaign of extermination against European Jewry. A train pulls into Sofia, Bulgaria's capital, and Else and David, Jewish children fleeing Germany, are among the passengers. Their elderly uncle had planned to travel with them to Palestine by ship from the Bulgarian port of Varna. But he has died en route, and now Else and David find themselves stranded and utterly alone in Sofia.

The members of an itinerant, down-at-the-heels entertainment troupe stumble upon them at the railway station. Zara wants to help Else and David, but her fellow performers, Dimmy and Samuil, are less than eager to get involved. Meanwhile, a Nazi agent named Straube arrives in Sofia in advance of the German army's entry into Bulgaria, and confers with his Bulgarian contact.

Zara finally persuades Dimmy and Samuil that they have a responsibility to Else and David. As circumstances draw Zara close to Straube, she archly asks him, "I don't see how the Jews have wronged you." Amid the mounting tension, anti-Semitic Bulgarians vent their spleen.

Journey to Jerusalem is intrinsically interesting in terms of its story line, but its plodding pace can be maddening.

Stalin's Last Purge begins with the 1948 murder of Solomon Mikhoels – the famed director of the Moscow State Yiddish Theatre – and ends with the death of Joseph Stalin, the Soviet dictator, in 1953. The two events seem unrelated, but in fact are inextricably connected by Stalin's anti-American paranoia and his anti-Semitism.

Mikhoels incurred Stalin's wrath by speaking out favourably on behalf of Israel. His comment, made as the Cold War was supplanting the Soviet Union's wartime alliance with the United States, fed into Stalin's distorted belief that Jews were "contaminated" by Zionism and were western "enemy agents."

During the war, Stalin used the state-sanctioned Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee to promote the Soviet Union's interests, especially in the United States. But with the onset of the Cold War, Moscow's relationship with Washington unravelled, much to the detriment of Soviet Jews.

This cogent documentary recounts the black years of the Jewish community in the Soviet Union: the disbanding of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, the Doctors' Plot, the removal of Jews from positions of power and the scheme to deport Jews to Siberia and Central Asia.

Michale Boganim's Odessa... Odessa is an ode to a fabled Russian Black Sea port that has seen better days and lost a good part of its Jewish population in the past 20 years.

The film takes place mainly in Brighton Beach, Brooklyn, and Ashdod, Israel, where many Odessan Jews have rebuilt their lives. The introductory scenes unfold in Odessa, which looks drab and depressed today.

The former Jewish inhabitants of this legendary city feel nostalgic and dreamy about Odessa. Transplanted Odessan Jews in Brighton Beach are glad to be in America, but their counterparts in Ashdod generally carp about Israel.

The Aryan Couple, a misbegotten feature film by John Daly, stars Martin Landau as Joseph Krauzenberg, a wealthy Jewish industrialist fighting for his family's life in Nazi-occupied Hungary and trying to expedite their emigration to a safe haven. Although it tries hard to achieve gravitas, and sometimes succeeds on this level, the movie is rather flimsy, superficial and cloying. The title refers to an attractive young couple who are not what they seem. The penultimate scenes, which take place on Germany's border with Switzerland, are simply ghastly.

Bandleader pursues connection to Judaism

The tunes the TJO played at the concert, arranged by Grossman, had an energy and exuberance to them, and Grossman's orchestra colleagues gave their all to these selections.

Grossman believes each contribution made by the individual musicians in the TJO should be valued. He has a special chemistry with his band members, he said. And they are not only colleagues but also friends.

The orchestra's performance and the musicians' interaction with Elling showed the confidence that these students have in themselves and their abilities, confidence that Grossman has helped instill in them.

It was Grossman who arranged for Elling to come to Toronto. "I had seen Kurt live," Grossman said. "He is artistically amazing. I thought it would be fabulous to have him sing with us."

Once Elling's availability was confirmed, Grossman worked hard to get corporate sponsorships and the backing of Toronto's Jazz.FM91. The Toronto Arts Council and Canadian Heritage also supported the concert.

The TJO and Elling traded charts and rehearsed separately, meeting only on the eve of the concert.

"Kurt is a consummate professional – he just 'nailed' his parts. When we met... he was incredibly articulate and specific with the band about his needs and expectations," Grossman said. "Yet he was friendly and easygoing... no attitude at all. His passion was evident."

Joshua Grossman

During a workshop presented by Elling at U of T – the main reason for his visit to Toronto – he said that "when you find something you're passionate about, give yourself to it completely, and be dedicated to pursuing your passion."

One area of passion that Grossman is keen to pursue is his connection to Judaism. He sang in the Beth Habonim choir for years and developed an appreciation for the sacred melodies. "I am always wondering, how can I present Jewish and sacred music in a big-band setting," he said. His goal is to someday adapt this type of music for a big band, especially melodies that commemorate the Holocaust.

Grossman's parents encouraged their son in his pursuits at an early age. Piano lessons began at age five and at 10 – while attending the Pine River Arts Camp – he picked up a trumpet for the first time and was hooked.

With a musically inclined family, including a grandfather who sang in a choir all his life, Grossman says "it has never been a question of 'are you sure this is what you want to do?' It was always just 'go for it.' My parents have always been incredibly supportive of my choices."

Grossman played in stage bands at Kane Senior Public School and at Lawrence Park Collegiate. At U of T, he was inspired by Nimmons' energy and passion for music, and the instruction he got from Read.

Grossman began composing in high school and he was encouraged to continue while at U of T. "So much of jazz is about composition and improvisation. Improvisation is really just composing on the spot," he said. "It is amazing to have all my ideas come to fruition on paper, and then hear them come alive during a performance."

PLETHORA OF GALLERY SHOWS AROUND TOWN

Cometh spring, and a person's fancy turns to – art. Or so it would seem, from this plethora of exhibitions in and around town:

• "A Return to Toronto, Emerging in Midlife," an exhibition of works by artist Ava Peters. Bathurst JCC, May 2 to 31, 416-636-1880.

• The Toronto Watercolour Society presents "Metamorphosis," its 20th-anniversary spring juried show. Wagner-Rosenbaum Gallery, @Arts on King, 159 King St. E. May 3 to 22. Opening reception, Sunday, May 8, 1 to 4 p.m. 416-777-9617.

• The 9th annual Thornhill Visual Artists Studio Tour & Sale takes place in the homes of about a dozen artists. Thursday, May 5, through Sunday, May 8. www.thornhillva.com

• "Portraits of Bravery, Canadian Jewish War Veterans of WWII" is an exhibition of photographs by Juri Dojc. Miles Nadal JCC, Jacobs Lounge. Opens May 5, 6:30 p.m. Until May 26.

• Brenda Bornstein, Susan M. Cohen and Rosalie Seidelman have been painting together for more than a decade, each with a distinct style. Signature members of the Toronto Watercolour Society, the Markham Group of Artists and other societies, the friends have often exhibited together. A joint show of their work opens at the Kathleen Gormley McKay Art Centre, 197 Main St., Unionville, on Thursday, May 5; free admission, refreshments, 5 to 9 p.m. On view May 4 to 15.

Koffler Chamber Orchestra: The Koffler Centre of the Arts Chamber Orchestra performs a second concert under the direction of violinist-conductor Jacques Israelievitch, concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Selected by the renowned maestro, the players are high-calibre musicians although many have non-musical day jobs.

The program includes works by Tchaikovsky, Mendelssohn, Copeland and Gershwin. Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. $15-$12; patrons $50. Monday, May 2, 8 p.m. 416-636-1880, ext. 228. www.kofflercentre.com

Images from Ground Zero: Following the 9/11 tragedy, photographer Joel Meyerowitz assembled an archive of 8,500 digital photographs depicting the devastation in Lower Manhattan. Sections of "Aftermath: Images from Ground Zero" have been been seen by millions of people so far in 35 cities around the globe. Twenty-eight images from the collection make a Canadian premiere at 441 King St. W. during the CONTACT 2005 festival. Meyerowitz, a Guggenheim fellow and author of 15 books, lectures at Jackman Hall, Art Gallery of Ontario, May 2, 7 p.m. $12 for adults, $10 students and seniors.

Benefit concert: Children's entertainers Sharon, Lois and Bram present a benefit singalong concert – their first concert for adults only – in aid of Mariposa In The Schools, a program that brings performing arts programs into schools and communities throughout Ontario. The evening also features various solo performers and musicians playing accompaniment on hurdy-gurdy, banjo, harmonica and other instruments.

"We think of this concert as a good old-fashioned hootenanny," Sharon said. Isabel Bader Theatre, Victoria University, 93 Charles St. W. General admission $50, patrons $150. Thursday, May 5, 8 p.m. 416-462-9400.

Names in the News

• Near the end of CanStage's mid-April celebratory roast in honour of Bluma Appel, the arts philanthropist told the 900 assembled guests, who had collectively donated about $150,000, that she would add another $50,000 to the total, to be shared equally by CanStage and Opera Atelier. "We are so grateful to Bluma and her husband Bram for their continued generous support of CanStage," said artistic producer Martin Bragg.

• After graduating from university in psychology and drama, Toronto-based Caryn Green chose to become an actor instead of going to medical school. She debuted in the Canadian feature Bollywood/Hollywood, which opened the Toronto International Film Festival in 2002. Numerous theatre and screen credits followed, the most current of which is her role as a villain in NBC's Revelations, a six-part series that airs Wednesdays at 9 p.m. in April and May. The Johannesburg-born Green also indulges in music, painting and writing.

Arts in Brief

• Diane Flacks joins Karen Robinson as co-host of Femcab, a celebration of the 25th anniversary of Nightwood Theatre and women's accomplishments. Flacks is the author of Bear With Me, which "hilariously reveals the taboos of pregnancy and motherhood." Isabel Bader Theatre, 93 Charles St. W. $48-$28; reception and show $125. Monday, May 2, 8 p.m.

• Encore Entertainment presents the Stephen Sondheim musical Company, a clever, bittersweet portrayal of five married couples as seen through the eyes of a bachelor friend. Toronto Centre for the Arts, Studio Theatre, 5040 Yonge St. $26-$24. May 5 to 15, 8 p.m.; Sunday matinees, 2 p.m. 416-733-0558.

• Tafelmusik Chamber Choir and Baroque Orchestra presents Handel's Deborah, an oratorio sometimes described as the composer's "second great choral masterpiece," based on the biblical story of the judge-prophetess Deborah. Trinity-St. Paul's Centre, 427 Bloor Street W. May 5 to 7, 7:30 p.m. and May 8, 3:30 p.m. 416-964-6337.

Student's Holocaust film takes on life of its own

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For a film school project, Pigeon has gotten a lot of play.

It appeared at last year's Toronto International Film Festival, it was screened at the New York Student Film Festival, it's slated to run at next month's Toronto Jewish Film Festival and, perhaps most importantly, it garnered its maker, third year student Anthony Green, an "A" in his film studies course at New York University (NYU).

And why not? The film, which clocks in at barely 15 minutes, is a little gem, a technically proficient piece that stirs such emotions as fear, anger, gratitude, wonder and curiosity. Based on a true story from the Holocaust, Pigeon tells the story of an anonymous righteous gentile whose quick wit and unexpected intervention saved a Jew from an unknown fate at the hands of the Nazis.

Green, a 22-year-old from Toronto, said his class project has "taken on a life of its own."

As with the character at the heart of Pigeon, fortune played a huge role in bringing the strands of the film together, much of it at the last minute.

As Green tells the tale, he was having difficulty coming up with an idea for the film until he called on an old friend in Toronto, Eli Rubenstein, for help. He knew Rubenstein as his bar mitzvah instructor at Beth Habonim Synagogue and he knew Rubenstein was a devoted storyteller with a vast repertoire at his disposal.

As it happened, Rubenstein was about to visit New York and the two arranged for a get-together during his trip.

Over dinner, Rubenstein told him more than 10 stories but one in particular grabbed Green's attention. It contained the elements he, a student filmmaker trying to develop his artistic voice, always liked. "I'm always attracted to times when humans go above and beyond their call of duty," he explained on the line from New York.

He felt the story had particular resonance in New York's post 9/11 atmosphere because it examined how people's fates could turn on being in the right place at the right time.

He modified the original story to accommodate the star of the film, Lerner. The original incident was set in Italy and involved a Jewish woman and a non-Jewish man on a train. Lerner looked too Jewish to play the gentile, so he switched the roles and he included pigeons as part of the script, knowing that Lerner had a particular affection for birds, Green said.

Lerner signed on, as did Wendy Crewson, a noted Canadian actress with several Geminis to her credit.

Shooting took place over two days at an old railway station in Tottenham, Ont., which was made to look like France during World War II.

Cory Mandell, who Green had worked for on the wedding and bar mitzvah circuit as a youth, donated the props to give it a proper period feel.

The film almost did not get made when ACTRA, the association that represents Canadian film, TV and radio talent, refused to recognized Green as a Canadian film student because he was enrolled at NYU. That decision meant he had to pay the actors, including extras, ACTRA wages, a demand that ballooned his costs from $12,000 to $25,000. Luckily, Jay Firestone stepped up with the extra cash and the shooting went ahead as scheduled. But it left a bad taste in Green's mouth and has turned him off Canadian production for the future.

Nevertheless, making the movie "was a dream for a film student," Green said.

Rubenstein said Pigeon "was a simple yet profound story."

It was screened at a meeting at Habonim last winter and both youngsters and survivors were transfixed by it, he said.

Besides its obvious artistic merit, the film can be used as a teaching tool, Rubenstein said. Rubenstein, national director of March of the Living Canada, said he planned to distribute it to March of the Living organizers around the world to serve "as a trigger to discuss heroism and courage" during the Holocaust.

Yiddish in Canada across the decades

The Journals of Yaacov Zipper, 1950-1982: The Struggle for Yiddishkeit,* edited and translated by Mervin Butovsky and Ode Garfinkle, McGill-Queen's University Press.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

The recent publication in English translation of Yaacov Zipper's Journals reflects a turning point in the life of Yiddish in Canada.

Beginning in the 1950s, the role of the language in everyday culture suffered a steep decline, to be replaced by what Toronto-based historian Frank Bialystok has called new "pillars of ethnic identity." Among these new pillars was, of course, Israel, followed by the Holocaust, which established itself at the centre of communal concerns in the 1980s. To maintain Yiddishist inclinations in the intervening years was a recipe for cultural marginalization – a bit like driving a Studebaker when the neighbours have moved on to Mazdas and Audis.

Norman Ravvin

Not long after I graduated from Calgary's I.L. Peretz School in the 1970s, the day school was folded into the local Talmud Torah. Zipper bemoans these developments as early as 1959, as he takes the measure of his role as principal of the Montreal Peretz School at a time when the Jewish population and institutions of the old downtown neighbourhood were giving way to new suburban developments: "The new school is truly beautiful and comfortable, but whether the ideals for which we sacrificed all these years will be able to strike roots in this new neighbourhood, with new people – who knows?"

In his interaction with students' parents, he senses a dividedness, at times a sense of confusion and doubt, over the role of Yiddish education: "The more intelligent they are, the greater the confusion in their mind. The conflict they had with their parents when they were young interferes with their ability to approach the issues of Yiddish, identification, and religion. Some of them are so fearful of these issues…"

Zipper's work as a Yiddish educator was in conflict with his pursuits as a writer of memoir and fiction. As with A.M. Klein, Zipper's public role, which brought a modicum of communal status and paid the bills, distracted him from his goals as a writer. In particular, a long-standing project to write a "fictional account of his own generation, the story of the immigrant experience in Montreal," remained unfinished.

This is only one of a number of sources of melancholy musing in the course of his Journals. The prospect of peace in Israel is an ongoing concern; as is the slow but inevitable disappearance of his compatriots – the children of Montreal's early Jewish immigration wave, who grew up in the area surrounding St. Lawrence Boulevard. Zipper's account of the mourners at Klein's funeral, late in the summer of 1972, is revealing: "From socialists to the Orthodox, assimilationists, Yiddish writers and cultural activists. And perhaps a few from the English community, too."

The Journals of Yaacov Zipper, 1950-1982
The Struggle for Yiddishkeit
Translated from the Yiddish and edited by Mervin Butovsky and Ode Garfinkle

Zipper's musings over the 1976 funeral of Melech Ravitch is equally resonant, as it clearly marks the end point of an era, when internationally known Yiddish writers made Montreal a centre of creativity and publication. Of Ravitch's eulogy, Zipper writes: "I felt that what was missing was the grief of passing, and the personal pain. Maybe it is not possible to express this." Most likely it was more than the death of one poet that Zipper felt needed memorialization.

The succinct introduction to Zipper's Journals is provided by their translators, Mervin Butovsky and Ode Garfinkle. In a restrained, almost ethnographic tone, they avoid the temptation to offer their own celebratory eulogy. Instead, they provide a detailed portrait of Zipper's Montreal, and reflect on his ambivalent relationship with his European past. Born in 1900 and raised in the Polish town of Tishevitz, Zipper abandoned the observance of his parents in favour of what the editors call the "potent ideology of socialist-Zionism." Still, the shtetl remained a point of imaginative identification for him, so that the greater the number of years that separated him from his family home, the greater his "desire to rescue from oblivion the precious spiritual features" he recognized in shtetl culture. We see, especially in Zipper's fictional sketches, the beginning of a tendency to mythologize the place and character of prewar Jewish life and culture in Poland.

> Prospect of peace in Israel an ongoing concern

Canadian links with such culture became ever more tenuous in recent decades. The fall of the Soviet Union created a shift of sorts, as tourism to eastern Europe allowed North Americans to travel with relative ease to their ancestral homes. The prevailing view of Poland as a graveyard for Jews has been tempered by an increasing interest in prewar culture, in Yiddish language and literature. Since Zipper's battle for Yiddish as a pillar of ethnic identity was lost, the language can no longer be viewed as a competitor with mainstream expressions of North American Jewish identity. With this shift has come an increasing interest in the work and outlook of influential Yiddish idealists, writers and educators. What the impact of such projects of recovery will be remains to be seen. Undoubtedly, interest will have to move beyond academic circles and Yiddish vinklech for the outcome to be substantial.

The breadth, intelligence and care applied to Zipper's Journals by their translators, and the interest of an important publisher like McGill-Queen's, bodes well for the future of the field.

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is Lola by Night. He is co-editor of The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader and is chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

CD has 'otherworldly' experience

BY ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

It is simultaneously dark and uplifting with a diverse blend of heterogeneous sounds, but for all of its nuances, Awakening, the recently released CD by the St. Lawrence String Quartet, does what all music strives for – it evokes profound emotions.

"We want people to take away a unique experience and in speaking of the second quartet, it is deeply moving and spiritual," says violinist Barry Shiffman, who joins violinist Geoff Nuttall, viola player Lesley Robertson and Christopher Costanza on the cello, in the famed Canadian ensemble.

"It has an 'otherworldly' experience."

The CD's second quartet Shiffman refers to is entitled The Gathering and was composed by Canadian Christos Hatzis, who incorporates everything from Middle Eastern motifs to Eastern Orthodox melodies on the CD.

Inspired by the conflict in the former Yugoslavia and the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s, Hatzis says the variations in styles "act as a form of exorcism against the absurdity of war and senseless violence."

The first quartet, The Awakening, includes Inuit throat singing and sounds of railway locomotives alongside the quartet's wide ranging strings. It was influenced by Hatzis "awakening" to the trials and tribulations of native cultures.

The CD also features concert appearances.

While group members aren't expecting the CD to go platinum, they are enthusiastic about its potential.

"Recorded music opens up a whole lot of possibilities," says Nuttall.

"The major issue is exposure from a young age and being educated in how to listen to music."

Robertson agrees with the importance of classical music gaining wider exposure.

"I have friends who never listen to classical music and they'll pick something up that's lying around my house and say that's cool," she says.

"It's great music and the more people hear it, the more they like it."

Audiences from around the world definitely like what they hear from the quartet.

Formed in Canada in 1989, the foursome has established itself as a world renowned chamber ensemble, performing some 1,500 times in four continents in the last 15 years.

In addition, the musicians are Ensemble in Residence at Stanford University in California and have garnered numerous accolades, including a Juno Award, winning the Banff International String Quartet competition and a Grammy nomination for Yiddishbbuk, a Holocaust-inspired compilation composed by Argentinean Jew Osvaldo Golijov.

Every member of the group said they felt touched by Yiddishbbuk's cultural "point of reference."

"Despite the fact I don't have a background in Jewish culture and religion or the suffering that went on (during the Holocaust), it spoke to me pretty quickly," says Costanza.

"For me, the most powerful thing was hearing Osvaldo describe it," relates Nuttall.

"He clarified what being Jewish means."

Shiffman, a Jew raised in Toronto, says he was just as affected as his colleagues.

"I don't give myself any added ability to reflect on the Holocaust just because my family is Jewish," he said.

"I think musicians as a group are often more sensitive to what goes on in the world. We've played…Yiddishbbuk and after the show, somebody came back stage and showed me their tattooed arm. I think it hit me just as hard as it hit my colleagues."

The group is in the midst of a rigorous touring schedule which included a recent performance of R. Murray Schafer's Four-Forty with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

They're also looking forward to June 24 to July 3 at Stanford when they will host a music institute for amateurs from around the world.

"It has an intense music focus, but at the same time, the adult amateurs and students learn so much from each other," Shiffman says.

Awakening was released by EMI Classics and is now available.

Red Sox's Youkilis sent down to the farm

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Kevin Youkilis' spot on the opening day roster of the World Series champion Boston Red Sox came with a warning from manager Terry Francona late in spring training: if Youkilis didn't see regular playing time, he would be sent to the minors.

That's exactly what happened 11 days into the season when the back-up third baseman was optioned to Triple-A Pawtucket so the club could activate its ace pitcher, Curt Schilling, off the disabled list.

Youkilis played just once in the team's first seven games, going one for two with a walk in the series finale at Toronto's Rogers Centre.

The ballpark formerly known as SkyDome will always remain special to him as it's where he made his major league debut last May 15.

Boston's eighth-round pick in the 2001 amateur draft homered off Pat Hentgen in his second big league at-bat.

"Every time I come back here, I'll remember where my first game was, all the excitement with how I started my career," Youkilis said.

The 26-year-old may also recall his initiation on the flight out of Toronto to Tampa the following night, when he was forced to wear a Hooters waitress outfit.

Referred to as "The Greek God of Walks" by Oakland general manager Billy Beane in the book Moneyball, the six-foot-one, 220-pounder was raised in a Conservative Jewish home in Cincinnati and is of Romanian descent. But his Jewish background hasn't deterred strangers from speaking Greek to him, nor did it prevent him from receiving an invitation to play on last summer's Greek Olympic team.

He is viewed by Red Sox brass as one of the top young players in the organization and is their third baseman of the future. Youkilis could very well be manning the hot corner as early as 2006 with Bill Mueller now in the final year of his contract.

"The way the season was unfolding, I was worried about him," Francona told the Boston Globe. "We love the kid. Love the player, but I don't want to do this kid harm [by not playing him]. He did nothing to dampen our opinion of him as a player. He needs more at-bats at this stage in his career and is going to be back. This isn't season-long. He knows that."

The Red Sox called up Youkilis in a pinch last May after Mueller injured his knee and he wound up staying with the team – with the exception of a six-day stint back in Pawtucket – for the remainder of the season.

He went on to become the American League's rookie of the month for May, hitting .318 (14 for 44) with a homer, seven RBIs, 15 runs scored, a .446 on-base percentage and a .477 slugging percentage in 13 games.

He hit .260 with seven homers and 35 RBIs in 72 games, making 55 starts at third base. Youkilis ranked among American League rookie leaders in on-base percentage (second at .367), walks (second with 33), batting average and RBIs (fourth), and slugging percentage (fourth at .413).

Youkilis went 0 for 2 in game two of the divisional playoffs against Anaheim last fall, marking the only post-season action he would see. He was on the World Series roster, but was left off for the memorable American League Championship Series versus the New York Yankees.

Youkilis received a ring at the team's banner-raising home opener, two days before he was sent to the farm.

Possessing an excellent eye and superb strike-zone judgement, Youkilis tied a minor league record in 2003 by reaching base safely in 71 consecutive games while playing for Pawtucket and Portland, where he was an Eastern League all-star that season.

A two-time All-American at the University of Cincinnati, he credits his faith with making him a disciplined person, saying it not only helps shape his character, but also his approach to the game.

His first year in the majors only enhanced his reputation as an on-base machine. Youkilis drew 45 walks in 208 at-bats. To no one's surprise, he took a free pass his first time up again in 2005.

• Red Sox outfielder Adam Stern continues to work out at extended spring training while recovering from a fractured right thumb he broke sliding head-first into the bag on a stolen base attempt in Grapefruit League play on March 5 against Cincinnati. The London, Ont., native who played for Canada at last summer's Athens Olympics, was placed on the disabled list retroactive to March 25.

Once Stern is cleared to play in games, Boston can send its Rule 5 draft selection on a 20-day rehab assignment, after which time he must either be put on the major league roster or offered back to the Atlanta Braves (the team that left him unprotected) for $25,000. The 5-11, 190-pound left-handed hitter was taken by the Red Sox with the 11th pick in December's draft and has yet to play above Double-A ball.

Buzzer-beater ends CHAT Tigers' hoops season

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) boys basketball team was intent on making a worthwhile trip to the Triple-A OFSAA playoffs in Newmarket after qualifying for the first provincial championship in the school's 45-year history.

Despite flying back into the city from Baltimore the night before their opening round contest and playing six games in the six days leading up to the event, CHAT came within a buzzer-beater of advancing to the tournament's semi-finals.

In their first game, the 13th-seeded Tigers were matched against Scarborough's Laurier Collegiate, seeded seventh, and pulled out a crucial 50-47 overtime victory. Six-foot-seven forward Jared Mintz led the team with 22 points.

A loss in the opener would have meant a second-round elimination game versus eventual OFSAA (Ontario Federation of School Athletic Associations) champion St. Patrick's, the fourth seed from Sarnia. Instead, CHAT faced tournament host Sacred Heart, seeded 10th, in the opening day's afternoon session. They hung on for a 52-43 win to set up a quarter-final game against second-ranked St. Marguerite D'Youville on the second morning of the three-day tournament.

Down one point with six seconds left, the D'Youville Panthers called a timeout. They then took the ball the length of the floor and attempted a 15-foot jumper to win the game. It missed, but the Panthers grabbed the offensive board for the put-back at the buzzer to win 49-48, ending the Tigers season after they had played nine games in eight days.

"We were a little tired, but excited to play [at OFSAA]," said CHAT senior forward Ryan Tevel, who led the team with 16 points against D'Youville and 26 the previous day against Sacred Heart. "I think our team really had a great time."

Tevel leaves the Tigers on a bright note after being part of a club that won only one regular season game the previous season.

CHAT finished 9-1 this year in TDCAA league play, which includes the city's Catholic and independent schools, earning themselves home court advantage in the first two playoff rounds.

They used it to their benefit in handily defeating Don Bosco and Neil McNeil, setting themselves up as the league's representative in the OFSAA qualifying game against Upper Canada College.

Despite losing to Henry Carr in the league semi-finals, CHAT advanced the furthest of the Triple-A eligible schools in the TDCAA, and trudged off through a snowstorm to the UCC campus in mid-town Toronto to play for a spot in OFSAA.

The Tigers didn't play their best game, but they pulled out a 36-32 victory nevertheless. They left the next day for Baltimore to participate in a Jewish high school tournament.

CHAT won three of its five games there, losing in the semi-finals to New Jersey's Solomon Schechter after defeating them in round-robin play.

Mintz said it wasn't that difficult to play so many games in such a short period, because the team got to rest every night and everyone wanted to play so much.

"I think that [6 a.m. practices three times a week] made us a lot tougher players," he said.

With a number of this year's18 players, including Mintz and starting guard Kevin Treger, coming back in the fall, next season's Tigers promises to be another competitive squad.

Over the summer, Mintz, along with graduating starters Zack Isakow and Noah Kadish, will compete on Canada's youth team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Elijah the Prophet

30 something
By MIRIAM PORTER

When my sister and I were young children, we quickly sprinted to the front door during the Passover seder and breathlessly greeted Elijah. I remember wondering how he made it to so many houses in our Toronto neighbourhood in one evening – let alone to Jewish homes all over the world.

As a kid trying to make sense of an invisible man coming into my home, I rationalized and compared him to the fictitious character Snuffleupagus on Sesame Street. Just because you couldn't see him didn't mean he was not there.

One year I opened the door for Elijah and my cat Willow pranced in. My sister and I were shocked, and I was thoughtfully distressed for the rest of the evening. When I told this to a friend, he confided the same thing happened to him. As a boy, he opened the door for Elijah and he was stunned when a stray cat walked into his parent's home and scared everyone.

For years I watched my father pour red wine for Elijah in the special ruby- and-gold-coloured wineglass. I was quite anxious that my father didn't pour him too much because he still had many other houses to visit that evening. Later that night, I would call my friends to see if Elijah had been to their houses, too.

Once my parents were seated back at the dining room table leaning on their pillows, I would linger at the front door and secretly whisper to Elijah. I thanked him for taking the time to come to our house and always wished him a safe journey.

Now as an adult, I still try to make it to the front door first and talk to him surreptitiously before he departs our seder – but now I realize Elijah is a lot more meaningful and significant, and is nothing like Big Bird's imaginary friend.

Over the years, through my relentless pursuit of truth and wisdom, I learned Elijah the Prophet represents the heralding of messianic days, when there will be no war and people will not have to fear each other.

According to tradition, Elijah lived in a cave on Mount Carmel during the ninth century. Elijah stressed monotheism and said there was no reality except the God of Israel. He delivered messages from God and generously helped many people. There is no record of his death, a rite of passage that would have severed his connection to this world. It is believed Elijah was taken up to the heavens in a chariot drawn by fiery horses. According to legend, he now travels back and forth between heaven and earth like an angel offering solace, and continues to carry messages from God.

The Aish HaTorah website declares, "When the Talmud is unable to definitively resolve certain questions of law or practice, it often states that the questions have to wait for Elijah. With the advent of the final era, one of Elijah's roles will be to resolve all those lingering scholarly quandaries.

"There is an opinion in the Talmud which states that five cups of wine, not four, are to be drunk at the seder. In practice we follow the majority opinion and drink only four cups. In deference to the minority opinion, however, we pour the fifth cup of wine, even though no one drinks from it. This fifth cup of wine bears the name of Elijah because it is he who will eventually resolve this question, as well as many others."

Today, when I think of Elijah the Prophet, I think of an inspiring individual and miracle-worker who positively personifies truth and is not just a part of my imagination.

"Behold, I send you Elijah the Prophet before the coming of the great and awesome day of God" (Malachi 3:23).

Next year in Jerusalem. Chag Samayach!

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

Karl Landsteiner (1868-1943) made blood transfusions safe by his discovery in 1900 that there were different kinds of blood.

By 1902, his research team had determined that there were four blood groups, which he labelled A, B, AB and O. He also identified which groupings were safe for transfusions – A could accept blood from A and O donors; B from A and O; O only from O; and AB from all donors.

His discoveries meant that blood banks could be established, allowing major surgery to take place.

In 1919, however, Landsteiner was so poor that he had to take a basic lab job in a hospital. But he was later invited to head the research laboratory at the Rockefeller Institute in New York. There, he and a young assistant identified three more blood factors – M, N and P.

The scientist's additional blood classifications can be used to help determine paternity and have been helpful in the investigation of blood stains at a crime scene.

Landsteiner had studied medicine in Vienna, but his work on immunology was undertaken at the Rockefeller Institute.

Illa Vij, writing about Landsteiner in the Tribune (March 25, 2000), commented that his "work has touched and benefited nearly every human being."

He was totally devoted to his work, putting in 12-hour days. In addition to his work on blood types, his research on microbes set the stage for the discovery of vaccines that prevent typhus.

He was awarded a Nobel Prize in 1930.

Moreover, in 1940, he, with Alexander Wiener and Philip Levine, announced the discovery of the rhesus (rh) factor in the red blood cells of certain individuals.

We were slaves, we are slaves

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Pinchas stumbled over the slave-ropes covered in blood and grime from his infected ankles. He was exhausted, but Pitom, the storehouse was almost finished.

Pinchas was somewhat big-headed about his work. At 10, he considered how he had accomplished something "big," certainly "more than those Egyptian children who played silly games all day."

The young Hebrew slave padded the stones with lime. As he did, he spotted two Jews, similar in features and countenance, walking freely. They seemed special and gentle in their way, frequently asking countless slaves about their welfare. Nattering and gossiping in the line, the Sons of Israel were saying that these unshackled Jews were brothers called Moses and Aaron, and they had been seen entering the court of Pharaoh Ramses II.

Despite the pain in his body, Pinchas imitated their walk – it was hearty, the movement of free men, each step vigorously projecting the sculptured and muscular force of their calves.

"Ow! Ow!" Pinchas cried. The taskmasters' whip split the skin on the child's back as he yelled, "You lazy, stupid Hebrew." Pinchas toppled over. His 10-year-old blood spurted onto the slave driver's sandals. Angrily he…

Mahjoub imagined himself sitting in a crane he had seen at the oil wells outside his owner's compound in southern Sudan. His 10-year-old imagination swept him away from his pinching chains and he saw himself happily sipping cola with the slave masters and men from faraway countries. "Ha!" he yelled to the indolent oil workers. "Let's go, you donkeys. More oil! Why do I deserve such asses on my team?"

Mahjoub laughed determinedly as he pushed the last stone into place with his left hand and right arm to complete the guesthouse. The lanky, child slave had ingeniously figured out a way to use one hand and an arm to manipulate heavy materials after Hussein, "his smelly taskmaster," had macheted the fingers off his right hand – one by one, week after week. Hussein said this was a lesson for laughing "like a child."

But Majoub never cried, not even once, as Hussein sliced his fingers off in front of the other slave children. Each time Hussein carved off another digit, the Sudanese slave would close his eyes tightly, breathe deeply and smile thinking how proud his parents would have been of his bravery. Afterward, he considered his stumpy hand a trophy honouring his people, the black people of Sudan…

Pinchas lay on the ground, not moving. Yocheved, the water carrier, ran to him, lifting him into her arms and forcing water down his throat. She glared at the taskmaster with a threatening maternal gaze. The little Jewish slave boy was dead, beaten to death, murdered for being a boy – for being a Hebrew boy. The line stopped. The sons of Israel rent their tattered tunics. A great cry erupted and the skies became sinister with rage…

A fierce punch to the head interrupted Mahjoub's fantasy. Hussein had caught him again. This blameless gift of light – a boy of 10 living in 2005 – braced himself, knowing his life would not be spared this time. Mahjoub opened his eyes, and he began to laugh joyfully and freely as tears rolled down his face. Hussein raised his machete to the sky.

The Torah tells us 36 times that we were strangers in a strange land, in order to remind us of our origins as a people – slavery. In 2005, 20 million people are still enslaved, many of them children. Each bite of matzah must, therefore, remind us of this unjust reality and our responsibility to emulate Moses and Aaron, by courageously walking into the courts of our leaders to demand, "Let our people go" – God's creations, the enslaved people of our world.
